Popular Songs, Marches, Quicksteps, Polkas, Schottisches, Waltzes, Dancing and Instrumental Music, prices as follows:
VIOLIN, FLUTE, FIFE OR CORNET.
Omnibus No. 1—500 Tunes...price $1 25, mailed.
" No. 2—850 " " 2 00 "
" No. 3—1,000 " " 2 50 "
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS of every description, at lowest New York prices. Illustrated Price Lists sent free.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

Agents wanted to distribute Circulars everywhere. Address H. TABER & CO., Boston, Mass.

NEW MUSIC.
COME SING TO ME AGAIN: "I have heard sweet music stealing." 30c.
THE HAUNTING THOUGHT (Reichardt): "I love but One," German and Italian words. 60c.
I CANNOT SING THE OLD SONGS, by Claribel 30c.
EIRA, with variations by Brinley Richards. 60c.
SILVER TRUMPETS, played at Rome on Christmas Day 50c.
SILVER TRUMPETS, Grand Processional March 30c.
SILVER TRUMPETS, Harmony in the Octave, 50c.
Mailed, free. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address

Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-36 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y.

PARLOR ORGANS.

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, was awarded us by the late great FAIR of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, over all competitors, for the best instruments.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial. The award for the second best Instrument of this class was made to James M. Pelton, exhibitor and agent of the Peloubet organ; and the third award was given to Mason & Hamlin."—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms."
G. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."
GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"The best Instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHAS. FRADEL.

Illustrated Catalogues sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
528-40 No. 97 East 23d Street, N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,057, P. O., New York. tf

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $6 50 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers
21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired. 531-42

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

U. S. STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 Arch Street, Philadelphia,
42 John Street, New York.

Samples and Prices on Application. Lots made to Order of any Pattern or Stamp required.

Caution: These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

For sale at retail by all stationers throughout the country. R. ESTERBROOK & CO.
530-37

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools readily yield to these peerless remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of November 14th, 1865,

No. 19126	drew	$100,000
No. 28325	"	50,000
No. 20085	"	25,000
No. 18121	"	10,000
No. 16313	"	5,000
No. 25307	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

B. T. HAYWARD,

208 Broadway, N. Y.,

Manufacturer of Odd Fellows, Masonic, Army, Navy, Base Ball, Skating Club, Railroad Conductors, and Badges of every description. I will send a sample coin silver on the receipt of $1 50, together with my wholesale Illustrated Circular.

FENIANS!

IRISHMEN,

IRISH-AMERICANS,

Friends of Freedom,

WEAR THE

IRISH LIBERTY PIN!

This splendid little emblem of the noble Brotherhood, banded together in the holy cause of Liberty, is made of metal, heavily fire-gilt, and is very ornamental. It consists of the Golden Circle, and the Irish Harp upon green silk. (Patented, and copyright secured.) Price, 30 cents; by mail, 35 cents; to Clubs and the Trade, $2 25 per dozen, $24 per gross. Address all orders to B. W. HITCHCOCK,
14, Chambers street, New York.

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 35 cents. Address E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.
tf

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MACKEY,
267 Broadway, New York.

$1. WHISKERS. $1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
525-37

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Sent free for FIVE CENTS.
tf Address, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 525-37

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!

NEW! BEAUTIFUL!! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!

A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs, in metal frames, and

HIGHLY PERFUMED.

Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CALVIN WILLIS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Matrimony Made Easy;

Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with specimen Love Letters. Price 15 cents. Send orders to Box 3410 P. O., N. Y. 533-5

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address BLACKIE & Co., 718 Broadway, N. Y. tf

The Book of Wonders,

A new Medical Work of thrilling interest to married and single. Hints of great value to all. Price $1; Sealed, $1 25. Address
tf GEO. F. ARLINGTON, 658 Broadway, N. Y.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of Price. Address
FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Salts, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 3410, Post Office, N. Y. 533-5

Self-adjusting Enamelled White, 50 cents; Snow White, 75 cents; Illusion Stitched, $1, $1 25; Neck Tie, $1; Steel Shirt Bosoms, $5; Cuffs, $2; Ladies' Cuffs, $1 50; Collar, $1 50; Mailed promptly on receipt of "price" and "size." Sold by first class Houses everywhere. Exclusive agencies for any unlocated part of the civilized world. BILLON & FOGGAN, Inventors, Patentees and Manufacturers, 78 Nassau Street, N. Y.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 5291y

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1 25, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-37

JOE MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

Now Ready,
FRANK LESLIE'S

Christmas Gift,

A Comic Pictorial

FOR THE HOLIDAYS,

With over 70 Illustrations and Stories. Sole Agents, AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, 119 and 121 Nassau street, New York.

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-37

"The Star-Spangled Banner,"

A racy and sparkling paper, only 30 cents a year. Clubs of ten, $2. Specimens FREE. Address "BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H. 534-7

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnhams & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Petre F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

$1,500 PER YEAR! We went agents everywhere to sell our IMPROVED $20 Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. The ONLY machines sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine; or at No. 823 Broadway, New York; No. 236 Carter street, Philadelphia, Pa.; No. 14 Lombard's Block, Chicago, Ill.; No. 170 West 4th street, Cincinnati, O.; or No. 8 Spaulding's Exchange, Buffalo, N. Y.
534-46

Vieve Brower; or, Life in the Concert Saloons of New York. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78. HOLLAND, N. Y. 536-39

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Onguents and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sal Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co, Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND

REMEDY!

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"It was early in the spring of 1855 that this compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it and got well. J. B. Clark, Esq., editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same preparation in the case of a severe cold, and was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with the results, and so confident of success attending its sales if placed before the public, that he finally persuaded me to give it a name and send it abroad to benefit the suffering. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in Manchester alone one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the lead of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. There is good reason for all this; it is very soothing and healing in its nature, is warming to the stomach, and pleasant withal to the taste, and is exceedingly cheap.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints, the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled. It was not originated for that purpose; but a person in using it for a cough, was not only cured of the cough, but was also cured of a kidney difficulty of ten years' standing. Since that accidental discovery many thousands have used it for the same complaint, and have been completely cured."

The above was written by Dr. Poland in 1860. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as preparations for the cure of Kidney difficulties, in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the New England States.

The past year has given great opportunity to test the virtues of the White Pine Compound. It has been an unusual time for Colds and Coughs, and very large quantities of the White Pine Compound have been sold and used with the happiest effects. It speaks well for the medicine, and the people where it is prepared are high in its praise.

One bottle of this Compound is generally sufficient to remove a bad cough, and frequently I have known persons to have a cold entirely removed in two days by using less than half a bottle. From one to two teaspoonfuls is a large dose. I sometimes put a little white sugar and hot water with it when taken on going to bed.

The limits to which I purposely confine myself in this circular will not allow of that full expression which I would like to give in favor of the White Pine Compound. It is universally admired by all who use it; it has attained to such a popularity among those whose opinion is valuable indeed, that VANITY may possibly, in part, prompt me to record more here than hurried people will have patience to read; so I will stop, by merely recommending to all who need a cough or kidney remedy to test the virtues of the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

TESTIMONIALS.

A very large number of important testimonials have already been received from Physicians, Clergymen, Apothecaries, and, indeed, from all classes of society, speaking in the most flattering terms of the White Pine Compound.

Dr. Nichols, of Northfield, Vt., says:

"I find the White Pine Compound to be very efficacious not only in coughs and other pulmonic affections, but also in affections of the kidneys, debility of the stomach and other kindred organs."

Rev. J. K. Chase, of Rumney, N. H., writes:

"I have for years regarded your White Pine Compound as an invaluable remedy. I can truly say that I regard it as even more efficacious and valuable than ever. I have just taken the Compound for a cold, and it works charmingly."

REV. H. D. DODGE,

of West Randolph, Vt., who is a practising physician, as well as preacher, in a letter to Dr. P., dated May 21, 1863, says: "I find it an excellent medicine in kidney disease."

The White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, is not only as to its name inviting, but is a highly approved medicine. Dr. J. W. Poland, the inventor, has the confidence of the many who know him, a confidence which he enjoyed while laboring usefully many years as a Baptist minister. His experience as a sufferer led him to make experiments which issued in his medical discovery.—Boston Watchman and Reflector.

The editor of the Manchester Daily and Weekly Mirror, in a leader of the daily, thus speaks of the Compound:

"The White Pine Compound is advertised at much length in our columns, and we are happy to learn that the demand for it is increasing beyond all previous expectations. It is the very best medicine for coughs and colds we know of, and no family that has once used it will ever be without it. We speak from our own knowledge; it is sure to kill a Cold, and pleasant as sure. The greatest inventions come by accident, and it is singular that the White Pine Compound, made for Colds and Coughs, should prove to be the greatest remedy for kidney difficulties known. But so it is. We cannot doubt it, so many testimonials come to us from well-known men. Besides, the character of Dr. Poland is such that we know he will not countenance that what is wrong. For years a Baptist clergyman, studying medicine to find remedies for his ailments, with a delicate consumptive look, standing with one foot upon the grave, he made the discovery which has saved himself and called out from hundreds of others the strongest testimonials possible. We have known Dr. Poland for years, and never knew a more conscientious, honest, upright man, and we are glad to state that we believe whatever he says about his White Pine Compound."

Should you think favorably of this medicine, be careful, when purchasing, that it is the WHITE PINE COMPOUND that is offered to you, as we know that other preparations have been palmed off for it by unprincipled dealers.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is manufactured at the

NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT,

106 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON,

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor,

Under the supervision of

REV. J. W. POLAND, M. D.

DR. SWETT will attend to the business department, to whom all orders should be addressed.

Sold by wholesale and retail dealers in Medicine everywhere.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAACK, Chicago, Ill.,
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
COLLINS & BROTHER, St. Louis, Mo.,
WARD, KENNEDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.,
General Agents for the West.

Clergymen, Teachers and The Press,

Unite in saying that the new Juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and circular to the Publishers, TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

o

Make Your Own Soap!

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker, warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington street, N. Y. 528-400

Army Corps Badge Pins and Rings, of 16 carat gold, richly enamelled. BRYANT & DENTLEY, Manufacturing Jewelers, 12 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. EDMAN BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-459

For Great Sale of AMERICAN JEWELRY, FOR THE HOLIDAYS, SEE Goldsworthy Bro's o Advertisement on inside page.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 800 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Tenets of different powers for $1. Address 000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo

WHEELER & WILSON'S HIGHEST PREMIUM LOCK STITCH SEWING MACHINES, 625 Broadway, New York. o

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address o C. F. SHULTS, TROY, N. Y.

Whiskers and Moustaches

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in three to five weeks by using DR. SEVIER'S RESTAURATEUR CA-PILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the Elite of Paris and London on most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

DARGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., 529-410 Sole Agents for the United States.

Ladies and Gentlemen, use the Patent Fasteners. A Pair sent by mail for 25 cents. W. C. WEMYSS, 679 Broadway, N. Y. Dealers and Agents send price for Sample and Trade List. o

A Good Album for holding Fifty Photographs, only $3. $8 Albums for 96 Photographs—beautiful book. Very handsome Fancy Albums for 20 pictures, $1 50; for 40 pictures, $1 25. All Albums sent postage paid. W. C. WEMYSS, 679 Broadway, N. Y. o

Away with Spectacles. Old Eyes Made New, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

Away with Uncomfortable Trusses. Comfort and Cure for the Ruptured. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

Husbands, take care of your Wives. Confidential Information for the Afflicted. Sent free in sealed envelope. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

Parents, take Care of your Children. Consumption Causes, Cure, and how it may be prevented. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet &c., address H. C. L. MEARS, 377 West 23d St., N. Y. eowo

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent as Mail rates, by BARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 55 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

NAUGHTY BOY—"Oh, Uncle, do take this footscrap off me, all the fellows make fun of me so!" UNCLE SAM—"Yes, yes, my boy, as soon as you are good—as soon as you are good."

THE GREAT

BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUM.

Elegant Useful Holiday Presents.

Ladies', Gents', Misses' and Children's Slippers, Gaiters, etc.,

At BROOKS' Agt.

o 573 BROADWAY, N. Y. Opposite the Metropolitan Hotel.

The Dyspeptic—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOFLAND'S German Bitters has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. They are not a whisky drink.—Information Gazette.

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist, 594 Broadway, New York, Agent. 526-380

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S Extract Buchu.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-470

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by SWEET'S CRIMSON OINTMENT. Price 35 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 536-470

Ivory and Pearl Sleeve Buttons and JEWELRY for the Holidays. A new and rich assortment of the latest dress styles. Prices ranging from $1 to $3; Jewelry from $3 to $15; Belt Buckles, $1 50 to $4. Also a fine assortment of Tooth Brushes, wholesale and retail. WM. M. WELLING, Importer and Manufacturer, 571 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

Allen's Lung Balsam is considered by all those who have tried it to be the very best remedy for the cure of CONSUMPTION. It also gives immediate relief to the most distressing cough.

o For sale by Dealers in Family Medicine generally.

FOR THE HOLIDAYS!

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER.

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen, a Beautiful Useful Present for the coming HOLIDAYS. A decidedly unique and wonderful timer. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to KEEP TIME with the utmost accuracy, under certain the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keepers of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," to wind-ing up. Never runs down, and can never be too fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. APPROVED by the PRESS. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also highly praised by the "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-dust Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to

J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors, tfo 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER, AND SHIRT MAKER, No. 637 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

Great Attraction!

GOLD AND SILVER HOLIDAY GIFTS.

$1,060,000 Worth OF

Watches, Jewelry and Silver-ware,

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches.....each $150
500 Silver Watches.....each $20 to $35
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Cases.....each $5 to $

And a large assortment of Jewelry and Silver-ware. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates naming each article and its value are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—for $1; 11 for $5; 30 for $10.

Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,

o No. 36 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4370, N. Y.

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of Prof. De Barzx's FRISER LE CHEVEUX. One application will perfectly curl the most straight and stubborn hair, and will remain in wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address

DARGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., 529-410 Sole Agents for the United States.

To Consumptives.

THE ADVERTISER, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure.

To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable; and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County, N. Y.

Those cases of scanty, retarded growth, the person over 18, the Balsam of the Tennessee Swamp Shrub has been found to excite the Roots, Muscles, &c., to a fine and vigorous growth. (See Testimonials.) Price $1. Sold by druggists. A sample of this Balsam sent sealed on receipt of return postage.

o JOHN RAWLINS, 813 Broadway, N. Y.

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Tru, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $26 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Scion Solomon, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the Superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 537-400

Great American PRIZE CONCERT!

AT

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEBRUARY 22d, 1866.

20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $56,300 will be presented to Ticket Holders.

100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD!

One Gift, in Greenbacks.....$10,000
One Gift, in 7.30 Bonds.....5,000
One Residence Gift, three miles from Chicago.....5,000
2 Square Grand Pianos, 9 Gifts, $500 each.....4,500
20 Eag. Pat. Lever Gold Watches, $100 each.....2,000
25 Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each.....2,500
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches,.....5,000
5,000 Gifts, Silver-ware, $5 each.....25,000
5,000 Gifts, 5,000 Toy Morocco Gold Clasp Albums,.....25,000
4,000 Gifts, 4,000 Clasp Albums, $3 each.....12,000
10,000 Gifts, $10,000 Gold Pens, $1 each.....10,000

20,000 Gifts, Total value of which.....$156,000

The great feature of our Prize Concerts is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public.

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.

2d. All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Pianos and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers name and sufficient guarantee that they are surpassed by none.

3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate No. These are placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed, a disinterested person, (selected by the ticket holders present at the Concert,) draws them out the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in like manner until all is drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first sell sufficient number of tickets to insure a good sum. No Prizes are thus distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unlike other Gift Sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietor makes a dead set for the very last draw, considering it very seldom if ever get anything worth what your ticket cost him.

Don't throw your money away on valueless concerns, but send us your address, and we will warn you when we have over 50,000 already sold. Every ticket is registered before leaving our office, and a receipt, name of party purchasing, and address, and all will be notified by mail of the Concert, when held.

Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and address.

BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.

144 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.

o

SERPENTS de PHARAON, OR SERPENTS' EGGS,

THE LATEST SCIENTIFIC MIRACLE.

"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and retail by GLIDDEN & SAWYER, 246 Canal street, New York. 50 cents a Box, free by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

FRANK LESLIE'S Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS

For Great Sale of FRENCH JEWELRY, (Pure Gold), see advertisement of Bosanquet, Giraud & Co., o on inside page.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-430 SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

GROVER & BAKER'S HIGHEST PREMIUM Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch SEWING MACHINES, 495 BROADWAY, N. Y. off

Agents Wanted in all parts of the United States to sell the GROVER & BAKER "People's Edition," in both English and German languages. Address E. B. RUSSELL & CO., Boston, Mass.

FLORENCE LOCK STITCH SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal,

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Stitch-Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
o 505 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 538 — Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, JANUARY 20, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

A Discordant Voice.

GIVE the distinct and, it might be supposed, indisputable proposition that "two and two make four," and which all the world accepts as true, yet there will surely be found some crotchety and preternaturally antagonistic person to deny the accuracy of the statement, and intrude his contradiction of it on occasions when it is proper for him to talk of almost everything except arithmetic. The motive of this kind of unnecessary and pig-headed protest against the tenor of public judgment and the logic of figures is often not a morbid appetite for notoriety, such as we saw exhibited in the late "lime-kiln man," who went with his head bare and unshorn, as his only mode of vindicating his individuality or distinguishing himself from his fellows. Where, as in this country, notoriety is often mistaken for reputation, and as frequently regarded as its available equivalent, it is not surprising that men may make themselves absurd and ridiculous, if only to attract for a moment the public gaze. Some, like the wretched Booth, commit murder to achieve a vile distinction, others indulge in intellectual contortions, and others, probably most, find their distinction in throwing themselves on the railway track of human progress, trusting to the chance of the conductor stopping the train before they shall be cut up under its relentless wheels. They will make the whistle scream, and probably frighten the passengers—either a sufficient satisfaction to their shallow ambition.

The latest instance of this sort of self-immolation, or attempt at it, is afforded by Governor Anderson, of Ohio—a State which has not honored itself in its selection of Governor. To him belongs the unenviable distinction, among all the public men of State or Nation, of raising his voice against the feeling of deep sympathy which pervades the American people for their assaulted and insulted fellow-Republicans on this continent. It was reserved for him to misrepresent the character of the struggling patriots of Mexico, and vilify the cause which they are fighting to uphold under every circumstance of difficulty and suffering. It was left for him, and for him alone, to debase the honor and dignity of the American name, and to become the apologist if not the open supporter of that unholy European combination against free institutions that took new life and assumed a practical form when our national destruction seemed imminent, and which has carried war and rapine, not into Mexico alone, but into Santo Domingo, Peru and Chile. A Governor of Ohio is found traitor enough to his country to give "aid and comfort" to that arch-despot, whose unconcealed and obvious purpose in interfering in Mexico is to set "metes and bounds" around the United States, and repress and destroy the principles which it avows and teaches.

It is true there is little or nothing in the antecedents of Governor Anderson to give much individual weight to his opinions on any subject, and the people of Ohio are far too intelligent and patriotic to be greatly influenced by anything he may say. Fortunately, he can do nothing. It is equally fortunate that he does not in any degree represent the general sentiment of the party which elected him, and which is the dominant one in the country. The Convention which nominated Messrs. Lincoln and Johnson, in cautious phrase, but nevertheless distinctly, declared its adhesion to the Monroe Doctrine. No Convention of either party or of any faction in the country has failed to do the same with more or less of emphasis. Within a week the Republican Convention of New Hampshire declared:

> "That the scheme to subvert our neighboring republic of Mexico, and to plant by foreign bayonets an Austrian despotism instead, having had its origin in undisguised hostility to the United States, it is the urgent duty of our Government to take such decisive measures as will bring about the only abandonment of what, under the circumstances, is nothing less than a standing insult to our power and a disgrace to our Republican institutions."

Not less pointed and expressive of the pervading sentiment of the country are the resolutions adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of Indiana, on December 21, with only one dissenting voice:

> Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring therein, That it is the sense of this General Assembly, in reference to the existing state of things in Mexico, that the United States should scrupulously but firmly assert and maintain, against foreign Governments, at all proper times and places, the separate and independent right of the people, without any foreign interference, influence or control whatever, to continue, or establish and maintain the Government and policy of its own choice, and especially, to assert and maintain, that this question shall not be allowed to be affected by the introduction by foreign Governments of foreign levies, mercenaries, arms, or military provisions into that country; and that every future or further attempt at such influence, control or interference, will be justly regarded as aggressive and injurious to our own policy and interests, and to ourselves.

IRISH EMIGRANTS LEAVING THEIR HOME FOR AMERICA—THE MAIL COACH FROM CAHIRCIVEEN, COUNTY KERRY, IRELAND.

Be it further resolved as the sense of this General Assembly, That without any purpose of forsaking the just and humane obligations of national friendship and comity, as required by public law, and especially when strengthened by treaties of amity, by which the United States has been steadily governed, but as a means of compelling conformity to the same rule by other Governments, it is the duty of the United States, until the obligation of the rule is acknowledged by them, to apply to such other Governments the same construction of neutral and belligerent rights, as to their internal and external enemies, they have applied to us, in derogation of the public law.

Be it further resolved, That the Governor be requested to communicate copies of these Resolutions to the President of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress.

It is painful to find a single man capable of libelling Mexico by the assertion that she "has ruthlessly ruined and oppressed her own people, and has brought disgrace alike upon the sacred name of Republican liberty and of human nature." Conceding all her shortcomings, and allowing nothing for the difficulties with which the church, ignorance, and the corruption entailed by the Spanish colonial system, have surrounded her, yet her Government at no time possessed features so repulsive as that which has re-established slavery, legitimatized murder, and which is a constant violation of the principle that "Governments should exist only by the consent of the governed."

Does Gov. Anderson of Ohio applaud the "institution" of peonage? Does he sanction the barbarous decree that sends every prisoner to summary execution? Does he support an intervention predicated on the assumption of our weakness and intended to cripple our power, destroy our legitimate influence, and break down Republican institutions? If so we are sure of one thing, he misrepresents the sentiments and the spirit alike of Ohio and the nation, and will never be a second time Governor.

OUR PUBLICATIONS.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY—PRICE 10 CENTS, OR $4 A YEAR.

This most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has become the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, forming a perfect pictorial contemporary history of the world. It contains every new and important Invention, Portraits of the Celebrities of all Countries, Sketches of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of the Day, New Buildings, Paintings, Sculptures, &c. Its Literature comprises a continued Story by some distinguished Novelist, Original Tales, Sketches, Criticisms, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year (With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)	20 00
One copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

Each Number contains a variety of Short Stories from our best American Writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Manners and Customs of all Nations, Records of the Olden Times, Heroic Passages in History, Portraits and Biographs of the Self-Made Men of America, Lectures for Young Folks, Gossip for the Ladies, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures, besides new features of great interest and utility constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and the completest Household Journal published. It is also the most elaborately Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBE.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of Volume I. of the CHIMNEY CORNER we present gratuitously a Splendid Premium Plate of great national interest, representing the late lamented President Lincoln receiving the Notabilities of the Nation—this magnificent specimen of Lithographic Art cost over $10,000.

Another New Presentation Plate.

And with No. 33, published on the 2d of January, was presented gratuitously a magnificent copy of Faed's celebrated Painting of "His Only Pair," expressly drawn and engraved by eminent American Artists. This plate, far exceeding anything offered by any European or American journal, is 28 by 34 inches, and admirably adapted for framing. "His Only Pair" cannot be purchased of any picture dealer under $30, and alone is worth several years subscription.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year (With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)	20 00
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine,

With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian painting, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll, with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Baby"—and a doll model in her walking costume. the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the February and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, £3 50; four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the amount.

Subscriptions to be sent to
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and is the great satirical paper of America.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cents a number, or $1 50 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 50.

Illustrated Almanacs for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—60 Eng....50 cents with 4 Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Almanac—70 Eng........50 cents with four Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Comic Almanac—80 Eng........15 cents

A copy of any of the above Illustrated Almanacs sent gratis to every person forwarding a year's subscription to either of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspapers, Chimney Corner or Lady's Magazine.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 20, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

Maximilian.

A RESOLUTION of the Senate called for information in relation to our affairs with Mexico, and has been responded to by the President with some correspondence relative to the so-called Emperor of Mexico's decree of outlawry.

This infamous manifesto, which was promulgated on the 3d of October last, declares that the struggle for supremacy is ended, and after that date that all found in arms are to be instantly executed. Ten days after the issuing of that proclamation, this Austrian adventurer put it in practice by executing Generals Salzar and Artega, Colonels Villa Gomez, Perez Milecuia, Diaz Peracho and Villanos, five lieutenant-colonels, eight commandants, and several officers of lower rank, all of whom had been surprised and captured. These officers were not rebels, deserters or spies, but they were regular soldiers of the Mexican Republic, a recognised Government, and had been engaged in warfare against the usurper from the first. They were not accused of any act against the usages of war, nor were they tried and condemned according to these usages, but were summarily murdered because they were endeavoring to free their country from the grasp of a tyrant and a despot.

We defy the annals of civilised warfare to show another such case. These soldiers surrendered as prisoners of war. Had they supposed that such was to be their fate, it is only reasonable to believe that they would have chosen to die with arms in their hands, and gone into the next world with the satisfaction that they had carried with them a few score of their cowardly assassins. That this policy would have been carried out farther is without doubt, had not the Liberals put a stop to it by retaliation, and by administering his own medicine to this maker of assassins frightened him from his bloody work.

It is only a natural supposition that our Government could not pass such a fearful case as this over without notice, and our Minister at Paris was instructed to ask why "proceedings, which are so repugnant to the sentiments of modern civilization, and the instincts of humanity" were allowed by a Government professing Christianity?

To this pointed question came an answer fraught with the highest importance. It came from M. Drouyn de l'Huys:

> "Why," he said, "do you not go to President Juarez? We are not the Government of Mexico, and you do us too much honor to trust to us as such. We had to go Mexico with an army to secure certain important interests, but we are not responsible for Maximilian or his Government. He is accountable to you as to any other Government if he violates its rights, and you have the same remedies there that we had."

What do we understand from this, but that Napoleon surrenders Maximilian into his own hands and no longer endorses his policy! If this be really so, why do we hesitate? We have withheld our hands heretofore, because we were unwilling to break off our amicable relations with France. We have no longer this to stay us. Why, then, do we stand supine, and see the murderous policy of this usurper carried out? Have we a right to consider ourselves Christians, while we suffer such crimes to be perpetrated almost on our own soil?

We hope and trust that now, when it is understood who is accountable for the imperial rule in Mexico, that our Government will see fit to protest, in the strongest possible terms, against any further acts of barbarity in our sister Republic of Mexico.

A COPYRIGHT case of great importance to American authors has recently been decided, on appeal, in the English courts. The facts are these: A Miss Maria Cummins, a native and subject of the United States, is authoress of a novel entitled Haunted Hearts. She sold this work to Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., of London, who published it in that city, Miss Cummins being at that time resident in Montreal, Canada. Messrs. Low & Co. caused two entries as to copyright to be made in Stationers' Hall, one of the proprietorship of Miss Cummins, and the other of her assignment of the same to them.

Messrs. Routledge undertook to republish the work, in contempt of the copyright thus obtained, whereupon a suit was entered against them by Messrs. Low & Co., in the Court of Chancery. Messrs. Routledge insisted, on their part, that they had the right to reproduce the book, because it was "written by an alien, a native of the United States, between which country and Great Britain no law of copyright exists." The court granted an injunction against the Messrs. Routledge, holding that Miss Cummins, under the circumstances, did acquire a valid British copyright, which she was at liberty to dispose of in her discretion. The Vice-Chancellor, in rendering the decision, said:

> "If an author, residing in this country, and first publishing here, acquires a copyright, he acquires it over the whole of the British dominions, and will be protected in Canada just as much as in England; and so, if an alien, residing here, chooses to publish in Canada, he would acquire a copyright there as well as over all the British dominions, recognised and protected everywhere. Again, if a foreigner comes into Canada, or any other part of the British possessions, and publishes there, surely, upon the same principle, he would acquire a copyright, not confined to Canada, but extending over and protected throughout the British dominions. Then, if the author (and this is the last step), residing in Canada, thinks it more expedient, instead of publishing his work there, to send it over to England to be published here, is it possible to say that he has thereby not acquired copyright, although he would have acquired it if he had published it in Canada? The place of first publication, provided it be within the British dominions, is made immaterial by the Copyright Amendment Act, 1842, which operates over all the colonies and possessions of the crown; and the place of residence of the alien is immaterial, provided it be within the British dominions."

REV. DR. BELLOWS, President of the Sanitary Commission, tells us that the ratio of native-born soldiers in the late Union army was 80 per cent. of the whole. On the other hand, of the whole number of disabled soldiers asking aid or asylum, 90 per cent. are of foreign birth.

THE Report of the Freedmen's Commission shows that the number of freedmen now receiving rations in all the late slave States is 45,035. It is estimated that the number will be raised to 100-000 during the winter. This, in proportion to the total negro population, is in not a greater number than we find of persons requiring to be supported by charity among the whites of the North.

THE number of emigrants who landed at Castle Garden during the year 1865 was 195,000 against 182,916 in 1864—an increase of 12,659. Of these Ireland sent 70,338; Germany 82,454; and England 27,144. This is a wholesome exhibit, especially in the increase of German emigrants.

A NEW feature in the art-world will now be the annual exhibitions of the Sketch Club of Philadelphia. They have just concluded a successful season in that city, and will open at the Derby Gallery, 625 Broadway, about the middle of January. The capital feature of the enterprise is that the statues, drawings and paintings are all native, the selection being made from the various studios of our own country. This limit ought to be broad enough, considering the various famous ateliers between Chicago and Baltimore. The Club is a body of some forty artists, each and all determined to give as much éclat as possible to their scheme, and willing to work hard for success.

THE total losses by fire the past year in the United States amounted to over $43,000,000, against about $28,500,000 the previous year. The introduction of steam engines in the fire departments of the country does not, from this exhibit, present a very flattering record.

THE number of railroad accidents in this country during the past year was 183, against 140 the year previous. The fatality, however, was in favor of 1865, the number of lives lost during that year being 335, against 404 in 1864. We here find some reason for congratulating the public. Although the number of accidents the past year was above that of the previous year, it seems that the fatality was considerably less.

THERE is nothing, perhaps, in the career of the American newspapers equal to the success of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER. The illustrated papers devoted to the news of the day, chronicling with the fidelity of the daguerreotype events as they occur, have, where they adhere faithfully to accuracy, a value of their own. But families needed a weekly visitor to amuse and instruct, and instruction now-a-days implies faithful illustration. Hence the success of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER. To such as have not seen it we may add that subscribers receive a little gallery of pictures as premiums. First—The Notabilities of the Nation presented at President Lincoln's Reception. Second—His Only Pair; from a famous painting, by Faed. Third—A National Picture, in active preparation.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE believe that the English have the reputation of being the most apathetic people, and the Germans the most phlegmatic; but our belief is, that the Americans combine both these eminent qualities, and require more poking—good word that—and more coaxing to really awake, than any nation that has ever existed since the world began.

We start on this homily, from the idea that besets us, that the great world of New York, which is the real "hub of the universe"—the universe being supposed, as it really is, to be the great American people—takes much to awaken it. They enter upon the season of gaiety, the cold season, and pass over three months, in the most supine manner, until their legendary customs instruct that they should keep the Christmas and New-Year holidays. They keep them, and the result is the same as the drinking of a glass of wine to the inflammable man; it starts him on the desire, and away he goes, without any calculation where he will bring up.

Thus it is with New York and her amusements. Nothing is done until after New-Year's. Why? Because it takes the holidays to awaken the people, to give them that glass of wine necessary to drive away the lethargy toward relaxation.

Now that these said holidays are well over the town is alive, and nothing is heard of but balls, hops, mask parties, and the invincible list of pleasant dissipations consequent on the awakening. The leading balls of the season are coming on. The Americus Club—not a new organization, but a new ball-giving arrangement—have had theirs, and made a success in their own set. The 71st Regiment—a militia regiment that has really smelt powder in the service—has also given one at the Academy of Music, which attracted its thousands; and now comes the crowd of brilliant ones: First the Light Guard, on the 25th; then the Fire Department; then the 7th Regiment; then during February, the great German balls, the Arion and the Liedercrantz, which are the balls of the season. After which the Purim, in which Hebrew beauty and Hebrew wealth are displayed to the best advantage; and then, this reaching to about the 1st of March, the season is supposed to be ended, and New York begins to gather her skirts and look around for ruralities or the watering-places.

But while these winter mental and physical relaxations are in occurrence it is our duty to enjoy them. If we are companionable people, let us, while in Rome, do as the Romans do, and see the entire affairs through. Not that we say it is everybody's duty to go to all the balls of the season, but a temperate enjoyment of all these matters is as essential to the well being of one who lives in New York as it is to take his breakfast.

To take up the lesser things of New York, for what can be greater than their amusements—we will discuss a letter just received from a friend, who is of the farmer persuasion, and keeps a large farm out on Long Island. He is not obliged to make a living out of his farm, and for that reason is able to look around on his neighbors and see what they are doing. He writes this:

> "You New Yorkers complain of the high price of your market matter. Why! it is all your fault. You give up your markets to middlemen and speculators. Fifteen or twenty years ago Washington and Fulton markets offered a chance for countrymen and farmers to come in and sell their produce, whether it be large or small; but now by your laws you shut them out from this, and give to these middlemen and speculators every chance there is in the markets. You have made a law that after a certain hour in the morning none but a person holding a stand or a licence can sell anything, and the result is that countrymen coming in, if they do not sell out very early to the people, are obliged to sell to these men at whatever price they may offer. Your system with regard to stands in the markets is all wrong. If you expect to throw open the markets to competition, and so get your food cheap, you must so place it that a countryman coming in with ever so little to sell may hire a stand if it is only for an hour. Another point is, that your markets must be so situated that they are very accessible both by railroad and by water. The small farmer must have it so that he can reach the market and the purchaser with the smallest exertion and expense. When you do this you are putting all people on a level, and not compelling one person who is supplying you with the necessities of life to hire his place of sale at a high rate, while another gets his at a mere nothing."

We think our friend is right, and having given him a free expression of opinion, we think the matter is covered, and leave it to the public.

Speaking of letters puts us in mind of one other we have seen, within a day or two, which treats on lectures. It says that New York lectures all creation, but does not listen to lectures herself; or, in other words, that she sends out people to deliver lectures in every town and city in this country, who are eminently successful, but at the same time does not encourage them to discourse in her midst.

We think this is true. New York men do penetrate to every corner of the earth, not only in lecturing, but in every other thing where intellect can be brought to bear. New York is, without doubt, the intellectual city of this continent, and will, as a consequence, dictate to all adjoining places, whether it be lecturing or anything else. New York is blasé in mental matters. She bears patiently, never hisses a play or makes a motion on small annoyances, but when anything really good comes along, or anything really annoying touches her—look out!

The theatrical event of the week has been the reception of Mr. Booth, as Hamlet, at the Winter Garden. We will venture to say that never before has such a reception been given to any actor as was given to Edwin Booth, on the evening of the 3d inst., and theatre-goers may assure themselves that many years will elapse before they will have a chance of witnessing again such a scene.

For several days before his opening night every seat in the house had been sold, and only a few standing places were to be had. Within a few minutes after the opening the doors the house was crammed to the utmost capacity, and hundreds were turned away. Without doubt many persons imagined there would be some attempt at a disturbance, but upon what promises they built such an idea we are at a loss to understand. The majority of the audience thought differently, and gave evidence of it by bringing ladies. The authorities professed to believe something of the kind, by having present a large police-force, both in uniform and officer's dress, but from first to last there was no occasion for the services of even one of the gentlemen. As for the audience, there was the New York Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, who seemed to occupy nearly their brother by attending as a body.

On the appearance of Mr. Booth on the 3d scene, a cheer went up from the house as from one voice, and a scene of enthusiasm broke forth unprecedented. The gentlemen waved their hats and the ladies their handkerchiefs. Many applauding sentences that came were: Cheer upon cheer was called for, and given. Groans for a certain character which had attacked Mr. Booth were given with a will, and it was not until about ten minutes had elapsed that silence could be obtained to proceed with the play. That Mr. Booth was cordially affected by this demonstration showed plainly. He appeared somewhat visible in the tone of his voice and his manner, but in a short time he regained his emotion and progressed in a most masterly style. At the end of each act he was called before the curtain, and every effort was made to elicit a speech from him, but with good taste he declined.

We will not enter into any analysis of the feeling that has led to this unusual welcoming of a great actor back to the stage, but simply record it as part and parcel of history.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Petersburg, Va., Express says: "A venerable freedman passing through Bank street at an early hour on the morning, just in front of the writer of this, planted his foot on a $5 bill, and there held it. Looking to stoop and pick it up, he concluded it should see him and claim it. We saw the adroit trick, but not desiring to be made a fool of for a few months, passed the old darkey unmolested. Hour after hour elapsed before the unfortunate freedman saw daylight as a rock, with the enormous brogan entirely covering the $5 note, and he was no nearer obtaining the surging crowd so abate as to afford him an opportunity to make his prize without a contest with some disputant. Finally darkness came, to the great relief of the sable gentleman, and he quietly removed his foot from the lovely place and exalted it to a position in the folds of his ample pocket."

—Some miners in Nevada county, California, were recently working a quartz vein, when they struck a cave on their level. The opening has been found on the surface that on found by the miners. Close to the edge of this subterranean vault was found a cannon ball inclosed in solid quartz, as if it had grown with the quartz, and formed in it beneath the cavity's surface. The ball was perfect in shape, and when the dirt was taken off the surface it was found as if it had just come from the mould.

—The Washington Star says that a number of young men who have recently returned from service in the rebel army are breaking the faith and oath of their allegiance that has been displayed towards them, by going into the city of Washington, Georgetown and Alexandria, and openly shouting for Jeff Davis, and abusing every negro they meet.

—The National Banknote Co. during this year has furnished Government with four hundred million postage stamps, which, if consecutively placed, would reach one to ninety cents each. During the month of March last, 109,500,000 stamps were delivered by the Government, expressing in value $3,307,196.

—Arrangements are still very much in the possession of the Government, but it is said the wife of Gen. Thomas R. Lee has recently written to a friend that she intends to return these, even if she is obliged to live in the black quarters. This is indicative of the strength of her determination to reassert what she considers to be the rights of herself and husband to this historic property. But among the other obstacles she will probably encounter is the fact that 12,000 Union soldiers have been buried upon its soil.

—The Richmond Examiner says that "the most cursory perusal of the published proceedings of the Virginia Legislature cannot fail to impress the reader with the unprecedented number of petitions that are for incorporation which that body has been called upon to consider. Applications from companies requesting for the construction of lines of telegraphic communication, for purposes of manufacturing, for coal digging, for mining, for iron smelting, for the manufacture of gas, and the discovery of coal, crowd upon the eye in motley and bewildering array."

—A lady in Norfolk, Va., last week left her infant in bed, in the absence of the nurse girl, and went downstairs to attend to her household duties. In a short time her attention was attracted by a noise, something like the tread of a cat, upon the stairs leading to the room where the baby lay sleeping. On the door immediately ran upstairs, and, upon entering the bedchamber, found all the bed-clothes thrown together, the child, which was crying bitterly, its left hand was found to be torn and bleeding freely. This is the second the child has been attacked by rats, with which the premises abound.

—There is a lad living in Augusta, Georgia, who has seven grandmothers living, one of whom, in 1795, presented to General George Washington a basket of flowers, she being then a young lady.

—The phrase "I run" in billiards ever made in Western New York, if not in the world, was performed by George M. Sharpe, at Lyons, one day last week, who, in playing a game, "jawed" the two "reds," and made 2,276 points.

—Albany, with a population of 70,000, has a police force of 93 men, at an expense of $74,000 annually, and yet the Albanians complain of the inefficiency of the force. They want more men and less expense.

—It is estimated that 10,000 barrels of apples are held by Boston speculators.

—It is reported that an agent of the French Government of Mexico has arrived in this city, has hired and purchased $60,000 worth of arms, which were shipped to Vera Cruz on the Havana.

—There will be, early next year, now fewer than seven houses in this city, to wit: Wallack's, New York; Winter Garden's, Niblo's, Wood's, Metropolitan, French's, Fourteenth street, Old Bowery, New Bowery, and the German. All these are, of course, Shakspeare; the Opera House, the three minstrel halls—Christy's, Bryant's and Sanford's—and the numerous concert halls, lascivious places of amusement.

—The exports of the number of patents issued for the year 1865 shows the aggregate to be 6,000, an increase of 1,000 over the number of any previous year.

Foreign.—Ex-Emperor Soulouque, Solomon and suite were brought to their passports from Jamaica, have obtained the consent of the Governor of Curacoa to reside there, and have chartered a vessel for the passage. They had no intention to leave St. Thomas but it is said the surveillance of the police was not acceptable.

—The oyster merchants of Paris have raised the price of this bivalve to such an extravagant height that Parisians have determined to eat none. As the year live without eating oysters, while the oyster merchants cannot live without selling them, it is likely this strike will bring prices down.

—The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz lately gave a ball at which she wore the jewelry of her great-great-grandmother, a German princess, who died over a hundred and fifty years ago.

—A young lady of twenty-two years is now an inmate of a lunatic asylum in near Prague. Last autumn she won thirty or forty thousand thalers at Baden-Baden, and her success turned her head. She always imagined herself at the roulette table.

—Kelly, the champion sculler of the Thames, has deposited £250 with the editor of the Sportsman to make matches with Hamill, the American champion. Should Kelly's offer be accepted, Hamill will give £200 for expenses. Kelly proposes to row five miles straight away from Putney, and, turning, and a half to a stake boat, and two miles and a half on return on the following day, for £250 aside. The stakes are to be given, £50 for race for £200; the races to take place over the English championship course, on the Thames, between Putney and Barker's rails.

—Brigands are much more rife in Persia, with its hardly heavily ironed, lately murdered a rural-commune a beautiful golden, with delicate mouldings of fruit and flowers, etc.

—Brigands in Servia lately duped one of their captives out of £200, by sending him a letter in a lemon for ransome.

—"Head Centre" Stephens is said not to be in Paris at all, now—but in Scotland. It is reported that he has left Edinburgh, somewhere along the banks of the Clyde, and that one of her Majesty's cruisers was looking for him.

—Nothing keeps this year in Europe; apples, pears, grapes, chestnuts, walnuts, potatoes, etc., rot as soon as they are put in the storehouse.

—The Queen of England has a special private fortune of £300,000, left to her by the late Mr. Prince Albert.

—It is stated that £900 (84,000) in Bank of England notes were found sewed up in the vest of Tom Sayers, the pugilist, after his death.

—The Emperor of China, not content with a palace as large as some towns, inside Pekin itself, and another vast palace and domain at a few miles distance, has a park, surrounded by a wall, which extends 40 miles, close to the city.

—The Gaelic Society, of Inverness, Caledonia, of London, who, in his Lives of the Patriarchs, says that, before the Deluge, there were seven a dead human being, or he learned anything about seven days, and that the seventh day was that of the vitality, of which, again, he can have perceived nothing, but which, as he is told, exists only mat slaughter.

—A Texas woman in Ladywood, England, named Yeteman, recently gave birth to a child and placed it on the bed with its mother. A neighbor, a Mrs. Gilbert, who happened to go into the house, found a large fire in the kitchen grate, and on looking out of it the naked body of the child. There was a strong smell of burning flesh, and the child was entirely burnt off the body. Fire he found that the head and neck was quite burned away. He carried the remains of the child into the front yard and covered them with a bag. The mother of the child is in custody, and has acknowledged to having placed the child on the fire.

SYNOPSIS OF OPERATIONS IN CASTLE GARDEN.

History of the Immigration Question—Its Origin and Progress—It is Dealt in Its Incipiency to contend with—Its present Condition, and a Brief Sketch of Castle Garden.

BY an act of the Legislature of 1847, the Commission of Emigration, on the 5th of May of that year, became operative in the relief and for the protection of alien emigrants arriving at this port. By this enactment, they were left to the chances of general benevolence, and to the care of local ordinances. A few noble-minded and public-spirited citizens formed themselves into a band, having as their leader Mr. Thurston Reed, who, without pecuniary or remunerable obstacles, nevertheless triumphed in his philanthropic undertaking. Mr. Weed ably portrayed in the following extract from his report, the difficulties, impressions, temptations and open daring villanies to which the newly-arrived emigrant was constantly exposed, they having been the "helpless prey of rapacious emigrant-shippers—runners,' boarding-housekeepers, and their associates." The latter class were to be encountered frequently of all the money they possessed and were left in a state of utter destitution.

At the beginning, Mr. Weed withstood the combined hostility of the "sculpers" (as they were then designated); he was threatened with personal violence, and engaged with suits for damages on indictments of libel. The movement was backed by the influence of other leading men, in conjunction with that of the Archbishop Hughes, Andrew Carrigan, Thomas McElrath, John F. Devlin, and a few others, who saw the necessity of aiding in his memorable contest with the vested rights of iniquity and cruel deception practiced on the inoffensive, ignorant emigrant.

Under a new commission many then existing irregularities and abuses were corrected, and in 1855 the present commodious and splendid structure, with its granite chimney rendered complete its operations by the uniform system of government and control. The new system worked exceedingly well, and with but few unofficial results. The history of great changes in the character of our population, and the causes of those changes nations may be traced through every stage—commercial that of the immense amelioration of the sanitary treatment and condition of emigrants. Since the latter date has been effected within the last few years, and was caused by wise legislation here and in Europe, and also, in no small degree, by the humanizing and civilizing effect of the navigation interest itself.

The previous years of unexampled, misery, disease and deaths, formerly so frequent among the humbler class of emigrants on their passage, or immediately on their landing, is now of rare occurrence, and the excellent of the services to the cause of humanity which have so highly distinguished the port.

The steadily increasing flow of immigration hither from 1847 to 1854, reaching in the latter year to 390,000, was one of the most extraordinary events of life. Many of it, by a gigantic, wholesale, postage-free, all-pervading system of deception practiced on the inoffensive, ignorant emigrant.

Under a new commission many then existing irregularities and abuses were corrected, and in 1855 the present commodious and splendid structure, with its granite chimney rendered complete its operations by the uniform system of government and control. The new system worked exceedingly well, and with but few unofficial results. The history of great changes in the character of our population, and the causes of those changes nations may be traced through every stage—commercial that of the immense amelioration of the sanitary treatment and condition of emigrants. Since the latter date has been effected within the last few years, and was caused by wise legislation here and in Europe, and also, in no small degree, by the humanizing and civilizing effect of the navigation interest itself.

The previous years of unexampled, misery, disease and deaths, formerly so frequent among the humbler class of emigrants on their passage, or immediately on their landing, is now of rare occurrence, and the excellent of the services to the cause of humanity which have so highly distinguished the port.

The steadily increasing flow of immigration hither from 1847 to 1854, reaching in the latter year to 390,000, was one of the most extraordinary events of life. Many of it, by a gigantic, wholesale, postage-free, all-pervading system of deception practiced on the inoffensive, ignorant emigrant.

Emigrant outfitters were found in daily at Castle Garden, the large majority of whom are in the profession, and, having about them the appearance of. Every possible care is taken of those who voluntarily place themselves under the guardian protection of the agents of the Commissioners. Advice and information are cheerfully and freely given, and they are guarded against contaminating influences from without, and a general hint is thrown out to them to improve their time, and procure employment immediately; for which purpose an office is kept within the Garden to supply situations to all who are industriously inclined and disposed to accept work at once. No difficulty has been experienced in this respect. The Garden is kept clean, and is supplied with every possible available comfort and convenience for the emigrants, and they are provided therein with a shelter at least, if not with the indulgences of a home and its luxuries. A doctor, possessed of unexceptionable talent and ability, is also stationed daily for the purpose of administering medical comforts and other necessary medical dispensations when applicants appeal to him for courtesy aid.

A ticket office, representing the New York Central and New York and Erie and Pennsylvania Railroads, is also provided, at the request of which the emigrant can purchase tickets to their destinations; by this, imposition on them is rendered impossible. Their individual names and destinations are recorded in books prepared for that department of the service, and a line of communication to and from their friends, and relatives, is maintained with the greatest possible regularity and accuracy; and for this purpose correspondents, speaking the various languages, are attached to the Garden, whose duty is to write letters for the emigrants, and to read any letters or communications received for their guidance and benefit.

Those who are in indigent circumstances are supplied, while they remain in the Garden, with suitable provisions to sustain them from hunger, while waiting for the send to their friends. These are also similarly provided in the varied apartments, so that the temperature is moderated as the condition of the weather demands. The sexes are separated, and thus the exterior appearance of the premises sufficiently demonstrates the fact. The department is under the office of the under him, who are in regular daily attendance to their respective duties, conducts and manages the responsible duties entrusted to them with precision and orderly satisfaction.

The remarkable on landing are registered in families first, then the female adult portion are admitted, and last the males; this has been found a convenient precaution, so as to collect them in groups of families and acquaintances. They have the option of remaining in the Garden temporarily, or going out to boarding-houses as their own tastes may dictate. The gold is exchanged for them by the cashier at the exact worth, guided by the quotations of the day, and the money deposited for the purpose of securing the emigrants from the imposition and coinery of swindlers in the city. They are often contracted for by agents from the Garden, and in such instance they are informed that they are still under the guardianship of the Commissioners, who will see through their agents, hear and investigate all complaints made by them, and adjust their grievances between them, particularly for the recovery of their wages, when judiciously and faithfully earned; so that no employer can take the least advantage of the ignorance of the emigrant whom he may employ, by withholding the fruit of his or her labor. The arrivals of emigrants at the depot from January to the present date are stated last year. The following figures speak for themselves:

1847	129,063
1848	189,119
1849	220,603
1850	213,789
1851	289,601
1852	300,999
1853	284,945
1854	319,223
1855	138,333
1856	142,342
1857	153,773
1858	78,069
1859	70,932
1860	105,162
1861	65,529
1862	91,918
1863	176,884
1864	193,198
Number of arrivals to Jan. 1, '65,	3,153,414
" since to Dec. 8, '65,	188,815
Total " to Dec. 8, '65.	3,342,229

An efficient staff of police is kept within and without the Garden, to prevent any improper persons to check any attempt at impropriety; thus it will be seen that no care or trouble is wanting to render the Garden a boon to the emigrant and a credit to the Commissioners, whose arduous aim is to further their interests.

The following are the list of Commissioners of Emigration: Gulian C. Verplanck, Syme Coutes, A. A. Low, Wilson G. Hunt, Elijah F. Purdy, John P. Cumming, and the Mayor, Recorder, City Judges, Societies, and the Mayors of New York and Brooklyn. Bernard Casey is the Superintendent of the Castle Garden, and Executive Officer of the Department.

STATISTICS OF SUICIDE.

A BOOK has recently been published in Paris by a certain M. Boisment, which sets forth that over 10,000 persons have committed suicide in France since the beginning of the present century. The antecedents of the whole of the victims were not, in all cases obtained, but Dr. Boisemont has classified all those concerning which information could be obtained, and has arrived at a table showing the causes which appear to be ascribed to hereditary predisposition or were spontaneous. Men are more influenced by climate, and how they were distributed in regard to age and sex. In France, at large, it appears most suicides were committed between the ages of 30 and 40, but in Paris between 20 and 30. Two children did "the rash act" under 9 and one under 7 years of age. In the United States it is stated that the hereditary tendency towards "going ahead" manifests itself in a similar precocity in the matter of self-destruction. The "rash act" is not much truth in the popular impression that length of years is accompanied by a greater clinging to life. The proportion of suicides in Europe, on the contrary, that the proportion of suicides between the years of 70 and 80 is nearly double that between 30 and 40, while the statistical researches of M. Etoc-Demazy would even make it appear that they are actually more numerous in the latter than in the former decade of life. Another widely-spread popular fallacy is that suicides are more frequent in the gloomy months of the year. Nothing can be further from the truth. The returns of figures has made it incontestably clear that such cases are most frequent in the months of November, December, and most numerous in May, June and July. The numbers in our author's list are, for the months first mentioned, 208 and 1,001, 1,000 and 1,001, 1,000 and 1,001 respectively. Nor is it the case that the dark and silent hours of the night are more favorable than the daytime for deeds of this sinister description, since Dr. Boisemont's indefatigable analyses makes it appear that the daily maximum of self-murder occurs about noon, the minimum in the double hours of dawn and twilight. Throwing in the doubtful hours of dawn and twilight, the period between 8 o'clock in the morning and 8 o'clock in the evening the number falls to 17. There is a curious drop from 116 to 48 between the hours of ten and eleven in the morning, and as sudden and unexplained a rebound to 123 at noon. Can it be that the usual Parisian breakfast hour has anything to do with this puzzling intermission of the series? Observations made upon the influence of the moon have contradictory results; but as regards the distribution and configuration of soils, it is the conclusion that the low plains of the tertiary formation are those which supply the most numerous cases of self-murder, the primitive granitic or mountainous districts forming more generally the lowest in the list.

Have celibacy, marriage, widowhood, any influence on the act of self-destruction? In the 4,594 instances analyzed by Dr. Boisemont there were 1,501 single men, and 576 single women, 1,129 married men, and 513 married women, 289 widowers, and 311 widows, 211 remain to be understood. It appears that, in the single life the cases of vows are to those of men in the proportion of 1 to 2.6, in that of widow, 1 to 2.9; in widowhood, as 1 to 1.22. The comparison of the totals of single and married, the figures of which are nearly equal, especially if the list of 211 widowers and widows is added to the latter, would seem to indicate an influence highly favorable to the married state. These statistics are, however, modified by the great bodies of troops upon the various modes and devices by which the victims of life-weariness have sought to destroy it. It has carried their objective effects, and which show that this military temperament, no less than the temperament of murder, admits a treatment of its own as a branch of the fine arts. The following table exhibits the various modes of suicide in France between the years 1827–60:

1. Strangulation, or hanging,	14,808	12,132
2. Drowning,	7,664	4,177
3. Fire arms,	4,930	4,337
4. Poisoning by carbon,	1,734	1,907
5. Cutting instruments,	1,522	1,372
6. Precipitation from heights,	1,299	813
7. Poison,	734	474
8. Various,	282	84
	38,936	28,916

DICKENS'S NOTION OF GRAND-FATHERS.

"I often wish that Shakespeare had not put that expression into the mouth of Jacques.

Jacques has a melancholy view of life. He had not been a misanthrope, a baby might have presented itself to him as the first of human beings. He is the nurse's arms, and not as mulling and puking. In like manner he might have drawn a pleasant picture of a green and happy old age, sitting in the sun, very much on leanness, and slippers, and drunken shanks. The good time, such as Jacques describes it, is the middle age with a certain rule of life; but, for my part, I have met with very many tasteful exceptions, and I love to meet them.

It has been my good fortune to know many old men, who, after their youth and strife of middle age, in original innocence and simplicity of their earliest childhood. Their manners are gentle, their conversation quaint in their easychairs, their gums as innocent of teeth, and their laugh as free from care as when they sat in their mother's laps—sitting there, bolding the Lord's good time patiently and blandly among their wives and daughters, and grandsons and grandchildren, hovered about them, and played with them, and smoothed their pillows, and spoke to them in those sing-song words which are well adapted to the old man as to the child.

There is a purifying influence in such old age which we all recognize. We may know that the old man has had a wicked life, but when he comes upon him, wrinkled and lying his brow, blanching his head, and his face with the earth, it is as if he had been redeemed and purified by time. I can understand the feeling which prompted the Egyptians and so earnestly for length of days; man nature knows that the passionate years are not those of the heart to be set in store by, and cannot believe that a man can have passed over like a cloud, leaving nothing of his life but its sins, and not some sweetness and virtue to be gathered from the whole. Let a man's life be as it will, the world can be the better for it as a garden between the two, and can look calmly upon both.

I think it must be pleasant to sit upon the last shore and wait for the boat, with a quiet mind and a cheerful countenance; pleasant to hear the plash of the oars and the cheerful voices of the rowers, and to feel at ease as you sway to that golden hand where youth is to receive you. Then, indeed, the old man is a child again. Everywhere than in this strain, for I have never known an old person who was not willing to speak of his life, who was not wear an aspect of innocence. Age is not altogether sad and sorrowful. While it mourns for, it also expunges the traces of evil passions. The sins that count against us are those of the heart, of hate and anger; the wrinkles that score the brow are strokes of the hand of time, but the last touch is that of love. The second that passion has written there so boldly. I can recall many instances of old men who have devoted their money to the soundness of the theory which I have just broached touching the innocence and purifying influence of age. I remember one, a little, feeble, cheery, merry-hearted old bachelor, who had lived a roistering life in his younger days. He had been passionate, imperious, violent, a boisterous companion, and a hard master to his clerks and his children. When he became an old grandfather, he was transformed into the most delightful, affectionate, amiable. His own little grandchildren could rule him, and would do so to the last day of his life.

"Do you remember, grandfather, one of them would say, "when you used to beat us? Why did you do so cruel with the horsewhip?"

"Yes, my dear," he would answer, "I hope I never did that."

"Oh, but you did, grandfather; and grandmother says you used to get drunk and break the chimney ornaments."

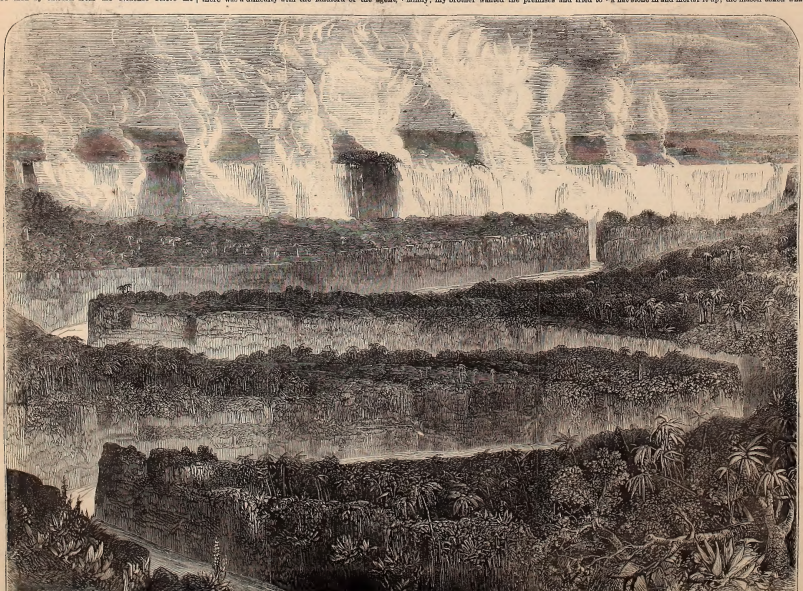
"Oh fie, fie! No, my dear," says the old man, "it must have been some one else. I never behaved so badly."

And granny strokes in and affirms that he did the deed, completely smashing two china shepherdesses that had been in the family for a century. The recollection leads the old man into a fit of laughter so hearty and good-humored, that the grandchildren are shocked that they have been capable of the violent conduct imputed to him. I never saw but one instance where it himself now, when age has cast the devil out of him.

A REGIMENT OF MONKEYS.

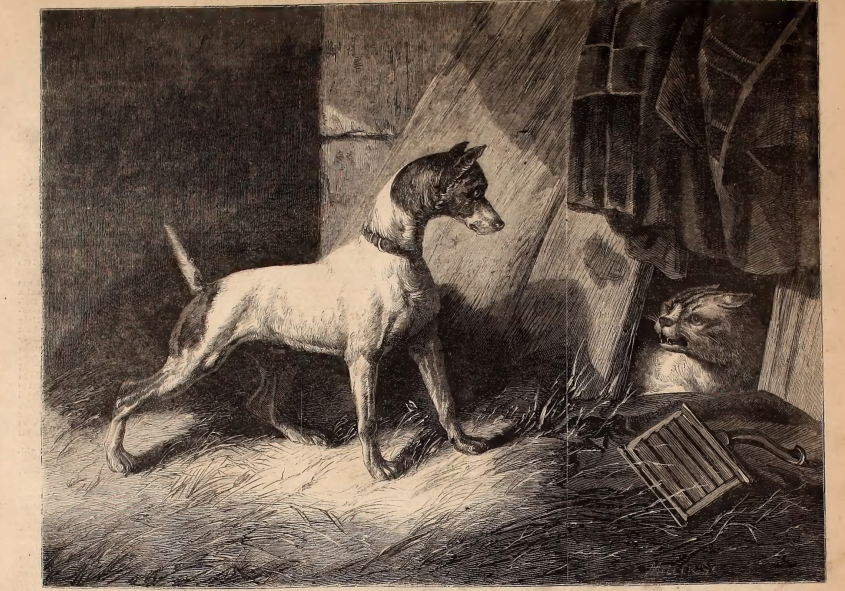
About two miles from the bungalow to which we were proceeding, we overtook a regiment of large monkeys. I should say there were as many as four hundred, and each carried a stick of some kind in the shape. They moved along in ranks or companies, just, in short, as though they were imitating a wing of a regiment of infantry. At the head of the column was an old and very powerful monkey, who was no doubt the chief. It was a very old and very large monkey, and interested in the movements of the creatures. There could be no question but that they had been foraging for some pleasure on hand, and the fact of each carrying a stick in the same way showed that they had all set out on which they were bent. Their destination was the bungalow. Here they had evidently made up their minds to drive a monkey fed by a number of Brahmins who were living in the bungalow, and to take possession of their premises. They (the monkey regiment) would not get out of the way for our approach, but came themselves in any way; and my friend was afraid to drive through them lest he should run over some. We were assailed they are most ferocious brutes, and armed with sticks. If we were to interfere, they could have annihilated us with the greatest ease. There was no help for us, therefore, but to let the mass proceed at a walk in the rear of the tribe, the members of which, now that we were nearing Deobund, began to chatter frightfully. Just before we came to the bungalow, they left the road and took the direction of the temple. Had would we have followed them, but to do so in the buggy would have been impossible, for they crossed over quite very rough ground and two ditches. My friend therefore proceeded on to the bungalow, and thought that they might observe of their actions. Meanwhile we moved off to the bungalow.

SCENES FROM THE PORTFOLIO OF A RECENT TRAVELLER.—GANG OF CAPTIVES MET AT MBAMES ON THEIR WAY TO TETTE, AFRICA.



A MURDER, OUT OF THE PALE OF LAW.

WE give a series of illustrations showing one of those occurrences of a great city like New York, that, while they horrify every one, are events of an hour, and being almost out of legal jurisdiction, are lost in the whirl of incidents. We cannot give the matter better than by extracts from the evidence before the Coroner. The affair occurred at No. 597 Grand street, and the victims were Mrs. McGaghay, an aged woman, and her grandson, Francis McGaghay, who were found smothered to death in their own room.



Maria Congrove, of No. 589 Grand street, said—To-wards 2 P. M. on Sunday last I entered the apartments of the McGaghays and found the old lady and her grandson dead; I did not notice any peculiar smell in the room, but after being in it some time I felt an unpleasant sensation in the throat; I have heard deceased say there was a difficulty with the landlord on the agreement, and that they wished to effect her removal from the premises.

John H. Hunter, of No. 310 Livingston street, Brooklyn, testified—I have been agent for the premises, No. 597 Grand street, for some seven or eight years; my mother owns the premises, and my brother, Edwin B. Hunter, persuaded her to make him the agent for the house; I did not object, so he took charge of the premises; when making improvements and enlarging the shops of Bourne & Cauley, tinners, my brother had to encroach upon the premises occupied by the McGaghay family; my brother wanted the premises and tried to get the McGaghays out; to accomplish that object, a dispossess warrant was taken out, but I think not served upon them; the McGaghays were always acceptable tenants.

Rosina Roach, a child 12 years of age, testified—I reside with my parents on the third floor of No. 597 Grand street; Thursday morning at about 9 o'clock, Mr. Edwin B. Hunter and a mason who works for him came up to our room (over the McGaghay room); Mr. Hunter made a place with a pencil on the floor that comes up from down stairs; he told the mason to cut through and put a flat stone in and mortar it up; the mason asked what ut was her; Hunter told him to go on and do his work, that it was none of his business; the noises went down stairs and brought up the skeletal stools here shown, put it in the wall and mortared up the break; I swept away the dirt; the next day Mr. Francis McGaghey came to my room and asked permission to come in and see if he could find out what was the matter with the flue; I would not let him in, but went down stairs and asked Mr. Hunter if I should; he told me not to let anybody in the room, and so I refused Mr. McGaghey admission; an old man living on the top floor told that Mr. E. B. Hunter told him that, not being able to get the McGaghays out, he was going to smoke them out.

BIRDSEYE VIEW OF THE GREAT CATARACTS OF THE ZAMBESI, OR VICTORIA FALLS, AFRICA, AND OF THE ZIGZAG CHASM BELOW THE FALLS BY WHICH THE RIVER ESCAPES.

DEFENDING THE HOMESTEAD.—FROM A PAINTING BY A. DE DREUX.

DIAGRAM OF ROOMS.

VIEW OF THE ROOM WHEREIN TWO PERSONS WERE SMOTHERED TO DEATH BY THEIR LANDLORD, AT NO. 597 GRAND STREET, NEW YORK.

Edward Curry testified that, at the request of Coroner Gover, he made an examination of the premises at No. 597 Grand street, and found a flat stone laid across the flue, and well mortared up, so that no smoke could pass it.

Edwin B. Hunter was examined, and made a statement, in which he said that his mother directed him to order the McGaghays out of the premises, and he ordered them out 40 days ago, telling them that they had 12 days in which to get out; deceased told him that she would not move, and that she had hired the place for life; he told Mr. Cavanagh he had better stop up the chimney, so that the McGaghays could not make a fire, and then they would have to leave; he made a mark on the wall, and told Cavanagh where to break through; he told the McGaghays not to build a fire as the chimney was stopped.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"That the deceased came to their deaths by suffocation, by inhaling coal-gas, through the action of Edwin B. Hunter, in having a stone placed on the flue of the chimney leading from the room where deceased resided, at No. 597 Grand street, December 31st, 1865."

Edwin B. Hunter was held to wait the action of the Grand Jury.

PORTRAIT OF THE LANDLORD, EDWIN B. HUNTER.

Here we have a case of the deliberate murder of two inoffensive persons, one of them an aged woman, who simply wished to be left alone in the possession of the home for which she paid rent—for it was not attempted to be shown that she did n 4 pay, but, simply, that this Edwin B. Hunter could, by getting her out, obtain a few dollars more rent for the place. This man, if he possessed the smallest portion of sense, knew that he was committing an act that must result in death or something near it, and yet it was with him a work of deliberation. He acknowledges himself that he knew what the result would be, that if they did not leave it would kill them. He told them so, but the poor and ignorant old woman, not perhaps believing in such depravity, went on to her death.

And after committing this crime, and sending two persons to eternity, the says, EDWIN B. HUNTER, was held to bail by the Coroner in the enormous sum of $3,000.

We hope that this Edwin B. Hunter and the Coroner sleep at nights, and that Mrs. McGaghy is not after them, or, rather, we hope she is.

DEFENDING THE HOMESTEAD.

We give this week a fine art picture, by De Dreux, of Paris, as one of the series of works worthy of framing for any wall in the country.

The expression of pain towards the invader is carrying the human countenance and manner into animals to a degree that is marvellous to those unknowing in he subtlety of art.

NAPOLEONIC DUELLING.—A London "fellow about town," now gray and garrulous, and who is called "Lord William Lennox," has lately published a gossipy and remarkably trashy book, from which we extract, nevertheless, the following about Louis Napoleon as a duellist: "Soon after the prince arrived in London, he was alleged by a gunpowder Freshman, who, for some public grievance or private pique, was anxious to fix a quarrel upon him. A challenge ensued, and the prince's foe was looked upon as an expert dead shot with pistols. Although brave as a lion, Napoleon felt that he ought not to brew away a chance, and named the broadsword as his weapon. This led to some discussion. Lieut.-Col. Radcliffe, the French challenger's second, held a commission in the Inniskilling Dragoons, a regiment which had recently been commanded by my brother George; and anxious, upon so important an occasion, to consult a friend as to the line he ought to take, he requested Louis Napoleon to allow him half an hour to consider the matter. With this view he called upon my brother, who was then lodging in the same house as myself in St. James's street, but not finding him at home, he asked for me. He narrated the circumstance, and I at once took upon myself to say that upon honorability, the prince, being the challenged party, had the right to name the weapon. Radcliffe adopted my suggestion, and the duel was arranged to take place, with swords, on Wimbledon Common. The combatants met there, at seven o'clock in the morning, on the 21 of March, 1840, bu the police interfered, and all parties concerned were taken to Bow street. The principals were released on entering into their own recognizances of £500 each, and one security each of the same amount."

An old lady, when told of her husband's death, exclaimed, "Well, I do declare, our troubles never come alone. It isn't a week since I lost my best ben, and now Mr. Thompson has gone too, poor man!"

CHIMNEY FLUE AND SLAB.

ARE WE FRIENDS OR ARE W FOES?

BY J. W. WATSON.

Ho! brothers of the Southern land,
  Sit ye not brooding by your hearth,
Receive an outstretched Northern hand,
  And give some gentler feeling birth!
Think well of all the countless years
  Wherein our paths must be the same;
Shall we, in hot and bloody tears,
  Make brotherhood a burning shame?
I charge ye, by our mutual woes,
  Speak—are we friends or are we foes?

The past has been a fearful dream,
  A struggle fraught with woful pain;
Shall we not seek some Lethe's stream,
  And by its waves be pure again?
Shall we not in the precious draught
  Drown hate and every bitter thought,
Or shall we leave the cup unquaffed,
  The healing waters all unsought?
Shall hands be used for grasps or blows?
  Speak—are we friends or are we foes?

Think well of countless grassgrown graves
  By hill, by meadow, stream and lake!
Think well of all our countless braves
  Who suffered for our mother's sake!
There is no hatred in our breast,
  No treasured vengeance for a wrong;
We laid our bitterest thought to rest
  With our last shout of battle-song.
Before the One who all things knows,
  Speak—are we friends or are we foes?

Speak, while our hearts are warm within,
  While tears still glisten in our eyes!
Speak ere the spectre of the sin
  Shall in its hideous form arise!
Speak, while your smitten homes appeal,
  Your fertile fields plead through their waste!
Speak, that the smiter's touch may heal
  The memory of the blow effaced!
Shall not our hands in kindness close?
  Speak—are we friends or are we foes?

I charge ye, by our mother's tears—
  By many and many a vacant heart,
By all the suffering that endears,
  To rise unto the nobler part!
I charge ye, by that memoried time,
  When hand in hand we learned to walk,
Before the words of thoughtless crime
  Came bubbling through our youthful talk;
Think, ere the warm hand colder grows,
Think—are we friends or are we foes!

The days are hurrying swiftly by,
  The stranger's glance is on us bent.
Shall he remark the angry eye,
  And smile or sneer at our dissent?
Why all the world in triumph cries,
  Where once it stood entranced and mute,
Because two brothers, brave and wise,
  Still struggle in a dread dispute!
Remember, he must reap who sows,
  Think—are we friends or are we foes?

THE DEAD-ALIVE.

CHAPTER I.

WHEN Maria Graham married Walter Forsythe, everybody said there was little love, save love of lucre, in the match.

Miss Graham was poor and ambitious. Her father had brought her up expensively, and died a bankrupt. She had need of luxury, but was forced to live as a dependent in the house of a distant relative. Walter Forsythe was rich and solitary. Not one of his blood lived to claim tithe of his heart or purse. He had received a military education; but inheriting a large fortune from the last of his house, and longing to travel through other lands, he left the army—the less reluctantly that the days were days of peace and idlesse for them of the sword—and went abroad for seven years.

When he returned he met Miss Graham, and, after a brief courtship, wedded her. Then once more he sailed for foreign shores, this time with his proud and beautiful bride.

What manner of life these two led in the brilliant route of the Old World it skills not knowing. But Forsythe, in the second year of his absence, expressed his intention of becoming a subject of France, and, withdrawing his fortune from his native land, invested it in that of his adoption. Another year, and Walter Forsythe was Monsieur Forsythe de Claireau, Claireau being the title of an estate he had purchased in the South of France. Three more years and the "dogs of war" were again let loose on olden battlefields, and Christian and Turk fought side by side, for the first time, on Crimean plains. Forsythe remembered his vocation, and became le Capitain de Claireau, aide-de-camp, volontaire.

Three "stricken fields" he saw, and on each he left a trail of blood.

Then came Inkermann, and Madame de Claireau was a widow. A widow, without even the sorrowful comfort of seeing her hero husband in death, or weeping over his laurelled grave. Captain Forsythe was torn to pieces by a shell—so said the bulletin—with many others, and their indistinguisable remains committed to the common fosse, with hasty ceremonial. So, Maria Forsythe was a widow, still young, beautiful, childless and sole mistress of a noble fortune.

CHAPTER II.

FIFTEEN months have softened the sharp memories of loss, and blunted the keenness of grief in many hearts, perhaps, but surely in that of Captain Forsythe's young widow. For there is certainly a feast of some sort in the chateau of Claireau. The windows are all alight, there is hurrying to and fro of liveried menials, and the sound of music and laughter echoes harmoniously along the stately corridors.

The brilliant drawing-rooms are full of gaily attired guests who dance, or chatter, or play at cards, as the humor takes them, while among them moves a tall, dark-eyed ebon-haired lady, with a peculiar firmness of lip and haughty arch of eyebrow, who smiles graciously to the pretty things said here and there, showing her small white teeth and the dimple in her cheek as she does so. This lady, who must be the hostess by her manner, leans upon the arm of a tall, thin man, elaborately dressed, and decorated with several orders. He is not very young, for his hair is tinged with gray; but his long moustache and imperial are black and glossy as the boots on his aristocratic feet. His face, when scanned closely, has a tired air, and the lines round the eye and base of the slightly-hooked nose speak of long and not specially moral vigils—in short, he wears the marks of long continued dissipations arrived at the point of blasé-dom.

From his manner towards the lady on his own arm, and that of the guests towards them both, one feels sure that this brilliant pair must be bride and groom.

And yet the cavalier is no less than the Marquis of Chastel, while the fair lady he escorts is, or was, when we knew her last, simply Madame Forsythe, widow of Captain Forsythe de Claireau.

It is true, however! The noble marquis has exchanged his title against the golden charms of the fair widow. He is a ruined spendthrift and viveur, without morals or principles to speak of; he is forty-nine years of age; he is discarded by every respectable member of his family, and scarcely more than tolerated in the noble society his rank entitles him to frequent!

But what of all this?

Maria Graham (widow Forsythe) is now Madame the Marchioness de Chastel! She has bought her title dearly, perhaps; but, as yet, she does not regret the price. As the hour waxes late, and the voices of the lackeys begin to be heard announcing the carriages of their masters or mistresses, a footman walks slowly, and as if with difficulty, up the long avenue of poplars that leads from the high road to the portals of Claireau.

As he steps out of the shadow into a strip of moonlight, you see—if you were there to see—that he has but one leg and walks with a crutch. At the next moonlit space, you perceive that his face is terribly scarred and discolored, and during his traverse of a still longer ribbon of light, you remark that his garb is poor and travel-soiled.

He reaches the open ground in front of the mansion, quite unregarded by the pressing, jabbering crowd of servants, and sits down upon a stone terrace step, whence for some time he gazes with a vague wonder at the still brightly lit house, and the stream of laughing, chattering people issuing from it.

At length he rouses himself, and, stopping a youthful groom:

"My friend," says he, "what is the name of this fair mansion?"

"Claireau!" replies the boy, shortly.

"And its master?" continues the cripple, in a dreamy voice.

"The Marquis de Chastel—or rather the marchioness, since she is the real master," says the youth, and is anxious to depart.

"Stay a moment," urges the cripple, drawing a coin from his pocket and placing it in the boy's ready hand. "I once knew the master of this domain; but he was no marquis; he was simply Monsieur Forsythe. Has he got a title, my little one?"

"He was killed in the Crimea, I have heard, for I am new here," replied the boy. "But madame his widow it is who has wedded our marquis, and so is now Marchioness of Chastel, my old one. Good night, I must be gone!" and snatching his skirt from the stranger's grasp, he sprang off to his post at the horses' heads.

For a moment the mutilated traveller sat as though stunned, with his head bowed between his hands; then rising, he made a stride or two towards the steps as though he would enter the mansion.

"Out of the way, imbecile!" cried the driver of a crested equipage, as he whirled past within an inch of the halting footman.

The cripple fell back, then, with a long, strange sigh that was almost a groan.

"No! no! not here! not now!" he muttered, and turning away, went slowly down the avenue again, and so out upon the highroad, and was lost, for the time, in the night.

CHAPTER III.

M. DUROC, the lawyer of Marseilles (for he was, by general consent, the lawyer of that flourishing town), sat in his office one morning, when his clerk announced a visitor.

"What sort of a person, Charles?"

"An old soldier and beggar, I should say," replied the clerk.

"Well, show him in nevertheless," said the advocate, kindly.

And in a moment a man poorly dressed, with one leg, and a scarred face, hobbled into the room.

"You are M. Duroc?" asked he.

"I am. Pray be seated. And you? May I ask the——"

"My name is Forsythe. Walter Forsythe of Claireau, formerly captain and aide-de-camp of General X——"

"Hold! hold!" cried the lawyer. "I knew Captain Forsythe. I was his business agent, even as I am that of his widow. He was killed in the Crimea, and his widow is married again to——"

"To the Marquis de Chastel. I know it!" interrupted the cripple. "But Captain Forsythe was not killed, since I am he."

The lawyer shook his head incredulously; but the other went on rapidly.

"It is true that I was blown up by a shell, or rather a mine of shells, and was supposed to be dead, aye, was even buried—if to be thrown into a shallow trench and covered with half an inch of soil can be called burial. But I revived, and managed to get my head above ground, and was found by some prowlers who were looking for booty from the dead. They were loth to be burdened with me; but there was a woman among them, who insisted that I should be saved. So they put me in a little covered cart, and carried me back among the hills, to their den, where the woman and the daughter nursed me, and got a sort of peasant surgeon to dress my wounds, and for five months I lay there ere I could rise. And when finally my wounds were healed, my memory was gone; I was like an infant; knew nothing, could communicate nothing. So they carried me to a hospital in a village, and there I was treated, for charity, as a lunatic, for six months more. At last I recovered my reason, and obtained my discharge. See, I have it here. But I had no money, no friends who could recognise me, mutilated and altered as I was, no means other than my own word of proving my identity, and even my old voice was gone. So I travelled as best I could, back here—to find my wife wedded to another, my friends scattered, or incredulous even as you are—and myself a beggar without a home or a name unless you will aid me to recover them."

"This is the most extraordinary—the—excuse me—the most incredible story I ever heard!" exclaimed M. Duroc. "But if you are really M. Forsythe, you will answer a few questions that I shall put to you, and then we shall see.

"Proceed, sir! I feel I shall convince you, at least!" said the captain (as we shall henceforth call him).

The lawyer then interrogated him upon points of business which could only have been known to himself and Captain Forsythe, his client, to all of which the captain's replies were clear and satisfactory. At length:

"It must be so—it is so! You are undoubtedly M. Forsythe de Claireau; but how to prove it legally is, alas! another question," cried the lawyer.

"What!" exclaimed the captain, "is any further proof necessary? Can you not swear? Can I—"

"And your wife?" said Duroc.

The captain groaned.

"True, true," muttered he. "I know her. She will deny me; she will perjure herself a hundred times to hold to her title and my fortune. Alas! what is to be done?"

"We shall see," replied the lawyer, cheerfully. "Come to me the day after to-morrow. And, meantime, suffer me to be your banker; it is but an advance, you know—you can repay me with usury when I hand you back your fortune," and he placed a rouleau of gold in the captain's hesitating hand.

"Well, said he, at last, "I will take it, then, as a loan. And now, good morning. The day after to-morrow I will be here, and will live, till then, in what hope I can."

They shook hands and parted.

As the mutilated soldier went slowly forth into the street, he nearly ran against a lady, who was tripping from her coupé to the lawyer's office he had just quitted.

"Pardon me, madame," said he, taking off his hat. Then, looking upon the face of her he addressed, he started back, and would have fallen, had he not caught the arm of the astonished lady.

"What is the matter? Let me go, sir! Is the man drunk?" exclaimed she, with rapid indignation.

"Maria, do you not know me?" murmured the captain, in English, still holding his wife—for it was she—by the arm.

"How dare you—who are you? George, George! (to the lackey) deliver me from this ruffian!" cried the soi-distant marchioness.

"I am your husband, Walter Forsythe," said the captain, in a low voice, at the same time relinquishing his hold. "Look, here is the proof!"

But without waiting for him to produce something he was feeling for in his breast, Maria swept scornfully and swiftly past him, saying only: "You are mad, poor man!" and the lawyer's door closed upon her.

For an instant Forsythe seemed about to follow her, but changed his mind in the next, and proceeded on his way with bowed head and uncertain step.

CHAPTER IV.

"SHE will be here in a few moments," said M. Duroc; "and I advise you to compromise!"

"But my name, my identity, my social position! I cannot continue an outcast—a dead man!" exclaimed the captain.

"Bah! You will return to your native land, among your own family and friends, who will receive you at your word, since you will come as a giver, and not as an asker among them. There, with half your fortune, which madame is prepared to restore to you, you will be happy, and——"

"No, no!" said Forsythe, firmly. "I must have full justice or nothing. I care not for the fortune without the right of name. I must be acknowledged to be myself, fully, legally, and then, perhaps——"

"Madame may cause you to alter your resolve," said the lawyer. "By my faith, she is a dangerous woman—a siren!"

"Her power of charming me is gone," muttered Forsythe. "I may break, but I will not bend."

"Well, we shall see. If, after your interview, you are still resolved to risk the law, I will do my best for you. But, I warn you, such a suit will be long, uncertain, and—costly."

"Justice or nothing!" repeated the captain.

A light step on the stair, the door opened, and Madame Forsythe, de Claireau, de Chastel, appeared, dressed exquisitely in semi-mourning, with a ravishing expression of mingled grief and joy upon her mobile face.

"I leave you together," said M. Duroc, retiring gravely.

What the nature of that strange interview was, may not be told; but half an hour later the lawyer, looking from his window, beheld Captain Forsythe tenderly bestowed in the coupé of madame, and that lady having seated herself beside him, the equipage rolled rapidly away in the direction of the chateau.

"He is lost!" exclaimed M. Duroc, solemnly.

CHAPTER V.

IN the winter of 1859 two medical gentlemen, one a Frenchman and the other an American, visited a celebrated insane asylum, in the south of France. After being shown over the establishment by the courteous director, he excused himself for a few moments, and, upon his return, explained that it was to give certain orders in reference to a patient who had just died.

"A somewhat singular case of monomania," said he. "A poor devil, with one leg, who insisted that he was another man come to life again—by-the-way, a countryman of yours (addressing the American)—not the madman, but him he represented, a Mr. or Captain Forsythe. It is quite a curious story."

"Let us have it, by all means!" exclaimed the visitors.

"Well, briefly, then, this Captain Forsythe was killed in the Crimean war, leaving a widow and a large fortune. The widow married again. Suddenly this chap turns up—probably a fellow-soldier of the captain's—and claims fortune and lady as being him elf the veritable Forsythe and not in the least dead. At first he was thought simply a cunning impostor; but subsequent investigation proved him to have lost his mental balance from wounds and suffering, and after keeping him most charitably in her own house for several weeks in hopes of discovering the relations he had borne to her deceased husband, Madame de Chastel placed him with me, begging me, if possible, to cure him, and paying most generously for my care of the poor fellow. But, alas! he was incurable, and, at length, he has died, persistent to the last in his strange delusion."

"Truly a singular case!" exclaimed the visitors.

"And Madame de Chastel?" said the American, inquiringly.

"I regret to say, that for a year or more, I have heard nothing of her," replied the director. "Her last remittance was from Italy, nearly eighteen months ago."

One month later, an American, glancing over a journal, in a coffee-house of London, was attracted by an article therein, substantially as follows:

"Facilis Decensus.—A well-dressed and rather handsome woman was arrested yesterday in Goldsmith's jewelry establishment, with over five hundred pounds worth of stolen diamond and other rings, pins, &c., in her possession. She was very indignant at her arrest, and upon being taken before a magistrate, gave her name as the Marchioness de Chastel, widow of a French nobleman of that name.

"Subsequent investigation proved that she was actually the widow of a titled French gamester and roué, who, after dissipating his fortune and her own, shot himself last year at some German spa. Since his death, the marchioness, who is said to be an American, has gradually fallen—if, indeed, she had not fallen previously—into a shameful and precarious way of life, and this is said not to be her first offence in the 'lifting line.'"

Here followed a series of moral reflections, which the American did not stay to read; but—"De Chastel!" he exclaimed, flinging down the paper. "Why, that was the name of the lady who—the widow of that Mr. Forsythe who was——"

"Good heavens!" he added, after a moment's thought; "if that unfortunate man in the asylum was really her first husband, after all!"

He had, unconsciously, been speaking quite loud. As he uttered this last phrase some one touched his arm. He looked up, and saw a grave gentleman in black.

"You are right!" said this person, in French. "As sure as you and I live, that unhappy man was no other than Captain Walter Forsythe!"

Then, taking a card from his pocket, he handed it to the astonished American.

"M. A. Duroc, avocat, Marseilles," said he, reading aloud; "well, sir, and how, may I ask ——?"

"I was her lawyer, sir, and his," replied M. Duroc, anticipating his question. "It is a strange, sad story. Would you like to hear it?"

"Most assuredly."

"Well, then," began the lawyer, and sitting down, he related briefly to the American what has been herein set forth at more length.

"And now this woman?" queried the listener.

"Will be transported to the penal colonies," replied Duroc.

"And serve her right!" quoth her fellow-countryman, with more justice than gallantry.

Reader, this story is true. But its names and dates and places are all false.

A RECEIPT for a new kind of indestructible ink is given in one of the German scientific journals, and may interest our readers. The ink is said to be composed of 30 grains of sugar dissolved in 30 grains of water, to which are said to be added a few drops of concentrated sulphuric acid. Upon heating this mixture the sugar becomes carbonised by the acid; and when applied to the paper, it leaves a coating of carbon which cannot be washed off. This stain is rendered more permanent by the decomposing action of the ink itself upon the paper, and thus made, it resists the action of chemical agents.

"ARE you fond of Hogg's Tales?" said a rather verdant lady to a shepherd.

"Yes: I likes 'em roasted wi' salt on 'em, was the response.

"No—but I mean have you read Hogg's Tales?"

"Noa," said the bumpkin, "our hogs are all white or black—I don't think there is a red one among 'em."

THINKING OF THEE.

ONLY of thee, darling, always of thee,
This fond heart is thinking wherever it be;
At noon of the starshine, at blush of the day,
When fires of the sunset burn leaden and gray,
By night or by morning, on mount or on lea,
Ever thinking of thee, dearest, thinking of thee.

Life may hold carnival, boisterous and high,
Mirth may brim over from lip and from eye;
Or tears like the raindrops may gather and fall,
A grief bury joy 'neath its sombre-hued pall;
Still, 'mid all changes, for ever I'll be Thinking of thee, darling, thinking of thee.

And when the death-dews stand thick on this brow,
When passion flames smoulder, when life droppeth low;
When to this dulled ear comes the terrible chime
Of the surge which creeps up to the borders of Time;
My courage I'll gather to brave the cold sea,
With thinking of thee, dearest, thinking of thee.

MOSI-OA-TUNYA, OR VICTORIA FALLS—AFRICA.

IT is possibly familiar to our readers that the English have fitted out an expedition to penetrate and explore the Zambesi river and its tributaries. Accounts of this river heretofore have reached us much like legends or fairy tales, but now we have an actual account. As much as we regret that our great waterfall, Niagara, should have a successful rival in another land, yet we cannot refrain, as a subject of absorbing interest, from giving the traveller's account of the Cataracts of the Zambesi.

Mosi-oa-tunya is the Makololo name, and means smoke sounding.

We embarked in canoes, belonging to Tuba Mokoro, "smasher of canoes," an ominous name; but he alone it seems knew the medicine which insures one against shipwreck in the rapids above the Falls. For some miles the river was smooth and tranquil, and we glided pleasantly over water clear as crystal, and past lovely islands densely covered with a tropical vegetation.

Many flowers peeped out near the water's edge, some entirely new to us, and others, as the convolvulus, old acquaintances.

But our attention was quickly called from the charming islands to the dangerous rapids, down which Tuba might unintentionally shoot us.

Before entering the race of waters, we were requested not to speak, as our talking might diminish the virtue of the medicine; and no one with such boiling eddying rapids before his eyes, would think of disobeying the orders of a "canoe-smasher." It soon became evident that there was sound sense in this request of Tuba's, although the reason assigned was not unlike that of the canoe-man from Sesheke, who begged one of our party not to whistle, because whistling made the wind come. It was the duty of the man at the bow to look out ahead for the proper course, and when he saw a rock or snag to call out to the steersman.

At times it seemed as if nothing could save us from dashing in our headlong race against the rocks which, now that the river was low, jutted out of the water; but, just at the very nick of time, Tuba passed the word to the steersman, and then with ready pole turned the canoe a little aside, and we glided swiftly past the threatened danger. Never was canoe more admirably managed; once only did the medicine seem to have lost something of its efficacy. We were driving swiftly down, a black rock, over which the white foam flew, lay directly in our path, the pole was planted against it as readily as ever, but it slipped just as Tuba put forth his strength to turn the bow off.

We struck hard, and were half-full of water in a moment; Tuba recovered himself as speedily, shoved off the bow, and shot the canoe into a still shallow place, to bale out the water. Here we were given to understand that it was not the medicine which was at fault: that had lost none of its virtue; the accident was owing entirely to Tuba having started without his breakfast. Need it be said we never let Tuba go without that meal again?

We landed at the head of Garden Island, which is situated near the middle of the river and on the lip of the Falls. On reaching that lip, and peering over the giddy height, the wondrous and unique character of the magnificent cascade at once burst upon us.

It is rather a hopeless task to endeavor to convey an idea of it in words, since, as was remarked on the spot, an accomplished painter, even by a number of views, could but impart a faint impression of the glorious scene. The probable mode of its formation may perhaps help to the conception of its peculiar shape. Niagara has been formed by a wearing back of the rock over which the river falls; and, during a long course of ages, it has gradually receded, and left a broad, deep and pretty straight trough in front. It goes on wearing back daily, and may yet discharge the lakes from which its river—the St. Lawrence—flows.

But the Victoria Falls have been formed by a crack right across the river, in the hard, black, basaltic rock which there formed the bed of the Zambesi. The lips of the crack are still quite sharp, save about three feet of the edge over which the river rolls. The walls go sheer down from the lips without any projecting crag, or symptom of stratification or dislocation. When the mighty rift occurred, no change of level took place in the two parts of the bed of the river thus rent asunder, consequently, in coming down the river to Garden Island the water suddenly disappears, and we see the opposite side of the cleft, with grass and trees growing where once the river ran, on the same level as that part of its bed on which we sail. The first crack is, in length, a few yards more than the breadth of the Zambesi, which by measurement we found to be a little over 1,860 yards, but this number we resolved to retain as indicating the year in which the Fall was for the first time carefully examined.

The main stream here runs nearly north and south, and the cleft across it is nearly east and west. The depth of the rift was measured by lowering a line, to the end of which a few bullets and a foot of white cotton cloth were tied. One of us lay with his head over a projecting crag, and watched the descending calico, till, after his companions had paid out 310 feet, the weight rested on a sloping projection, probably 50 feet from the water below, the actual bottom being still further down. The white cloth now appeared the size of a crown piece. On measuring the width of this deep cleft by sextant, it was found at Garden Island, its narrowest part, to be 80 yards, and at its broadest somewhat more. Into this chasm, of twice the depth of Niagara Fall, the river, a full mile wide, rolls with a deafening roar; and his is Mosi-oa-tunya or the Victoria Falls.

Looking from Garden Island, down to the bottom of the abyss, nearly half a mile of water, which has fallen over that portion of the Falls to our right, or west of our point of view, is seen collected in a narrow channel 20 or 30 yards wide, and flowing at exactly right angles to its previous course, to our left; while the other half, or that which fell over the eastern portion of the Falls, is seen in the left of the narrow channel below, coming towards our right. Both waters unite midway, in a fearful boiling whirlpool, and find an outlet by a crack situated at right angles to the fissure of the Falls. This outlet is about 1,170 yards from the western end of the chasm, and some 600 from its eastern end; the whirlpool is at its commencement.

The Zambesi, now apparently not more than 20 or 30 yards wide, rushes and surges south, through the narrow escape-channel for 130 yards; then enters a second chasm somewhat deeper, and nearly parallel with the first. Abandoning the bottom of the eastern half of this second chasm to the growth of large trees, it turns sharply off to the west, and forms a promontory, with the escape-channel at its point, of 1,170 yards long, and 416 yards broad at the base. After reaching this base, the river runs abruptly round the head of another promontory, and flows away to the east, in a third chasm; then glides round a third promontory, much narrower than the rest, and away back to the west, in a fourth chasm; and we could see in the distance that it appeared to round still another promontory, and bend once more in another chasm towards the east.

In this gigantic, zigzag, yet narrow trough, the rocks are all so sharply cut and angular, that the idea at once arises that the hard basaltic trap must have been riven into its present shape by a force acting from beneath, and that this probably took place, when the ancient inland seas were let off by similar fissures nearer the ocean.

But as, at Niagara, one has to go over to the Canadian shore to see the chief wonder—the Great Horseshoe Fall—so here we have to cross over to Moselekatse's side to the promontory of evergreens, for the best view of the principal Falls of Mosi-oa-tunya. Beginning, therefore, at the base of this promontory and facing the Cataract, at the west end of the chasm, there is, first, a fall of 36 yards in breadth, and, of course, as they all are, upwards of 310 feet in depth. Then Boaruka, a small island, intervenes, and next comes a great fall, with a breadth of 573 yards; a projecting rock separates this from a second grand fall of 325 yards broad; in all, upwards of 900 yards of perennial Falls. Further east stands Garden Island; then, as the river was at its lowest, came a good deal of the bare rock of its bed, with a score of narrow falls, which, at the time of flood, constitute one enormous cascade of nearly another half-mile. Near the east end of the chasm are two larger falls, but they are nothing at low water compared to those between the islands.

The whole body of water rolls clear over, quite unbroken; but, after a descent of 10 or more feet, the entire mass suddenly becomes like a huge sheet of driven snow. Pieces of water leap off it in the form of comets with tails streaming behind, till the whole snowy sheet becomes myriads of rushing, leaping, aqueous comets. This peculiarity was not observed by Charles Livingstone, at Niagara, and here it happens, possibly from the dryness of the atmosphere, or whatever the cause may be which makes every drop of Zambesi water appear to possess a sort of individuality. It runs off the ends of the paddles, and glides in beads along the smooth surface, like drops of quicksilver on a table. Here we see them in a conglomeration, each with a train of pure white vapor, racing down till lost in clouds of spray. A stone dropped in became less and less to the eye, and at last disappeared in the dense mist below.

We had seen Niagara, and gave Mosi-oa-tunya the palm, though now at the end of a drought, and the river at its very lowest. Many feel a disappointment on first seeing the great American Falls, but Mosi-oa-tunya is so strange, it must ever cause wonder. In the amount of water, Niagara probably excels, though not during the months when the Zambesi is in flood. The vast body of water separating in the comet-like forms described, necessarily encloses in its descent a large volume of air, which, forced into the cleft, to an unknown depth, rebounds, and rushes up loaded with vapor to form the three or even six columns, as if of steam, visible at the Batoka village Moachemba, 21 miles distant. On attaining a height of 200, or at most 300 feet from the level of the river above the cascade, this vapor becomes condensed into a perpetual shower of fine rain. Much of the spray, rising to the west of Garden Island, falls on the grove of evergreen trees opposite; and from their leaves heavy drops are for ever falling, to form sundry little rills, which, in running down the steep face of rock, are blown off and turned back, or licked off their perpendicular bed, up into the column from which they have just descended.

The morning sun gilds these columns of watery smoke with all the glowing colors of double or treble rainbows. The evening sun, from a hot yellow sky, imparts a sulphureous hue, and gives one the impression that the yawning gulf might resemble the mouth of the bottomless pit. No bird sits and sings on the branches of the grove of perpetual showers, or ever builds its nest there. We saw hornbills, and flocks of little black weavers flying across from the mainland, to the islands, and from the islands to the points of the promontories and back again, but they uniformly shunned the region of perpetual rain, occupied by the evergreen grove. The sunshine, elsewhere in this land so overpowering, never penetrates the deep gloom of that shade. In the presence of the strange Mosi-o-tunya, we can sympathise with those who, when the world was young, peopled earth, air and river with beings not of mortal form. Sacred to what deity would be this awful chasm and that dark grove, over which hovers an ever-abiding "pillar of cloud?"

Before leaving the most wonderful Falls in the world, one may be excused for referring to the fact that, though they had produced a decided impression on the native mind in the interior, no intelligence of their existence ever reached reached the Portuguese. About 1809 two black slaves, named Pedro Baptista and Andre José, were sent from Cassange, a village 300 miles from the West Coast, through the country of Cazembe, to Tette, nearly an equal distance from the East Coast. A lady now living at Tette, Donna Eugenia, remembers distinctly these slaves—their woolly hair dressed in the Londa fashion—arriving and remaing at Tette, till letters came from the Governor-General of Mosambique, which they successfully carried back to Cassange. On this slender fibre hangs all the Portuguese pretension to having possessed a road across Africa. Their maps show the source of the Zambesi S.S.W. of Zumbo, about where the Falls were found; and on this very questionable authority an untravelled English map-maker, with most amusing assurance, asserts that the river above the Falls runs under the Kalahari Desert and is lost.

Here we have another episode in our traveller's experience:

Next forenoon we halted at the village of our old friend Mbame, to obtain new carriers, because Chibisa's men, never before having been hired, and not having yet learned to trust us, did not choose to go further. After resting awhile, Mbame told us that a slave party, on its way to Tette, would presently pass through his village. "Shall we interfere?" we inquired of each other. We remembered that all our valuable private baggage was in Tette, which, if we freed the slaves, might, together with some Government property, be destroyed, in retaliation; but this system of slave-hunters dogging us, where previously they durst not venture, and, on pretence of being "our children," setting one tribe against another, to furnish themselves with slaves, would so inevitably thwart all the efforts, for which we had the sanction of the Portuguese Government, that we resolved to run all risks, and put a stop, if possible, to the slave-trade, which had now followed on the footsteps of our discoveries.

A few minutes after Mbame had spoken to us, the slave party, a long line of manacled men, women and children, came wending their way round the hill and into the valley, on the side of which the village stood. The black drivers, armed with muskets, and bedecked with various articles of finery, marched jauntily in the front, middle and rear of the line, some of them blowing exultant notes out of long tin horns. They seemed to feel that they were doing a very noble thing, and might proudly march with an air of triumph. But the instant the fellows caught a glimpse of the English, they darted off like mad into the forest—so fast, indeed, that we caught but a glimpse of their red caps and the soles of their feet. The chief of the party alone remained, and he, from being in front, had his hand tightly grasped by a Makololo! He proved to be a well-known slave of the late Commandant at Tette, and for some time our own attendant while there. On asking him how he obtained these captives, he replied he had bought them; but on inquiring of the people themselves, all, save four, said they had been captured in war. While this inquiry was going on, he bolted too. The captives knelt down, and, in their way of expressing thanks, clapped their hands with great energy. They were thus left entirely on our hands, and knives were soon busy at work, cutting the women and children loose. It was more difficult to cut the men adrift, as each had his neck in the fork of a stout stick, six or seven feet long, and kept in by an iron rod, which was riveted at both ends across the throat. With a saw, luckily in the bishop's baggage, one by one the men were sawn out into freedom.

The women, on being told to take the meal they were carrying and cook breakfast for themselves and children, seemed to consider the news too good to be true; but, after a little coaxing, went at it with alacrity, and made a capital fire, by which to boil their pots, with the slave sticks and bonds, their old acquaintances through many a sad night and weary day.

One little boy, with the simplicity of childhood, said to our men: "The others tied and starved us, you cut the ropes and tell us to eat; what sort of people are you? Where did you come from?"

Two of the women had been shot the day before, for attempting to untie the thongs. This, the rest were told, was to prevent them from attempting to escape. One woman had her infant's brains knocked out, because she could not carry her load and it; and a man was dispatched with an axe, because he had broken down with fatigue. Self-interest would have set a watch over the whole, rather than commit murder; but in this traffic we invariably find self-interest overcome by contempt of human life and by bloodthirstiness.

Eighty-four, chiefly women and children, were liberated, and on being told that they were now free, and might go where they pleased, or remain with us, they all chose to stay. And the bishop wisely attached them to his mission, to be educated as members of a Christian family. In this way a great difficulty in the commencement of a mission was overcome. Years are usually required before confidence is so far instilled into the natives' mind as to induce them, young or old, to submit to the guidance of strangers, professing to be actuated by motives the reverse of worldly wisdom, and inculcating customs strange and unknown to them or their fathers.

FIRE, WATER AND RATS.

A WORKING mechanic, who emigrated to Australia many years before the gold discoveries had given a romantic character to that vast, unpeopled continent, has published his recollections of 16 years' labor in the Australian backwoods—a narrative, not only remarkable as the genuine production of a working man, but also as a record of energy and enterprise. The emigrant mechanic, whose name is Edwards, had not been many days in the colony before he obtained the job of erecting a timber-house in the interior of the country—his skill as a sawyer particularly adapting him for that kind of work. Starting with a companion whom he had induced to engage with him, the travellers soon found tokens of their being in a very different country to that which they had left behind. Part of their road lay through a forest which had been destroyed by fire, and of which the large trunks of trees were in many places still glowing with heat. Above them, the sky was gloomy and still. All around them, the far-stretching forest showed patches of fire, accompanied by the occasional crackling of flames, and the crash of falling trees. So recent was the fire that that had swept over the ground, that the charred posts of a bridge over a deep creek which they had to pass was still smouldering, while the bridge itself lay in heaps of half-burnt timbers in the channel. Fortunately, the creek was nearly emptied with the summer drought, and the timbers enabled them, by leaping and clambering, to cross what water still remained. Once the ground appeared to sink beneath the feet of Edward's companion, who found himself in a heap of still smouldering embers; but with the presence of mind which a rough life engenders, he flung himself on to a solid spot, and instantly drew his legs after him, and sprang forward. Here, again, some huge old tree came thundering down across the road; and its boughs, kindling from the opposite side, were in full roaring blaze, lighting up everything near with ruddy brilliance, and throwing a red light into the dense volume of smoke. Farther on again, where the bush was thinner, and the materials for ravage more scanty, the fire had subsided, all was obscure and silent, except some single trunk in the bush, hollow, and old, and headless, through which went upwards, with fierce, steady roar, a volume of flame and crowds of sparks into the blackness of night; and then, all o a sudden, the fire would reach a cluster of tree-heads, as yet untouched, and go blazing, and crackling, and leaping through them, until nothing was left for it to devour. The heat was, in many places, intense, and the smoke in others suffocating; whilst guanas, bandicoots and opossums were crossing the road in every direction, with a wild, weak cry of fear. In one place, they saw a very large opossum on the edge of a lofty tree-trunk that had been his home, out of which and alongside him, as he moved to and fro to avoid it, the increasing fire kept shooting up its pointed tongues. They stood watching him, until the poor animal, no longer able to endure the torture, leaped to the ground, a height of full 40 feet, where, to their astonishment, after lying an instant motionless, he rose up suddenly, then fell again, and rolled over and over three or four times, and finally went off across the bush. At nearly 12 o'clock at night they reached their journey's end, a little hut by the roadside.

In this spot the workmen remained some time, and then removed to similar labors in a distant locality, where they soon found that there are other dangers to be met with in the wilds of Australia besides those from fire. Their home was a little tent-hut beside the sawpit where they labored all day. One night, when they went to bed in their hut, they left the fire in front cheerfully blazing with the pink flame that flickers from the green cedar in combustion. Their tools and cooking utensils lay strewed, as usual, within and just without the hut, or hung on the lower branches of the saplings close about the fire. Their bed extended across the inner end of the hut, or on four or five out-side slabs laid on a cross head log, and another foot log, each about six inches thick. Everything was just as usual when they went to bed; the book that Edwards had been reading by the light of the fire after he had lain down, he had deposited on the edge of the planks at his side. He went to sleep with his eyes fixed on the fire. The day had been sunny, and the night was temperate and still. There was no indication of bad weather; but about an hour after midnight, he was disturbed by his companion shaking him, and felt on the instant of waking a strange sensation. Wide awake in a moment, he could see, by the light of a small flame that was still playing about a part of the wood at the fire, water in the hut and out of the hut. Before he could take a second look, his companion jumped over him, and was at once nearly knee-deep wading out of the hut. No sooner was he there, than put his head in again, shouting:

"Be alive; it is coming down as hard as it can come; it will be over our heads in half an hour."

"Out I sprang," says the writer of the narrative; "my shoes were gone, I had left them in front of the hut, and probably they had floated off among the very first things, my straw hat also bearing them company. My clothes were safe, for I had put them under my head—they are the bushman's pillow; but they were wet. By this time our little remnant of fire was nearly gone."

His companion, who was more used to such adventures, floated up to the hut a very large plank of cedar, and on it placed the little live charcoal that remained, freshening and feeding it with some dry stuff from the the roof of the hut. By his direction Edwards waded across to the pit, and drawing the saw, which the torrent was already sweeping against and bending out of the cut, he hung it up, and the crosscut saw with it, as high in a tree as he could reach, to be fetched at some future time. They knew that the remaining provisions being on the ground were all spoiled, but the blankets were got out. The bed was left, for it was of wool, and wet as it was, would have sunk them. Drawing their blank up to a tree they got on it, sitting with the fire between them. The current was so strong, even midst the thick brush where they were, that it was difficult enough to keep together by holding on to a sapling apiece, and to keap their plank from being swept away. Where they were, no dead timber of any size could be swept against them; but they could hear it striking together, and grinding and crashing in the river a few yards off. The little light had dazzled their eyes so much that the sky seemed a vast dark void.

In this situation the rats swam boldly up, and got on the plank with them, and numbers of spiders and centipedes, guided, no doubt, by the fire, were crawling in all directions over their refuge. In this state they continued three hours, when, to their relief, day began to dawn. They knew they were rising, by getting more and more near the branches, but they had no notion how deep the water was had become around them. Their fire was out for want of fuel; and as the deep obscurity of the brushwoods began to be dissolved by the dawn, they could discern no vestige of their hut; and presently, when the light had so far increased that they could see as far as the pit, they discovered that the water was up to the bottom of the log that was half sawn, so that they knew there was about six and a half feet depth.

Although it was now light, they were nearly as bad off as ever. "The sounds of such a deluge in the night, in the midst of the bush," says the emigrant, "are certainly depressing to the spirits; but no one knew better than I did that the danger, except that from actual drowning, is next to nothing; and there are such plentiful means for escaping by getting up trees, that, after all, it makes no very serious impression." The loneliness and fear of starving were what most affected them. They could not tell but that it might last for many days, and as long as it lasted there seemed no hope of getting across the river. On this side they were so surrounded by brush, that any attempt to get their plank through to high ground was out of the question, and it was much too deep to wade. The raw, chilly air of the morning, and the water together, made them shiver until they were sick.

They both felt that to continue exposed thus, without food, would soon wear them out, so that they should not be able to make an effort to save themselves by swimming the river. In this undecided and hopeless state they passed the time until nearly noon, the water rising higher and higher. At last a thought struck one of them, that the overhanging bows of the trees, on opposite sides of the river, meeting in the middle, they might, by holding on to them, prevent themselves from being swept away, whilst they floated their plank across, and then about one hundred yards would bring them across the flat on the other side, which was of forest timber, not brush, to the foot of the range. This, Edwards's companion suggested, was all very well until they came across the river, but then they should be worse than ever. The stream was so strong on the forest land, and the trees so far apart, that they should neither be able to paddle across nor pull themselves on by hand from tree to tree. All this was clearly too true. What to do they knew not; but they concluded that the chance was better on the other side than where they were. So, as far as they could, they put their plan into execution, which was a matter of very little difficulty.

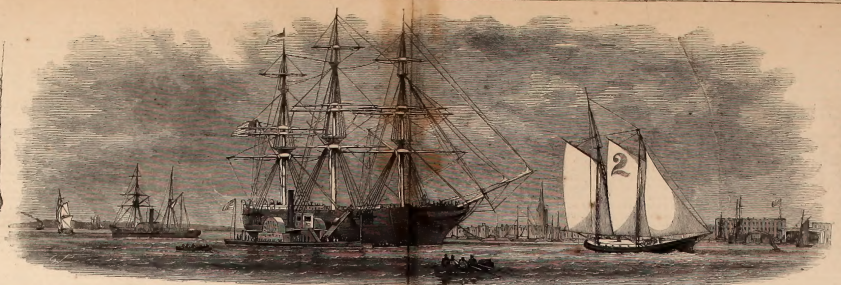
"What followed," says the poor sawyer, "has been a memento to me ever since, never to despair." The inundated flat, at the part where they reached it, was several hundred feet wide, but they immediately noticed that about a quarter of a mile further down there was a creek, with trees along it, running from a gap in the range to the river. Letting themselves down the edge of the river, from tree to tree, they then made their way up the creek in the same manner, and reached the high land, heartily pleased with their escape, but so tired of the uneasy saddle on which they had now been for hours, and with their legs so benumbed, that they could not stand, but crawled up the range to the high road on their knees. It is satisfactory to know that the hardy and enterprising mechanic afterwards raised himself to a prosperous position in the colony.

A MANLY little fellow of five years fell and cut his upper lip so badly, that a surgeon had to be summoned to sew up the wound. He sat in his mother's lap during the painful operation, pale, but very quiet, resolutely keeping back his tears and moans. In her distress, the young mother could not refrain from saying:

"Oh, doctor, I fear it will leave a disfiguring scar!"

Charley looked up into her tearful face, and said, in a comforting tone:

"Never mind, mamma, my moustache will cover it!"



MR. ROCK, the player, once advised a scene-shifter to get up a subscription, on receiving an accident. A few days after, he desired the man to show him the list of names, which he read, and returned it to the poor fellow, who, with some surprise, said:

"Why, Mr. Rock, won't you give me something?"

"Is it me you mean?" says Rock; "why, zounds, man, didn't I give you the hint?"

ARRIVAL AT CASTLE GARDEN

THE SHIP IN HARBOR
TRANSFERING EMIGRANTS TO THE CASTLE-GARDEN BOATS

PASSING THE INSPECTING PHYSICIAN

WEIGHMASTERS OFFICE

BAGGAGE DELIVERY

CITY BAGGAGE COURT

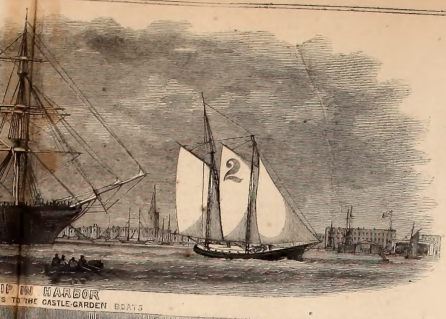
REGISTRING EMIGRANTS

THE LUNCH ROOM

BATHING ROOMS

HOSPITAL

THE CASTLE GARDEN MISSIONARY



EMIGRANTS LEAVING CASTLE-GARDEN.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICE

EMIGRATION—FROM FIRST TO LAST—SCENES AT CASTLE GARDEN

UP THE HARBOR
S TO THE CASTLE-GARDEN BOATS

PASSING
THE INSPECTING PHYSICIAN

EMIGRANTS

THE LUNCH ROOM

BATHING ROOMS

HOSPITAL

CASTLE-GARDEN.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICE

—SCENES AT CASTLE GARDEN

THE STEPMOTHER.

GOD gave to me a mother's heart, though not by right divine,
That dearest name to woman's ears I dare to claim as mine;
A mother's strong sweet tenderness, her ever watchful care,
Her patient, self-denying love and yearnings fond are there,
And only from that pure deep fount could come the swelling tide
That bears at times my spirit up with such exulting pride,
To hear from innocent childish lips that dearest, sweetest name,
Alike to lowliest peasant wife or highborn titled dame.

God gave to me a mother's heart, there was a wistful hope,
A fond protecting tenderness, that vainly longed for scope,
Until these dear ones to my care and fostering love were given,
To win the right to share her name whom God hath called to Heaven;
But not with jealous heart and ruthless hand would I efface
From out their childish memories of that lost one a trace,
The precious germ of natural love! Oh! let it flourish still,
And may God make me wise and good that mother's place to fill.

God gave to me a mother's heart, a heart that pleads for love,
Yet many a sad reluctant fear, with trembling hope hath strove,
That all my patient tenderness and efforts are in vain
The sweet return of reverent and guileless love to gain.
It may be that my own fond heart, with over-anxious pride,
Is fain to ask, and hope too much, ere it be satisfied,
And even to their hidden depths affections springs are stirred,
Though not, as yet, the gushing forth of waters free be heard.

God gave to me a mother's heart, and howsoe'er it be,
My love must be the same for them, whatever theirs for me,
As fervent in its tenderness, as wistful and as pure,
As self-denying in its strength, as patient to endure;
For if with persevering love and hope I sow the seed,
Sooner or later, in His time, God sure will give the meed;
If but with faithful mind and true I do a mother's part
He yet will give the children's love who gave the mother's heart.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LI.—A FIRST TASTE OF CHARITY.

WHEN a man is, or fancies himself, at the very lowest stage of fortune, and is inclined to give way, and accept misery, ruin, possibly even death, without another struggle—so black seems the gloom, so intense the despair—let him just then have a new and unexpected pang superadded, and the chances are, if there be any real strength in his soul, he starts at once to his feet, confronts the new enemy with resolute indignation, and then finds it possible to resume his whole duty of antagonism to enemies, whether old or new, and again to begin the march of life, prepared for fresh pain, but nerved by the thought that there may also yet be fresh triumph.

So was it with Anthony Maude, when roused by the sudden appearance of Esau as a fugitive, while he was in the very midst of his own anguish and despair. All his personal troubles and depressions were forgotten in the excitement of the scene that ensued, and when the two men drove off with their captive Anthony strode after them, with new strength alike of body and mind, hoping to be able to track them, and to release his kinsman.

His kinsman! Was it possible, he asked himself, that this vagrant lad was his uncle's grandchild? Was it for him that that most earnest and touching letter of appeal had been written? Did Esau know all along of his relationship? Or if he had not known, was it some suspicion of that kind that had first brought him to the alderman's garden, and so enabled him to give the warning about the burglars, and eventually to become an inmate of the place?

None of these questions could Anthony answer. What would he not have given for even five minutes' talk with the poor boy? But such reflections were useless now. On, on! That was the only way to deal with the case.

Every person he met—no matter what the rank in life might be, and whether walking or in carts, or in handsome equipages—he questioned as to this mysterious cart and its inmates. But after following for miles two or three different indicated routes, along which, he was led to believe, such a cart had passed, he, an hour after midnight, faint, footsore, and utterly worn out, gave up the pursuit, convinced he had missed them altogether, and never once been upon their true trail. In all probability they had gone out of their proper road, choosing the most unfrequented ways, and so had left the neighborhood in the darkness of evening and of night, without leaving even a vestige of their presence behind.

Again Anthony sat down for rest and for thought. This time his seat was in the porch of a wayside inn. He laughed bitterly as he said to himself—

"The next best thing to being inside is, I suppose, to be outside, when one has such a luxurious place of shelter." Then the terrible mood began to grow tenderer, for he was thinking of Clarissa, and her sweet words of parting, and her gift.

"Yes; her gift. He had still that bank note for five pounds hidden away within his clothes. He had never even when taking it from her, consented in heart to treat it as his own; but only was willing to let her feel that he had it. That seemed to him the true use of the gift. That she might always be able to say, "He has that!"

In the enthusiasm of his love, and the instinctive desire to rise, in spirit at least, above the shameful calumnies that were pressing him down, he had determined to be able to say to her, whenever they should again meet, "See, I have it still!"

But now he was obliged to face the very pertinent but most unpleasant thought, "Can you maintain these over refinements of fancy? Would you, for instance, Mr. Anthony Maude, literally starve yourself to death, in order that the note might be found on your dead body? Clarissa would hardly admire the good sense of that!"

No! Anthony felt he was getting the worst of the argument; but, as is often the case with disputants, only became therefore the more obstinate. He decided at last not to part with the note. But when he rose to leave the porch he was so faint and sick that he dared not trust himself to set out across the wide common that lay before him. He paused and looked through the top of the red-curtained window.

Some dozen men sat there eating and drinking. The warm glow of the fire and the sight of the food made him desperate. He had opened the door, and strode in before he knew what he was about.

The handsome landlady who was serving at the bar gave a little scream when she saw him standing there. The men looked up, and stared hard at the shabby, pale and weary stranger.

"Will you give me a drink of water, mistress?"

She gave another little scream, and the men stared the harder.

"Tut, sir," said the landlord, after a pause, "water's cheapest, but this is nearest, and 'll do you more good," and he gave him a pewter mug of ale.

He drank it quickly, thanked them both, and turned to go away. When he got into the porch he fell on the seat again, hid his burning face in his hands, and burst into a wild, raging laugh.

"I can't stand it," he said; "it's too strong for me—my first draught of charity! Yes, it's gone to my brain—it's made me drunk! I mustn't try it again. My darling's note must go."

Strange to say, one word that had reached his ears while he stood in the warm glow of the ale-house rang in them still when he was half-way across the common. It was the name of a place that he seemed to have heard before, and which had pleasant associations for him.

"Long Wickham! Long Wickham!" he kept repeating. "Where have I heard it before? Why, it was on the signpost as I crossed the common."

But he had not been long satisfied with this conclusion before he remembered when and where he had really heard the name first. His step grew lighter, his face bore the moonlight on it without looking so ghastly. Anthony Maude remembered he had yet one friend left.

Away went Anthony through the darkness and the solitude of the roads; and although the miles proved more than he had reckoned on, and although Anthony's strength was so broken down when he began his journey that he took a longer time than he had intended, and though he had to go ten miles out of his way to get an answer to a certain letter, still he did not change Clarissa's note.

The letter he had written was a noticeable letter. It was to Dr. Pompess. A letter that had caused Anthony a world of emotion to prepare; not only because the doctor was Clarissa's father, but because the very subject of his letter was one of unmingled pain and humiliation.

But here is the letter to explain itself:

"Dear Sir—Forgive my addressing you so soon after recent occurrences, but the matter is one that I am sure you will be inclined not only to excuse but to listen to, for it is one of justice and humanity. These, I know are sacred things in the eyes of Dr. Pompess.

"You will not have forgotten the appeal to me contained in the alderman's letter, to find out if his grandchild still lived, and, if he did, to take care of him. I employed Mr. Sleuth to go to Leeds and make inquiries. He failed, so he said, to discover the child, and believed he was dead. That child is Esau, the vagrant lad, whose intelligent mind, I have no doubt, attracted your attention, as it did mine. This wonderful circumstance I have only just discovered, through the lad's following me, and then being reclaimed by violence, and carried off by his father and another brutal ruffian.

"Why, you may I ask, do I write to you? Simply because I cannot write to Mr. Sleuth. And yet this poor lad ought not to be sacrificed. I put his cause, therefore, into your hands. Mr. Sleuth cannot refuse to fulfil the moral obligation that accompanies the legal bequest of the alderman.

"I could say much more, but nothing that I could say would be of a tithe of the importance compared with one word from you. I am sure you will say that word, because I know, in spite of the unhappy circumstances that make me appear so different to you from what I really am, that there is not in the whole country a gentleman into whose hands the poor and the oppressed could better trust their cause, than into the hands of him whom I have the honor now to address, and to wish a profound and respectful farewell. ANTHONY MAUDE.

"P.S.—A reply addressed me at the 'Post Office, Reddon,' will be greatly esteemed."

Such was the letter which Anthony wrote to the doctor, hardly expecting to get a reply when he should first reach Reddon, his place of destination, but intending to wait there, whatever happened, till he did get one. To his surprise, as he limped in, one evening of a most wearying day, and tried to straighten and erect himself, and conceal the shabbiness of his clothes and of his fortune by a brave front, he found a letter, evidently from the doctor, waiting for him.

With agitated fingers he broke open the cover, with an insane hope of finding a crumb or two of comfort for himself, in addition to solid, good news for Esau; but there was no letter from the doctor inside, only an enclosure—another letter to the doctor—and these words, "With Dr. Pompess's compliments."

The enclosure proved to be a letter from Sleuth to the doctor. Anthony looked at it with as intense a feeling of repulsion as if a toad, or some one of the nameless creatures he had seen schoolboys draw from the slime of a ditch pond, had suddenly appeared on the table before him among his food.

However, it had to be read, and read it was, to this effect:

"My dear Dr. Pompess—I have read the letter from that unfortunate, but I hope not intrinsically wicked young man. I do think he is only unfortunate, and therefore to be pitied. Yes, doctor, I wish to think this, for the credit of the family; and, therefore, I shall not complain of his writing to you instead of to me. Will you, then, be good enough to inform him that while he was writing I was acting? I have seen Esau's father—a poor man, of vulgar manners, but not, I think, at all deserving my cousin's phrase, 'a brutal ruffian;' and I have, after much anxious meditation as to my duty in the eyes of God and man, thought it best to leave Esau with his natural protector. I can't think it right to separate parent and child. What a beautiful and holy relation it is! I asked myself what you would have advised, and I knew at once what to do and how to do it. I have paid the father ten thousand pounds, as a fortune for him and his son, and he is going to Australia—perhaps has gone—to break off his son's bad connections here, and begin in that glorious country a new career. I enclose, you doctor, his receipt, which please to retain for me.

"I should have mentioned this to you the instant the matter was settled; but I knew what you would say—how you would speak of the action—and I could not feel myself justified in receiving even your kind and delicious sympathy in such a matter. No, Dr. Pompess, this is my duty; duty—noble word! So don't, I beg you, make me vain, by praising me for it; for, indeed, I am only too glad to have an encouraging word from you. I am ever your grateful servant,

"RICHARD SLEUTH."

Why does Anthony read this letter—so thoroughly detestable as he finds it—over and over again, as if he could discover lurking meanings behind every word, that did not dare to show themselves, but which he was determined to trace out?

"So, so, so!" he muttered to himself at last. "I must be blind indeed not to understand. Dick Sleuth is an infinitely more dangerous person than I ever gave him credit for! Ten thousand pounds he says he has given, and the doctor has got the receipt. Hem! If so, my letter serves only as a petty foil for my noble cousin's magnificent act. And this is the reward of my movement, is it?

"But what else is the scoundrel after? That's the question. Will he—can he—influence the doctor so far as to——"

Anthony, with an almost frantic gesture, drove off the thought that was in his brain, and again limped away to find the house of the only friend the world had left him, and whose reception now became more dubious, as it became more than ever necessary.

CHAPTER LII.—THE CAPTIVE.

"KEEP your 'ed down, will yer? Now, listen, you young reperbate. We're a-goin' through a willage, or place of some kind. If you sings out only one note, or lifts your pate up but a single inch, down upon it will come the 'andle of this 'ere whip, and into your mouth goes that chice morsel, the gag. D'ye hear?"

There was no answer.

"All right, mate," said the other man. "Don't be hard on the youngster. He'll come round in good time."

Bob looked savagely round to see if any of the people in the houses they were passing were taking special notice of them, then gave another savage glance at Esau's face, which he could just see, with one bright, dare-devil eye still looking at him, as much as to say, "If his tongue's silent, here you may get the truth."

But when they had passed through the town, Bob, as if he had been reflecting on his comrade's advice, all of a sudden changed his tone and look, and became as gracious as the sun in winter, when he looks out after a long period of gloom, and rain, and fog, and weather miseries of every kind.

"Esau, lad!"

The bright eye looked and gleamed with unwonted lustre, as if in wonder, but the boy was still silent.

"Esau, lad, let's have a bit o' talk. I don't want to hurt yer. I want to be a blessin' to yer. Arn't I your father, your true and only parent, as begot yer, and is made of the werry same flesh and blood? When I hits out at yer, don't yer think as it's I as feels the blow wuss? O' course I do. Arn't I got nateral feelin? O' course I have. Well, then, look yer here. What's the use o' your lying there, and bringing on stitches in your side, and all sorts of bad ailments, in lyin' so long in one place, and on hard boards; and I say, Esau, ain't the hends of the rivets in the iron work just a stickin' up under your poor thin bones? Well, this is what I've got to say. You may sit up here along on us, and be as merry as a grig, if yer like. And what's the price of all this accommodation? Why, only that you says plainly, like a lad of sperrit, you won't try to escape."

"I will!" said Esau, grinding his teeth.

"No, you won't, you unnatteral varmint. I'll take care on ye."

And Bob turned away to cogitate in renewed anger on this fresh proof of Esau's unfilial behavior.

"Tell him, mate," said the other man, "what you're going to do. He aint know'd much good about yer, I dare say, afore this. You don't understand the lad. But, as you say, he's your own flesh and blood, and if you have such bright prospects as you talk of, tell the lad that, and don't jaw at him as if you thought words were all the poor lad wanted. I don't see anything amiss with you. I don't see why he and you shouldn't get along together."

"Hear that, Esau? Arn't he as good as a parson? That's right, lad! Out with it. You and I used to have many a row together, when you wern't old enough to be so d——d impudent to me as you got arterwards. Shall it, or shan't it?"

"Shall what?" asked Esau.

"Shall I set you free, so as you may do as you like—be one on us?—sit up here?"

Bob didn't wait for an answer when he found that even then the "hardened" young fellow didn't hurry to speak. He undid the fastenings, and made the boy get up between himself and the other man, and sit there.

"Cramped?"

"Yes," said Esau.

"Could you walk a bit?"

"I'd like to try."

"With all the pleasure in life, my boy. Here, take my hand, and I'll help you down."

Bob did as he said, and did more than he said—he got down too. And he rubbed the little fellow's hands, and made him drink out of a bottle, and then he made him laugh by some touchy joke, and then they ran a few yards together. He (Bob) all the while held fast the hand.

"I call this fine, Esau; and I means to make a day on it. No, don't you be afeard. I don't mean in the old way. Take your davit, my boy, of that. I can't afford it just at this present. Let me see you run now—without my hand!"

"Did Bob mean it?" was the question in Esau's eyes. Yes, he did mean it. So Esau took a little run to test his limbs, and judge what he could do, if he should again see a chance. Of course he wasn't going to try any silly schemes just now. So he came back after a run on the green sward, and a climb up a high elm-tree, which last movement gave Bob considerable alarm, for he was wondering what on earth he should do if Esau were to go up to the top and stay there.

This seeming acquiescence brought fresh goodness into Bob's heart, and when they reached a great town or city, which the boy learned was Southampton, Bob began to show what he meant by "making a day on it." After pulling up the horse and cart at a miserable little inn in the suburbs, he and Esau went out into the street, and although Bob did not continuously hold his hand, he did do it occasionally, and when he did not, Esau saw the other man always hanging about in the rear—one of their party, but always behind the party, as if to keep watch on the boy's every moment.

They went into a clothier's shop, the companion staying outside.

"Let's see some of yer best things for this young gent, my son! None o' yer slop goods, but the best slap-bang articles, prime materials, and all that sort of thing, you know."

Esau, to his boundless astonishment, now found himself trying on article after article; till no less than four complete suits had been selected—one strong and rough for "knocking about in the bush" as Bob said, and one of glossy black cloth, "fit to pay a wisit to the governor if he were to happen to call on one in the back settlements, and ax them to come and see him." The other suits were for ordinary every-day use.

"Here, young man, I and my boy here have had a kind o' windfall lately—ten thousand pounds—not, mind you, but we had a right to it: we're on the family! But as I was sayin', or goin' to say, we ain't any use for these articles (Esau's cast-off clothing). Make a present on 'em, with my compliments, to any deserving hobject!"

And so Esau, who went in, in a suit that but too plainly told of his tatterdemalion days, came out a gentleman.

"Arn't I a parent? Esau, I ax you that?"

Getting no satisfactory answer, he added:

"Arn't I made a gentleman on you?"

"Gentlemen has tin in their pockets—I ain't!"

"Werry true. But Rome, my boy, warn't built in a day. We'll see to that all in correct time. Now, Esau, let us go in here, and see what a sort of a father you were running away from."

It was a silversmith's they had stopped at. The companion, as usual, stayed outside on the watch.

"Now, Esau, you're in for luck to-day. Try it on. You won't often catch me in sich moods, I can promise yer; for even my fortin' couldn't stand too much o' sich doings. Have a good look at everything, and then tell me what you'd like most."

Esau did look; and although there was much in his heart that would have impelled him to scorn such gifts, he was but a boy, and this was his father; and, somehow, his secret resolves never to be taken out of England—if that was what was intended—were melting like icicles in the hot sun of Bob's generosity.

Watches, rings, breastpins, chains jostled in his busy imagination. Never yet had the boy possessed an ornament of the kind that was worth sixpence. He coveted greatly a gold watch; but then, as he thought that would seem too extravagant, he was content to covet a silver one. But then, was that the thing he could be quite decided on to take, if he had a choice? A breastpin of real gold, with a big head—also real gold—and a blue real gem in it, that, also, he greatly affected.

"Like a watch?" said Bob, after a sly pause.

"Yes."

"Gold one?"

"Yes."

"Please, sir," said Bob to the master—a respectable, white-haired old gentleman—"how much?"

"Why, that, I think, is more expensive than you would like; it's a half chronometer, and——"

"How much? Can yer tell me that?"

"Thirty-five pounds."

"Well, put it by, till I see what I'm a goin' to do. Fire away, Esau. Have a pin?"

"Yes."

"Real diamond, like this one?"

"Yes."

"How much?"

"Ten guineas."

"Put it along o' the watch, will yer? Let's look at the rings. Esau, tell me which you like the best on 'em. Mind, I don't say I'm a goin' to give it you. Even a gen'leman of fortune must draw the line somewheres, and I suspects I ought to draw it on this side o' rings. But show us which you would choose."

A ring worth six guineas was added to the growing board, towards which Esau's glistening eyes were constantly directed.

Your a goin' to ruin me, Esau—ruin your poor parent. But never mind. If you do werry much like that chain, why, I suppose it's no use taking the watch without a sort of gold cable to hold on by when thieves are a sniffing and smelling about you. So put that, mister, too."

Esau hardly knew what to believe. He to have all these things, and from a father whom he had never in his childish years known but as a most cruel and brutal taskmaster! It must be a dream. He must have had a fit of insensibility come over him when he received that last blow in the cart, and he must be still there, bruised, and bleeding, and sore, and this was only a vision that he was passing through.

Bob, however, soon re-assured him by his next proceedings.

"I say, mister, these here are expensive harticles, and I don't feel quite easy in my mind about 'em; but anyhow I'm not going to leave you in the lurch. Just show me, while I calkelate a bit, some of your cheapest things in watches, and pins, and rings, and chains."

Bob didn't ask Esau to select from the articles now produced. He simply selected himself a silver watch at 30s., a breastpin at 2s., a ring at 3s. 6d., and a chain, resplendent in false magnificence, at 10s.

To the shopkeeper's surprise, Bob now coolly had both lots put up, though in separate parcels, and he paid for them in bank notes that bore the "strictest investigation" of the uneasy shopkeeper, who was finally satisfied, and then they went out.

"Now, Esau, take you this lot of cheap rubbish, and I'll take the other. What? Yer ain't pleased! Ye're looking down in the mouth! Ye're taken in and done for! No, my boy. I ain't sich an unnatteral parent as you're a thinkin' on. I means you to have all on 'em; only, my boy, we must come to a sort of understanding first—eh?"

"What do yer want on me?" demanded Esau, as they walked along towards the shipping they saw in the distance.

"To make a gentleman on yer. To tell you things as'll make the eyes on yer inclined to start out of yer 'ed. To begin; that jolly old halderman was your grandfather."

"The alderman—who was murdered?" gasped Esau, who had been in a kind of stupor ever since he had heard the strange things said by Bob and Anthony in their brief converse.

"Ay; but least said soonest mended. If ever yer says that agin in my hearing —— But there, I'm a'goin' to a new world, and I wants to take new feelins with me. But mind, though it wasn't me nor any of my friends as killed the halderman, we had best hold our tongues. The heir has given all that money yer heerd me speak on——"

"Ten thousand pounds?"

"Ay; it's a jolly lump, ain't it? And what's to prevent me from setting up on my own account as gentleman when I gets out to Australia, and you to be my son and heir? Nothing. Hark to the sound on it—son and heir! We'll have a coat o' arms, and get miles o' land, and be squatters, and get some eddication and go into Parliament. I say, Esau, don't it make yer laugh! Bob Stonor in Parliament, and legislating for some of his old pals! But won't I play the game—can't I play the game? You'll see—that is, if you're a natteral child, you'll see—one as thinks of his parent's future glory, then you will."

"Can't yer say what you wants, without sich a lot of talk?"

"Will yer go with me to Australia, then? Honor bright—no nonsense about trying to escape. If yer will, by the lord, I'll be a good father to yer, and never go out at night without yer, nor ever lift my hand agin' yer, even if I can't help a bit o' tongue when yer gives me a bit of cheek. There, that's what I've got to say. Will yer think on it? Will yer be a reasonable, intellectooal fellow-creature, as knows his own hinterests, and grabs 'em fast when he sees 'em come in his way? I scorn to take advantage on yer. You're a big boy for yer age—I mean in intellect—and if yer like to throw away your share of the old fellow's blunt, what's it to me? Boys is plenty in that ere world, I'll be bound; but it's the onkindness of it that I shall feel all my born days. Now let's go to the inn, and have a jolly good supper, for the ship sails in the morning. And now, if you ain't ashamed to run away from a parent who's doing all this 'ere for you, and is ready to do almost anythink, if only you'll ax him in a dootiful way, why, then, do as yer likes. Run, if you says run. I and my comrade ha' quite made up our minds not to go arter you any more."

Esau was undoubtedly impressed by the prospect opened to him, and in a lesser degree by the confidence professed in his good sense in leaving his fate in his own hands. But Esau could not get over—so, far, at least, as to talk freely—the restraint he felt with his father. Bob understood, and didn't press for any immediate decision.

They had a supper, which Esau could not resist enjoying any more than he could resist the new attitude of his father towards him. Gleams of his old fun began to break out before he was aware of what he was doing; and it was only when his companions began to roar at his sallies that he was warned, and strove to be silent.

But he was drinking, and becoming exhilarated by the wine, which his father incessantly gave; and though, with that healthy instinct which supplied in him the absence of the knowledge, experience and discipline that most boys of his age pass through, he soon began to refuse the wine offered. Still, he could not but own, whenever he forgot Anthony's anguished face and pleading cry, as he had seen and heard them so briefly in that late twilight, that, on the whole, he thought he had better accept the fate designed for him, and try to make his father remain in his present gracious mood by cheerful acquiescence in his plans.

And though Esau said nothing to his father, the latter, whose keen eye was continually watching him and speculating about his secret thoughts, saw he was succeeding. And when they went to bed that night, what could be more natural, not only that Bob should ask Esau to share his bed, but that, somehow or other, there came a time before they slept when some real touch of nature in Bob's heart oozed forth, and was responded to first by a joke, then by tears, and then by a boyish clasp round the neck, where those arms had not been for so many years.

Esau was, however, very restless in his sleep that night, kicking and tossing, and chattering, and saying, "Yes, sir," and "No, sir," when Bob growled at him. Once he found him panting on his shoulder, and crying:

"You knew I shud come back, sir, didn't you? You knew I shud, Mr. Anthony? And look at this watch, sir, and this, and this! We can have suppers now."

"You'll have one you won't like, my boy, if you don't lay still," said Bob, jerking him off.

THE FROZEN SHIP.

ONE serene evening in the middle of August, 1775, Captain Warrens, the master of the ship Greenland, whale ship, found himself becalmed among an immense number of icebergs, in about 77 deg. of north latitude. On one side, and within a mile of his vessel, these were of immense height and closely wedged together; and a succession of snow-covered peaks appeared behind each other as far as the eye could reach, showing that the ocean was completely blocked up in that quarter, and that it had probably been so for a long period of time. Captain Warrens did not feel satisfied with his situation, but there being no wind, he could not move either one way or the other, and he therefore kept a strict watch, knowing that he would be safe as long as the icebergs continued in their respective places.

About midnight the wind rose to a gale, accompanied by thick showers of snow, while a succession of thundering, grinding and crashing noises gave fearful evidence that the ice was in motion. The vessel received violent shocks every moment, for the haziness of the atmosphere prevented those on board from discovering in what direction the open water lay, or if there actually was any at all on either side of them. The night was spent in tacking as often as any cause of danger happened to present itself; and in the morning the storm abated, and Captain Warrens found to his great joy that his ship had not sustained any serious injury. He remarked with surprise that the accumulated icebergs which had on the preceding evening formed an impenetrable barrier, had been separated and disarranged by the wind, and that in one place a canal of open sea wound its course among them as far as the eye could discern.

It was two miles beyond the entrance of this canal that a ship made its appearance about noon, to the great astonishment of the crew of the Greenland. The sun shone brightly at the time, and a gentle breeze blew from the north. At first some intervening icebergs prevented Captain Warrens from distinctly seeing anything but her masts; but he was struck with the strange manner in which her sails were disposed, and with the dismantled aspect of her yards and rigging. She continued to go before the wind for a few furlongs, and then grounding upon the low icebergs, remained motionless.

Captain Warrens' curiosity was so much excited that he immediately leaped into his boat with several seamen, and rowed towards her. On approaching he observed that her hull was miserably weather-beaten, and not a soul appeared on the deck, which was covered with snow to a considerable depth. He hailed her crew several times, but no answer was returned. Previous to stepping on board an open port-hole near the main chains caught his eye, and on looking into it he perceived a man reclining back in a chair, with writing materials on a table before him, but the feebleness of the light made everything very indistinct.. The party went upon deck, and having removed the hatchway, which they found closed, they descended to the cabin. They first came to the apartment which Captain Warrens viewed through the port-hole. A tremor seized him as he entered it. Its inmate retained his former position, and seemed to be insensible to strangers. He was found to be a corpse, and a green damp mould had covered his cheeks and forehead, and veiled his open eyeballs. He had a pen in his hand, and a logbook lay before him, the last sentence in whose unfinished page ran thus: "Nov. 14, 1762. We have now been enclosed in the ice seventeen days. The fire went out yesterday, and our master has been trying ever since to kindle it again, without success. His wife died this morning. There is no relief."

Captain Warrens and his seamen hurried from the spot, without uttering a word. On entering the principal cabin the first object that attracted their attention was the dead body of a female, reclining on a bed in an attitude of deep interest and attention. Her countenance retained the freshness of life, and a contraction of the limbs showed that her form was inanimate. Seated on the floor was the corpse of an apparently young man, holding a steel in one hand and a flint in the other, as if in the act of striking fire upon some tinder which lay beside him. In the fore part of the vessel several sailors were found lying dead in their berths, and the body of a boy was seen crouched at the bottom of the gangway stairs. Neither provisions nor fuel could be discovered anywhere; but Captain Warrens was prevented, by the superstitious prejudices of his seamen, from examining the vessel as minutely as he wished to have done. He therefore carried away the logbook already mentioned, returned to his own ship, and immediately steered to the southward, deeply impressed with the awful example which he had just witnessed of the danger of navigating the Polar seas in high northern latitudes.

On returning to England he made various inquiries respecting vessels that had disappeared in an unknown way, and by comparing the results of those with the information which was afforded by the written documents in his possession, he ascertained the name and history of the imprisoned ship and of her unfortunate master, and found that she had been frozen thirteen years previous to the time of his discovering her among the ice.

THE STAR OF DESTINY.

The Empress Josephine.

WHEN a few centuries shall have thrown their shadows upon the strange fortunes of Napoleon, and given to everything about him the tinge of romance, the story of his first wife will seem to the student rather a fable than a fact; he will look upon her as we look upon Mary of Scotland, but with a deeper interest; for she, far more truly than her lord, was, from first to last, 'the child of destiny.'

Told, while yet unmarried, that she would be a wife, a widow, and then Queen of France—the entire fulfilment of the first part of the prophecy gave her courage to believe in the last part also when under sentence of death. When her bed was taken from her, because she was to die in the morning, she told her weeping friends that it was not so, that she should yet sit upon that throne on the ruins of which Robespierre then stood triumphant; and when asked in mockery to choose her maids of honor since she was to be queen, she did choose them, and they were her maids of honor when half of Europe looked up to her. On that night, which was to have been her last on earth, Robespierre fell. Had he fallen a few days earlier her first husband would have lived; had his fall been but one day later, Josephine herself would have been among the ten thousand victims, whose names we have never heard. But he fell on that night, and her destiny was accomplished.

She married Napoleon, and through her and as her husband, he was appointed to the army of Italy; step by step they rose, till at last the crown rested on her head. The second part of the prophecy was proved true, and she began to look forward to that loss of power and rank which had also been foretold, and which was to close the strange drama of her life.

And he that wedded the child of destiny grew every day more strong and more grasping. In vain did Josephine attempt to rule his ambition and chasten his aims; he was an emperor, he wished to found an empire, and by slow degrees he made himself familiar with the thoughts of putting her away.

When the campaign of 1809 was at an end, hardened and narrowed, the general came back to his wife; his former kindness was gone, his playfulness was checked, he consulted her but seldom, and seldom stole upon her private hours with that familiar love that had so often made her heart leap. She saw that her hours drew nigh.

It was the evening of the 20th of November, the Court were at Paris in honor of the king of Saxony. Josephine sat at her window looking down upon the river, and musing on the dark fate before her, when she heard Napoleon's step at her door. She sprang to open it, using her usual exclamation, "Mon ami!" He embraced her so affectionately that for an instant all her fears and woes seemed vain. She led him to a chair, placed herself at his feet, and looking up into his face, smiled through her tears.

"You are unhappy, Josephine," said the emperor.

"Not with you, sire."

"Bah!" said he, quickly. "Why call me sire? These shows of state steal all true joy from us."

"Then why seek them?" answered Josephine.

The emperor made no reply. "You are now the first of men," she continued, "Why not quit war, turn ambition out of your counsels, bend your thoughts on the good of France, live at home among those that love you?"

"Josephine," said he, turning his face from her, "It is not I, it is France demands the sacrifice."

"Are you sure of that, my lord?" said his wife. "Have you probed your heart to the bottom? Is it not ambition that prompts you to seek reasons for repudiating me?—for, think not, Napoleon, I misunderstand you; are you sure it is the love of France?"

Every word that she spoke touched him to the quick; and rising hastily, he replied, "Madame, I have my reasons. Good-evening."

"Stay, sire," said she, taking hold of his arm, "We must not part in anger, I submit. Since you wish it, I submit cheerfully. It is not my nature to oppose your will, I love you too deeply. Nor shall I cease to love you, Napoleon, because I am to leave your throne and your side. If you still go on victorious I shall rejoice with you; if reverse comes, I will lay down my life to comfort you. I will pray for you morning and night, and in the hope that sometimes you will think of me."

Hardened as he was, Napoleon had loved his wife deeply and long; and her submission to his stern resolve—her calm but mournful dignity—her unshaken love, moved even him; and for a moment affection struggled with ambition. He turned to embrace her again. But in that moment her face and form had changed. Her eye was lit with a fire like that of insanity, and her whole person seemed inspired. He felt himself in the presence of a superior being. She led him to the window, and threw it open. A thin mist rested upon the Seine, and over the gardens of the palace—all around was silent; among the stars then before them, one was far brighter than the rest; she pointed to it.

"Bonaparte," she said, "that star is mine, to that and not to yours was promised empire; through me and through my destinies you have risen; part from me and you fall. The spirit of her that foresaw my rise to royalty even now communes with my spirit, and tells me that your fate hangs on mine. Believe me or not, if we henceforth walk asunder you will leave no empire behind you, and will die yourself in shame and sorrow, and with a broken spirit."

He turned away sick at heart, and overawed by the words of one whose destiny had been so strangely accomplished. Ten days were passed in resolves and counter-resolves—and then the link that bound him to fortune was broken. Josephine was divorced—and, as he said himself at St. Helena—from that hour his fall began.

Josephine was divorced, but her love did not cease; in her retirement she joyed in all his successes, and prayed that he might be saved from the fruits of his foul ambition. When his son was born, she only regretted that she was not near him in his happiness; and when he went a prisoner to Elba, she begged that she might share his prison, and relieve his woes. Every article that he had used at her residence remained as he left it; she would not let a chair be moved. The book in which he had been last reading was there, with the page doubled down, and the pen that he had last used was by it, with the ink dried on its point. When her death drew nigh, she wished to sell her jewels to send the fallen emperor money; and her will was submitted to his correction. She died before his return from Elba; but her last thoughts were of him and France; and her last words expressed the hope and belief "that she had never caused a single tear to flow." She was buried in the village church of Ruel, and her body was followed to the grave, not alone by princes and generals, but by two thousand poor whose hearts had been made glad by her bounty.

Her marble monument bears only this inscription:

"EUGENE AND HORTENSE TO JOSEPHINE."

What a fund for future writers in her character and fate; and what a lesson to all of us, whether in prosperity or adversity?

EMIGRANTS LEAVING IRELAND.

THE engraving on our first page gives a view of the emigrants leaving their homes in Ireland. The drawing was made by Mr. Joseph Becker, the Artist whom we sent to Valencia Bay, Ireland, to sketch the laying of the last Atlantic cable, and faithfully portrays the way in which thousands daily leave their homes for this country.

The place is the village of Cahircelveen, county Kerry a place of 1,800 inhabitants, and communicating with the great points of embarkation by mailcoach.

In all such scenes there is a great heart history, and these partings seem saddest of all. There is, perhaps, the aged father and mother bidding adieu to the child whom they will never see again, the brother parting from brother, sister from sister; a few of them with hopes, perhaps, that they may be sent for, but the most of them in a state of expressive grief, for none have stronger expressions in their grief than the Irish.

The picture will be regarded with interest, as forming the first link in the great chain we give on another page.

CASTING OUT DEVILS IN INDIA.

THE Carnatic (India) Telegraph says: "Casting out devils in India is extensively practised by the natives; but there is as much difficulty to get at the truth as it is to get the spiritualists, the Davenports, to declare themselves consummate cheats. We were present a few weeks ago at an exercise of exorcism. The possessed was a young woman of about 16, hale and hearty in appearance, and withal "very good-looking," as is the expression applied to native women. She much excited as she accompanied, or rather preceded, her exorcist, and broke out occasionally into singing and dancing with an energy and manner which showed that she had no self-control. The party which went with her stopped at a tree on the way, when the exorcist desired her to halt. His command instantly brought her prostrate before him, and she rolled on the ground in violent contortions. But it was objected by her father to fix the demon to that tree; and accordingly the exorcist addressed his patient in a tone of sternness to rise and go on further. She did so, and with a running dance to the sound of the tomtom and the Pujara's hand-drum, she rushed along seemingly unconscious of all around her. They halted then under a palmira tree, in a desert place, near the foot of a hillock, where the poor girl was desired, to the music of the priest's hand-drum, to balance herself gracefully, and approach the tree. She did so, and then embraced it with a tremor, the effect of compulsion rather than free will. The exorcist went through a few strophes of incantatory singing; then taking a few locks of her hair, and knotting them together, he fastened the bunch to the tree by a nail, and then seizing a live cock in one hand over her head, with the other he cut its throat, and shed its blood freely over the stooping stumbling girl. He then cut off her hair, and thus freed her from her fastening to the tree. The blood-stained bunch of hair thus left behind, it is said, detains the devil also, and that he, or a legion thus exorcised, will haunt that tree till he or they shall choose to take possession of some other unfortunate. The girl seemed now weak and exhausted, and could hardly walk forward with a steady pace. She was held by one of the male assistants of the priest, and conducted to a tank where she was bathed, somewhat like our Baptist sisters, in her clothes, and came out of her own accord, hardly yet in her right mind. But the scene was not over. The Pujara broke a cocoanut, and after placing it over the smoke of incense for a little while, he lifted the smoking censer to her with the usual incantatory music and singing. She again gradually lost her consciousness, and swayed to and fro with wild dishevelled locks. Her exorcist demanded of her to tell him her demoniacal name. She sharply turned upon him, and with a scream uttered her name. He then inquired how many devils had possessed her, to which she replied, five. Have they all taken their departure? he asked. Yes, was the reply, and immediately after she ran along dancing frantically, while the party ran after her to her house, where, after other devilish ceremonies, she recovered consciousness, and the following day was married. We ought to have remarked that the demoniacal possession took place on the first day of her nuptial rites. She is now all right again, and lives happily enough with her young husband."

CHINESE COOKERY.—In a Chinese cookery-book appears this curious and cruel receipt for cooking turtles: The turtle is placed in a vessel of water on the fire, with a lid over it, having an aperture of sufficient size, and so arranged that the turtle can just get his head out, and within the reach of highly-spiced wine. As the temperature of the water increases, so does his thirst, and he gradually goes on drinking the seasoned fluid until the heat kills him, by which time his whole system has become impregnated with the vino-aromatic seasoning, and a flavor, described as delicious, is imparted to the flesh.

THE LAST OF THE CONDES.

LOUIS HENRI JOSEPH DE BOURBON, Duke of Bourbon and Prince de Condé, only son of Louis Joseph, Prince de Condé, and descendant, in a direct line, of the illustrious Condé, the greatest military genius of the seventeenth century, was born April 13th, 1756. He was educated for the army; but ran away from his teachers, and for some time played the knight-errant. At the age of 15 he fell in love with the Princess Louise of Orleans, whose hand, however, was refused to him by her father. The princess was sent, for greater security, to a monastery; but her young lover scaled the walls of the sacred retreat, and leading away his bride, married her secretly. But the union was not happy. The princess entered into various intrigue, one of which led the young husband into a duel with the Count d'Artois, afterwards King Charles X. The provocation occurred at a bal masqué in the palace of the Tuileries. The count, having a lady on his arm, was followed by the princess, who from motives of jealousy, seized his hand, attempting to speak to him. Not knowing his interlocutor, the count in his turn grasped the mask of his fair follower, who suddenly turning round, broke the strings, and thus was exposed to the gaze of the whole assembly. A challenge from the Prince de Condé to the Count d'Artois was the immediate result. The duel took place at the Bois de Boulogne; and both parties having been slightly wounded, it had no further consequences but a separation of the prince and princess.

On the breaking out of the civil disturbances, the prince quitted France, in July 1789, and retired to Brussels. Declaring it his firm opinion that the revolutionary fever could be easily cured by a few "whiffs of grapeshot," he forthwith set to organise a small army of emigrants, the command of which was taken by his father. He himself prepared to lead the cavalry; while his son, the Duke d'Enghien, only offspring of the ill-fated union with Louise of Orleans, took a subordinate command. Beaten in all directions, father, son, and grandfather had to leave the field of battle, and to seek safety in flight. The Prince de Condé went to England, his father to Russia, and the young Duke d'Enghien to Ettenheim, in the duchy of Baden, to make love to the fair Princess of Rohan-Rochefort, and to meet a miserable end in the ditch of the fortress of Vincennes.

THE STAR OF DESTINY—THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

The news of the assassination of his only son was a fearful stroke to the Prince de Condé, who had only just begun to find calm in the quiet rural retreat of Wanstead, Essex. With that impetuosity for which his race was distinguished, he now again rushed into the excitement, seeking solace for his troubles in the pleasures and dissipations of town. At the greenroom of Covent Garden he met Sophia Dawes, the daughter of a fisherman of the Isle of Wight, a woman of great natural tact and of masculine strength of mind, who to the charms of beauty united those of singular conversational powers. A wealthy foreigner, who for a time contemplated making her his wife, had placed her for several years at one of the first academies of the metropolis, where she succeeded in mastering many accomplishments. These advantages, assisted by an exquisite natural grace, soon made her the centre of a host of admirers. She lived in sumptuous style at Turnham Green, following the profession of the stage more for her own amusement than for the sake of the salary. The Prince de Condé had no sooner made the acquaintance of Sophia Dawes than he became violently enamored of her. Laying his whole wealth at her feet, he entreated her to put herself under his protection. She consented, but under the condition that her position should not be made public.

In the suite of the Prince de Condé was a brave young soldier, the Baron de Feuchères, of good family, but in greatly reduced circumstances, who had to thank the prince from being saved from misery and almost starvation in a foreign country. On this young nobleman Sophia Dawes set her eyes, and having made his acquaintance, told him a romantic tale, to the effect that she was the illegitimate daughter of the prince by an English lady, and that her father having lately acknowledged her, intended to take her back to France, should circumstances permit it. The romance had its effect on the head and heart of the impressive Frenchman; he offered his hand to the fair lady, and at the end of a few weeks Sophia Dawes became the Baroness de Feuchères. Immediately after occurred the overthrow of Napoleon, and the restoration of the Bourbons, followed by the reinstalment of the Condés into all their former possessions and dignities, with many additional honors and pensions. The Baroness de Feuchères, not choosing to continue the comedy any longer, now threw off the mask towards her husband, informing him frankly that she was the "friend" of the Prince de Condé. He left her in disgust; but was too much attached to his old benefactor to take any steps for separation or public exposure. The prince, after his return to France, led a sort of roving life, but at his father's death, in 1818, settled down on his magnificent domain of Chantilly, where the baroness also soon installed herself.

The noble mansions and grounds of Chantilly, once the residence of the family of the Montmorency, were given by Louis XIV. to the Great Condé; the illustrious general here spent his latter years, in the society of Racine, Boileau, Bossuet and other literary men of his age. He was also honored by frequent visits from the king himself, one of which was rendered memorable by the suicide of Vatel, the most enthusiastic of cooks, who ran himself through with a sword, because his master's dinner was left imperfect by the non-arrival of a basket of fish. Condé's descendants continued here till the this particular way is to be regretted. During these proceedings, the Prince de Condé became restless. He stated publicly that he had known no peace of mind since the fatal demand to make his will had been pressed upon him. He passed whole nights without sleep; and the quiet retreat of Chantilly was often disturbed by the sound of angry words between him and Madame de Feuchères. Incautious expressions often escaped him in presence of the servants, who once heard him exclaim: 'My death is the only thing they look for.' Another day he forget himself so far as to say to M. de Surval, his steward: 'Once they shall have obtained from me what they desire, my life may be in jeopardy.' On the 23th of August, 1829, M. de Surval was witness to a terrible scene between the Prince de Condé and the Baroness de Feuchères. 'Madame,' cried the old man, 'it is horrible, atrocious, thus to put a knife to my throat to make me do a thing you know I abhor;' and, seizing her hand, he added with a significant gesture: 'Well, then, plunge the knife in at once —plunge it!' The passion of the Prince de Condé was too extreme to be of long duration. After he had signed the will, he fell into a sort of stupor, from which he was scarcely aroused by the thunder of the cannon of July 1830, which drove his friend and relative, Charles X., from the throne of France.

AUSTRALIAN ADVENTURE—FIRE, WATER AND RATS.

The revolution had been but just completed, when dark rumors began to circulate about the chateau of St. Leu, near Chantilly, where the Prince de Condé had taken up his residence. It was reported that on the morning of the 11th of August his highness had been found bleeding over the eye, and had ordered his valet to sleep for the future at the door of his bedroom. Some days after the prince was visited by the new prefect, who brought him the star of the legion of honor; but he was silent and embarrassed. On the evening of the same day a horseman was seen riding towards the chateau, and at night was secretly introduced into the prince's bedchamber. The rider was M. de Choulot, a secret agent of his highness, and from some words he had dropped it was surmised that the prince intended escaping from France, to get out of reach of Madame de Feuchères. The next morning, the 26th of August, a violent scene took place between the prince and madame, which was, however, hushed up, to some extent, by the latter. Nothing extraordinary transpired during the rest of the day. The dinner was apparently cheerful, and was followed as usual, by a game of cards; the prince played whist with the baroness and two visitors, criticised some movements, lost money, and did not pay, saying: "To-morrow." The morrow was never to come.

His highness was attended to his bedroom by Leconte, his valet; and the latter inquiring: "At what hour does monseigneur wish that I should enter the room to-morrow?" replied, "At eight o'clock," with his usual tranquility. So the valet went away, locking the door of the outer dressing-room, as was his custom.

The Prince de Condé's bedchamber had two doors; the one opening upon this dressing-room, which led to the great corridor of the chateau, and the other passing on to a private staircase, leading to a lobby, where the apartments of Madame de Feuchères were situated. The former door was locked by the valet on the night of the 26th August, but the latter remained unfastened. The watchmen and gamekeepers during the night made their usual rounds in the park and through the chateau, but nothing unusual happened.

On the morning of the 27th the valet knocked at his master's door, at eight o'clock, according to orders. He found the lock fastened inside, and received no reply from the prince. After waiting a few minutes, Lecomte went away to call M. Bonnie, as his highness's physician. The two knocked again as loud as possible, but still no answer. Surprised and very uneasy, they both went down to Madame de Feuchères.

THE LAST OF THE CONDÉS.

"I will run up directly," she said. "When he hears my voice he will reply," and she ran out from her room half undressed.

On coming to the prince's door with M. Bonnie and Lecomte:

"Open the door, monseigneur," she cried; "open the door, c'est moi!"

She repeated the summons, but all remained silent within.

The alarm now began to spread through the chateau. Many servants came running up, an iron bar was brought, and the door of the bedroom was broken open. Then an extraordinary spectacle presented itself to the eyes of all the bystanders.

The room was dark, the window-shutters being completely closed, and only a faint glimmer of light was proceeding from a small candle in the fireplace, hidden by a metal screen. When the eyes had been accustomed to this dim light, it was seen that the prince was standing against the window, as if listening intently to something outside. But still he spoke not. Then the valet opened one of the shutters, and a frightful sight burst upon all. The Prince de Condé was hanging from the window-clasp, his feet just above the ground. Madame de Feuchères sank groaning into an armchair. "Monseigneur is dead!" cried the bewildered domestics, and all the denizens of the chateau stood wailing in sight of the corpse of the last of the Condés.

The body of the prince was fastened to the clasp of the northern window with two handkerchiefs, passed one within the other. One of these hung loosely over the window-clasp; the other surrounded the head, supporting the base of the lower jaw. There was no running-knot on the handkerchief around the head, it did not press on the windpipe, and left the back of the head and neck completely uncovered. It was also so loose, that when no attempt was made to take the body down, the valet put his fingers between. All this was very extraordinary, and greatly surprised the the bystanders. So also did the whole aspect of the prince. His face was deadly pale; the tongue did not protrude from the mouth, but only pressed against the lips; the hands were firmly closed, the knees bent, and, what was most surprising of all, the points of the toes touched the carpet. Great was the marvel among the domestics; but though many a whisper was heard, nobody dared to speak his suspicions. The magistrates and police arrived soon, and copious reports were drawn up regarding the state in which the body of the Prince de Condé had been found, the evidence of the servants, and the situation of the bedchamber of the deceased.

No sooner had the cold body of the prince been taken down from the window-clasp, than the household of Mr. Lee began to feel the influence of a new master. "Everything here belongs to Madame de Feuchères," was the order given in all directions; and such several is the dispatch and careful instructions to protect the property of the baroness. The docile household, long under the partial sway of the baroness, therefore began to comprehend the new duties; and the magisterial inquiries concerning the prince's death were almost unanimously replied to in the sense that he must have died by his own hand. The evidence to the contrary purport was nevertheless strong. Lemanze, the prince's favorite valet, had taken down the corpse, deposed that he had had the greatest difficulty in untying the knot from the window-clasp, so skilfully had it been fastened, and so strongly drawn through the knot. Now, it was notorious to every one of the prince's servants, that his highness's awkwardness in tying strings was so great that he was unable even to fasten his own shoelaces, and that the bow of his cravat had to be brought round to him at the two ends by his valet, to adjust it in front. This was owing to a physical defect impossible to be overcome, the prince having received, in one of his campaigns, a sword-cut over the right hand, besides having his left collar-bone broken. The body had been found in a state of very incomplete suspension, and it seemed all but impossible that an old man, who was scarcely able to walk, should have had the courage and energy to throw himself on his knees to effect his death. His bed, too, was found moved from the bottom of the alcove where it always stood, and his slippers were carried to a part of the room where they had never been. Two candles were found extinguished, but not burned out, on the chimneypiece. Was it the prince who extinguished them, before commencing his complicated and difficult preparations for self-destruction?

Public opinion would soon have left off occupying itself with the Prince de Condé's death, had not its memory been revived before the courts of justice by M. Louis de Rohan, the prince's next of kin. This nobleman went so far as to accuse Madame de Feuchères of fraud, and boldly demanded the nullity of the testament. He caused a preliminary investigation to be made before the court of Pontoise, and then removed the case to the superior court at Paris, where, after endless delays and postponements, it came on finally in the spring of 1832, at the end of eighteen months. In spite of the long time which had elapsed since the death of the prince, the trial excited the most intense interest. The advocate of the Rohan family, M. Hennequin, in a brilliant speech, unfolded the last years of the life of the Prince de Condé, and from a contrast between the well-known legitimist sentiments of the deceased and the tenor of the will, he deduced the proof of the disposition of the property having been obtained by fraudulent means; in the impossibility of suicide, he saw the proof of assassination. Louis Philippe and the members of the royal family were more than alluded to in the speech; and the words murder and conspiracy were all but openly pronounced. However, M. Hennequin's eloquent oration was replied to by a still more forcible speaker, M. Dupin. He represented the suit of the Rohans as a mere plot got up by the reactionary legitimist party against the liberal Orleans family and their friends; as an effort of vengeance which all the partisans of the revolution ought to view with indignation and contempt. The decision of the judges was finally against the plaintiff.

THE ARTIST'S ENCAMPMENT.

This trial completed the triumph of Madame de Feuchères. Petted by the court, the possessor of numerous chateaux and splendid domains, the lessee of patronage, the successful speculator at the Exchange, she soon became the idol of a society that seemed to have completely forgotten the grave accusations heaped upon her a short time previous. Nevertheless, the baroness did not seem at ease, and gradually retired from the brilliant throng around her into the company of grave-looking priests. Then the news came that she had become a Roman Catholic; had been baptized at Notre Dame de Lorette, and had received, after full confession, forgiveness of her sins from the reverend Père Brizat. The next which was heard of her was, that she was gradually selling all her splendid domains. The Palace Bourbon was bought by the government, to be used for the enlargement of the House of Deputies; St. Leu was purchased by a minister of the crown; the chateau and park of Morfantaine fell into the hands of a stockbroker, and Montmorency became the property of a Hebrew poet. Numerous chapels and convents, all more or less richly endowed by the pious baroness, sprang up in the neighborhood of Paris; and the belief gained ground that she intended giving up the whole of her numerous fortune to the holy church of Rome. The priest in her immediate neighborhood shared this belief, and her confessor especially was earnestly and daily exhorting her to make a will to this effect; but, however, she seemed unwilling to do; and being more and more pressed on the subject, she suddenly, in the summer of 1840, took her secret departure from Paris. Having traveled through part of England, and paid a visit to the peaceful home of her youth, the Isle of Wight, the baroness at last settled down in London. Here she was suddenly taken ill, and lingering only a few days, died towards the end of January, 1841. Her remains were interred without pomp in the cemetery on the Harrow Road, where the curious visitor may yet inspect the grave. By a last will and testament, made previous to her departure from France, the baroness left nearly the whole of her remaining property, not given to the church, and which amounted still to above £200,000 sterling, to a child of ten years old, the daughter of one of her sisters, who had married a French gentleman. Though she died a fervent Catholic, she left some hauded property, which she had purchased in England, to a Protestant clergyman whom she had known in early life. To her husband, the Baron de Feuchères, who had not held any communication with her since the death of the Prince de Condé, she bequeathed a legacy of £10,000, which he, however, declined to accept. The same refusal took place on the part of M. Odillon Barrot, the eminent orator and politician, whom the baroness made one of the executors of her will, with a gift of £4,000. He accepted the duty, but declined the legacy, making it over to an institution for the education of orphans at Paris. After an interval of more than ten years, Frenchmen felt still haunted by the shade of the last of the Condés.

Of all the immense property left by the testament of the Prince de Condé to Madame de Feuchères and the son of Louis Philippe, not a fragment belongs at the present time to them or to their heirs. The baroness sold every part of her share before she quitted France; and the prince was compelled to sell his portion by a decree of the supreme imperial government, during the confiscation of the Orleans property in France. Being put up to public auction, the estate of Chantilly was bought by two English gentlemen, partners in the banking concern of Coutts & Co. The heart of the last of the Condés lies still enshrined in its silver urn in the chapel of the chateau; but the church itself knows no more the sound of vespers and mass. The memory of the Great Condé, and the greater Louis Quatorze, and the greatest Vatel, is already forgotten in the busy whirl of Stock Exchange news, which has little sympathy with famous generals, or with tyrant kings, or with cooks who kill themselves for glory. It is typical of modern history, that the family of Condé should have given way to the family of Bankers.

THE ENCAMPMENT ATTACKED.

Mr. Atkinson, the Artist, in Central Asia.

A PASSION for sketching natural scenery seems to have been the sole motive which induced Mr. Atkinson, the author of "Oriental and Western Siberia," to spend no less than seven years in wanderings in Siberia, Mongolia, Chinese Tartary and part of Central Asia, of which that work is the extraordinary record. His explorations extended as far as the immense chain of Spasshon, never before seen by any European, and included a large portion of the western part of the Gobi, ever visited by English men since his visit hitherto to the west—"scenes," says the enthusiastic sketcher, "on which no pencil had previously been employed." Altogether, he journeyed about 32,000 versts in carriages, 7,100 in boats, and 20,300 on horseback—in all 59,400 versts (about 39,600 miles), in the course of seven years.

During this time Mr. Atkinson kept his journal, giving a simple narrative of facts with scrupulous care, and omitting all details of mere fatigue, and amid the pressure of numerous difficulties. He suffered much both from hunger and thirst, and numerous narrow escapes from starvation was placed in critical situations with the wild tribes of Central Asia, more particularly when among the Kirghis he was the first Russian who had visited the settlement. Several times he stood in the presence of what appeared to be inevitable death, and had numerous adventures in the way of escape and sketching on the brink of precipices, often with a perpendicular depth of 1,500 feet below him. In spite of the difficulties of traveling in these deserted regions, he produced no less than 560 sketches of scenery, executed with moist water-colors particularly suitable for a portable aid to an artist under such circumstances.

"I have used these colors," he says, "on the sandy plains of Central Asia, in a temperature of 113° Fahrenheit, and in Siberia have had them frozen as solid as a mass of iron, when the temperature was 11° below the point where the mercury becomes solid, and when I could make it into balls in my bullet-mould."

Not the least of the difficulties which the traveller and his attendants had to contend with arose from the attacks of wild animals. An adventure with wolves in the plains of Mongolia affords a good specimen of this kind of difficulty. The wanderers had reached a sandy steppe, almost destitute of vegetation. The sun was sinking fast, and lengthening their shadows on the ground, when on the summit of a hill they observed a small lake in the next valley. With green herbage round its shores. The sight was gratifying; even the horses seemed to scent the welcome grass, and to quicken their pace.

A little before dark they reached the lake, and found rich herbage for their horses. The water was, fortunately, found to be fresh; a few bushes were procured for a fire, and the way-worn party soon prepared their quarters for the approaching night. While riding along the grass several double snipes had been seen, and the artist lost no time in getting his double-barrel gun and ammunition, by the aid of which he returned before dusk with birds enough to form a supper for half a dozen persons. Some venison which they had also with them, the remains of the spoil of a previous hunt, was soon added by the Cossacks in a stew, which soon send forth a savory smell. It was a lovely night, the sky covered with brilliant stars, and not a sound was abroad save the crackling of the fire, and the bleating of the flocks.

EXPERIENCE OF A SAILOR—THE FROZEN SHIP.

The welcome supper ended, the horses were so secured that they could not stray far away; the entire party were lying down, and none were asleep, when suddenly the watchers heard a howling in the distance. The Kalmucks were instantly on the alert. It was a pack of wolves following their track; and a distant howl every now and then told them that they were approaching. The men started up, collected the horses, and secured them on a spot between the party and the lake. They had among them five rifles and a double-barrel gun, which the leader of the party took with him.

Their fire was nearly out; but it was thought better that they should receive their disturbers in the dark, or let them come quite near, before a light was shown, when they should be able to see them, and, at a signal, pour in a volley. Again they heard them nearer, evidently in scent of their game, and all lay ready on the ground watching their approach. It was not long before they could hear their feet beat on the ground as they galloped towards them. In a very few minutes the troupe came up, and gave a savage howl. The men were reloaded as quickly as possible, as they knew that the wolves would return. They could hear them marking, and some of the wounded howling, but too far away for them to risk a shot. The fire was let down, and they remained perfectly quiet. Shortly there was a great commotion among the horses, when they discovered that the pack had divided, and were stealing up to their animals on each side between them and the water.

The Kalkas and Kalmucks rushed up to their steeds, uttering loud shouts, and this drove the wolves back. It was now necessary to guard both horses on these sides, as they could hear the savage brutes quite near; and the men anticipated that they would make a rush, cause the animals to break loose, and then hunt them down. If this had happened they would have been left without horses in the morning, as those that were not killed would be scattered far over the steppe.

A Cossack and a Kalmuck now turned to guard the opposite sides, as each side, Mr. Atkinson watching the front. The fire was now lighted, and kept in a constant blaze by the Kalkas adding small bushes, which also enabled them to see as well as hear their savage enemies. Presently Mr. Atkinson discerned their glaring eyeballs moving to and fro nearer and nearer, then he could distinguish their grizzly forms pushing each other on. At this moment the rifles cracked to his right, and the fire sent up a bright light, which enabled him to make sure of one fellow as he turned his side towards him. He sent the second ball into the pack, and another one must have been wounded by the howling which arose in that direction. The other men had fired, he did not doubt but with equal effect, as he was certain they would not throw a shot away.

In a few minutes the growling ceased, and all was still, except the snorting of some of the horses. Both Kalkas and Kalmucks assured him that no one must sleep on his post. To increase their difficulties, but a few hours left, and water could be obtained near them; therefore it was only by a most vigilant watch that they could save their horses.

The night became very dark, and nothing could be seen at a short distance excepting towards the lake, where any dark object could be observed against the light on the water. Sharp and keen eyes were peering out in every direction, but no wolf was seen or sound heard. The Kalkas said the wolves had waited till all were still, when they would make a dash at the horses. The party had been watching for a long time without the slightest sound, when two of the horses became uneasy, tugging at the thongs, and snorting.

The clouds rolled off, the stars shone forth, and reflected more light on the lake. Presently howling was heard in the distance, and one of the men declared that a large pack of wolves was coming. When they approached nearer, those who had been so quietly keeping guard over them began to growl, as they now knew that they were not far away. As it was now deemed absolutely necessary to procure some bushes, four of the men crept quietly along the shore of the lake, two of them armed, and in about ten minutes returned, each having an armful of fuel. The embers were kindled, and nothing more, on them to be blown into a flame the moment it was wanted. The sound that they had heard in the distance had ceased for some time, when suddenly there was a great commotion; the other wolves had come up, and the snarling and growling became furious. For a time they appeared to be individual combats, but no general engagements, and then all became calm as before.

Again they waited, looking out for more than half an hour, when the horses began pulling and plunging violently; still they could see nothing. The noise was now so tremendous, and in a few minutes the bushes burst into a blaze, when he saw a group of eight or ten wolves within fifteen paces, with others behind. In a moment he gave them the contents of both barrels; at the same instant the other man fired, when the pack set up a frightful howl, and scattered off.

The fire was kept burning for some time, but the travellers were not disturbed again during the night. At daylight they examined the ground, and found eight wolves dead; others had been wounded, as they ascertained by traces left on the sand, and their men carried off the skins of the slain as trophies of the engagement.

VALUE OF A BLONDE RINGLET.

THERE appears to be one thing, after all, that is more valued for not having cost anything! The following incident, which we find in a French paper, illustrates the truth of this apparent impossibility. At a Charity Fair, lately got up by the benevolent fashionables of Paris, the Princess F—— had a counter, covered with elegant trifles. One of her gay acquaintances, Count de R——, approached the stall, and after looking at all the articles, was walking quietly away.

The lovely shopwoman, upon this, called out to know whether he was going to be so unconscious as to pass without buying something.

"I would," he said, "if you would sell me what I want."

"Well—what is it?"

"That lock of golden hair which falls so beautifully to your shoulder!"

"You shall have it," replied the princess, very promptly, and, taking out a pair of scissors, she clipped it close to her neighbor. It was then duly wrapped in a paper and handed to the count. "Five hundred francs," said the princess.

The count as promptly drew a check from his wallet, and filled it up for the amount, secretly thinking it was rather dear, but pocketing it with a very chivalric grace.

The next day, the count, telling the story with some triumph to his sister-in-law, who happened to be an intimate friend of the princess, was surprised to find her received with a burst of laughter.

"The princess made a good bargain out of you," said her sister, "for a few days ago, the five hundred francs which she changed you for that ringlet, were returned to her as much as a dozen times by the hairdresser for the whole wig!"

Now, what if the count have valued that lock of hair considerably more? Has not the princess had considerably more generously paid anything for it?

Men—A crop of hair on the soft is worth more than when it is harvested and brought to market.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A NEWLY married couple went to Niagara on a wedding tour, and were desirous to convince them that he was as brave as he was gallant, resolved to go down the Falls in a barrel. The bride, of course, objected, but finding that he was determined, affectionately requested him to leave his pocketbook and watch behind.

A CELEBRATED Oxford scholar, who professed an intimate acquaintance with every wink he had thought at on checkers which had been performing a game with him, was regaled with the most impressed by the wonderful coincidences of the fiddlers' elows."

In the castles and palaces of the ancient aristocracy of Europe, are to be seen the tapestry presents memorials of their pride of ancestry. On the tapestry in the apartment of the Duke of Choiseul is represented the Deluge, in which a man is seen swimming with a portmanteau in his mouth.

"My good friend, save the archives of the Choiseul family!"

TOM MOORE said to Peel, on looking at the picture of an Irish orator:

"You can see by the gaiety of his lips."

"Yes," said Peel, "and the wrong coming out of it."

"Yes," said Tom, "the truest of his countrymen, who never told a lie."

"He meant aval coming out of it."

A LITTLE girl in Pennsylvania was lately reproved for playing outdoors with boys, and informed that "nice little girls don't play with boys for that now." But with all imaginable innocence, she replied: "Why, mother, the boys are the better we like 'em!" Grandma took time to think.

THE "local" of one of our Southern exchanges, tells the following amusing incident:

"There was a little Berkshire pig,
And he fell out of his father's cart;
Along came a Freedman Bureau fellow,
And picked him up and put him in his mother."

A CHINAMAN, living in San Francisco, being kicked out the shop of a Jew, upon picking himself up, exclaimed: "Me no like dat; me always know you last man; you kill Moloch (American) man's Josh!" The Jew replied: "Never mind when it is known that" Josh" is the Chinese for God.

WHEN Voltaire was ordered by the Senators of the council of the French Republic to write a speech in 24 hours, the incorrigible scoffer at all things venerable and sacred, replied: "Magnificent sirs, it requires only three minutes!"

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment is now open every day in the New York Herald. Circus and Drama twice each day. Only Circus Company in the City. Performing Lions, Trick Dogs, Comic Mules, and thoroughbred Hors s. TRICK PONY, WILD BILL. A Drama of the Equestrian Stage in Saw and Dashing Acts of Horsemanship. Previous to Circus, the Great Sensation Drama, WHITE HAIR; or, THE ASSASSIN STEWAID. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer: Three numerous Living Giants; Three of the Smallest Dwarfs in the World; the beautiful Miniature Lady, Miss Rosa Lee Read; two beautiful Circassian Girls; John Batterday, Living Skeleton, weighs 67lb; Gunnel Batterday, Fat Boy, weighs 703lb; Diminutive Baby Horses. A Steam Glass Engine in motion; Albino Boy; Camerama Scenes; Dancing Mules; Performing Aquaria, 100,000 curiosities. Admission, 50 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

FRANK LESLIE'S

No. 34—Just Published

CONTAINS

The Baronet's Wife. A Story. Illustrated.
Hearts and Diamonds. A Story. Ill.
Sable Hunting. Ill.
A Mennonite Match. Ill.
Daniel in the Lion's Den. Ill.
Jasmine. A Poem.
The Rector of St. Mark's. By Mrs. Mary J. Holmes—continued.
A Grand Old Poem.
Cleveland Hall—continued.
Self-Made Men—Ezra Cornell; with Portrait.
The Mothers of Great Men. Ill.
Blarney Castle. Ill.
Ice-Boating Fishing. Ill.
An Opre. Ill.
The Extinction of a Man of Business. An Essay.
Hints for Paper and Pencil.
Chit-Chat for the Ladies.
History of Millinery and the Toilet. Ill.
Weighing the Great Mogul. Ill.
The Dandy Walks. Ill.
The Wild Horse of Texas. Ill.
Jock's Advenure with a Serpent. Ill.
Grandmother Whitehead's Lectures—More about the Globe we Live on.
The Old Gray Goblin. A Fairy Story.
Picture of the Warp.
Family Fastimes.
Enigma and Anagrams. Three Comic Illustrations.
And a large amount of inter-sting miscellaneous matter.

FRANK LESLIE.
537 Pearl street, N. Y.

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5
THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 19, 1863; improvements patented June 5, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CORDING attachment, is most Wonderful and Unparalleled in Mechanism or Novelty; is noiseless in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and works horizontal, sews with Double Thread on Single Thread of all kinds. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and rapid than the Lock Stitch, with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stit hes to each evolution of the wheel. Will hem, fell, bind, braid, cord, tuck, run up, ornament, &c., requires no Change of Stitch—is NOT LIABLE TO get out of order, and will last a Lifetime. Warranted the strongest machine made. Warranted not to get out of order for three years. It has taken the Premiums at New York and other STATE FAIRS, and received the FULL APPROBATION of the Practical Journals, and of those who have used them.

"The Family Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, make the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $5. Six dollars guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 192 Nassau Street, N. Y.

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y.
or

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN—Red or Brown, $2 50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE LINED—$7, $9, $11, $13, $15.
FRENCH—Full Size, Finished, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $70 to $300.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

NEW MUSIC.

COME SING TO ME AGAIN: "Have heard sweet music sing." Song and Chorus.....30c.
THE HAUNTING THOUGHT (Reichardt): "I love but thee." German and English words.....40c.
I CANNOT SING THE OLD SONGS, by Claribel.....30c.
Ditto, with variations, by Richards.....40c.
SILVER TRUMPETS, played at Rome on Christmas Eve.....25c.
SILVER TRUMPETS, Grand Processional March.....35c.
LIFE'S DREAM IS O'ER: Song and Chorus.....30c.
Mailed, free. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS!

AMERICAN POCKET TIMEKEEPER.

FIFTY CENTS EACH.

The most novel and useful invention of the age. Combining the most highly approved scientific principles, and warranted to denote solar time with greater accuracy than the most expensive gold or silver repeater, while the low price at which it is sold places it within the reach of every one. It is emphatically a time-piece for the million. Neat, cheap, and warranted perfectly accurate; can never get out of order. No one should be without it. Price, with white enamelled dial in gold or silver case, by mail prepaid, $1 00. Liberal to any part of the world. CAUTION.—This invention is the sole property of the American Manufacturing Company, and all parties are cautioned against buying or offering for sale any Watches under the name of, or the ALTERATION OF NAME. Address AMERICAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Post Office Drawer 72, Astor House, New York. 537-38

Love, Courtship and Married Life— Whom to Marry, When to Marry, and Whom not to Marry; Likes and Dislikes; Adaptation; Right Age to Marry; Marrying Cousins; Jealousy; Is Cause and Cure; Sexual Rights and Perverted and Single; with Physiognomy, Ethnology, Physiology and Psychology, in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1866. New volume begins now. Only $3 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York. 537-38

LADIES DESIRING A SMOOTH, CLEAR AND

Should use GEORGE W. LAIRD'S Bloom of Youth. Has no equal for removing Pimples, Freckles and Discolorations and Skin. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot 74 Fulton street, New York. 538-41

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865.

No. 14858	drew	$100,000
No. 9230	"	30,000
No. 15339	"	15,000
No. 2	"	10,000
No. 16316	"	5,000
No. 7702	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.
Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid, in cards. 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address E. KEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our well known lines of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, were manufacture for the following, viz:

Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views

Of these we have an immense assortment, including

VIEWS OF THE WAR.

Obtained at great expense and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION STRUGGLE

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,
Yorktown,	Fortress Trains.
Gettysburgh,	Hanover Junction.
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain.
Savage Station,	Chickamauley,
Fredericksburgh,	City Point.
Fairfax,	Nashville,
Richmond,	Petersburgh,
Deep Bottom,	Belle Plain,
Manitoria,	Harrisburgh,
Fort Morgan,	Atlanta,
Charlestown,	Mobile,
Florida,	Strawberry Plains,
	&c., &c.

American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c., including Stereoscopes to suit the above. Call and examine our extensive assortment at our Private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of stamp.

Photographic Albums.

We were the first to introduce into the United States and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $40 each. Our Albums are the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any other.

Copying and Enlarging Pictures.

We have all kinds made to order. 533

The Trade will find our Albums the most Salable they can buy.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects (in addition to our collection of the leading society of Amerlcan Americans, &c., viz.:

100 Actresses,	150 Authors,
100 Ballet Dancers,	150 Statesmen,
175 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,
50 Actors,	100 Prominent Women.

Including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, &c., &c., from all parts of the World. An order for One Dozen Pictures from our Catalogue, will be filled on receipt of $1, and a set (300) for $25.

Photographers and others desiring to exchange duplicates, can find it to their advantage to correspond with their order.

tf The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

MUSIC OMNIBUS.

Popular Songs, Marches, Quicksteps, Polkas, Schottisches, Waltzes, Operatic Selections, Quadrilles, with cards and figures, etc., for

VIOLIN, FLUTE, FIFE OR CORNET.

Number One—20 Tunes...price $1 25, mailed.
" No. 2—300 " " " " "
" No. 3—500 " " " " "

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, every description, at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

Agents wanted to distribute Circulars everywhere. Address H. TABER & CO., Boston, Mass.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell the Chronology of the Rebellion. A complete History of the War. Agents paid by day when desired. For Circulars, etc., address G. W. TOMLINSON, Publisher, Boston, Mass.

Agents Wanted.—New Book—Now Ready.

Get the best from Official Sources.
The great Military Leaders—GRANT and SHERMAN.
The popular Historian, J. T. HEADLEY.
Author of Life of Washington, Napoleon, Mountains, etc.
Complete in One Volume, Handsomely Illustrated.
The most attractive Volume out on the War.
Active Agents are selling 100 copies per week.
Extra inducements offered. Send for Terms.
Address E. B. TREAT & CO., 130 Grand street, N. Y.

Whiskers! Whiskers!

My Golden Compound will force the Beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Information given or sent by mail for 50 cents. Address
FRANKLIN & JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

144 COMIC VALENTINES $1
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.
B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 537-40

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
537-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK,
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,
War Views, Statuary, Groups, etc., etc.

Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. "French, English and Italian novelties.
tf

New Sheet Music.—Choice and Desirable.

MY MOTHER'S SWEET GOOD-BYE. Ballad. Keller, 30 cents. I KNOW HE WILL RETURN. Song. Reduction, 30 cents. I HAVE LOVED THEE FOR YEARS. FOOTSTEPS. Song and Chorus. Keller, 30 cents. I HAVE NO JOY BUT IN THY SMILE. Ballad. Keller, 30 cents. COT WHERE THE OLD FOLKS DIED. Song and Chorus. Reduction, 30 cents. KISS ME WHILE I'M DREAMING. Song. Winnemeth, 30 cents. Sent postpaid, on receipt of price, by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen—

Sample and Catalogue sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address
tf JAS. F. MANCHES, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

$7 Per Day!—The best chance ever offered. Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. Address M. M. SANBORN, Rensher Falls, N. Y. 537-38

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

WONDERFULLY STRANCE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address

Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-36 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y

PARLOR ORGANS.

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, was awarded us by the late great FAIR of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, over all competitors, for the best instruments.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial. The award for the second best Instrument of this class was made to James M. Pelton, exhibitor and agent of the Pelouben organ; and the third award was given to Mason & Hamlin."—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms."
G. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."
GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"The best Instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHAS. FRADEL.

Illustrated Catalogues sent by mail.
CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
528-40 No. 97 East 23d Street, N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,057, P. O., New York. tf

---

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $6 50 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers
21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired. 531-42

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

U. S. STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 Arch Street, Philadelphia,
42 John Street, New York.

Samples and Prices on Application. Lots made to Order of any Pattern or Stamp required.

Caution: These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

For sale at retail by all stationers throughout the country. R. ESTERBROOK & CO.
530-37

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools readily yield to these peerless remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

Here it is!—Full instructions by which a person can master the art of Ventriloquism in a few hours, and make a world of fun and a fortune, sent by mail for 50 cts. Satisfaction given, or money refunded. Address FRANKLIN & JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill. 537-39

Curl your Hair!

My Golden Beauty will curl your hair into waving curls, and last six months. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address
537-39 M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

B. T. HAYWARD,

208 Broadway, N. Y.,

Manufacturer of Odd Fellows, Masonic, Army, Navy, Base Ball, Skating Club, Railroad Conductors, and Badges of every description. I will send a sample coin silver on the receipt of $1 50, together with my wholesale Illustrated Circular.

FENIANS!

IRISHMEN,

IRISH-AMERICANS,

Friends of Freedom,

WEAR THE

IRISH LIBERTY PIN!

This splendid little emblem of the noble Brotherhood, banded together in the holy cause of Liberty, is made of metal, heavily fire-gilt, and is very ornamental. It consists of the Golden Circle, and the Irish Harp upon green silk. (Patented, and copyright secured.) Price, 30 cents; by mail, 35 cents; to Clubs and the Trade, $2 25 per dozen, $24 per gross. Address all orders to B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14, Chambers street, New York.

---

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 35 cents. Address E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.
tf

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MACKEY,
267 Broadway, New York.

$1. WHISKERS. $1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
525-37

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Sent free for FIVE CENTS.
tf Address, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 525-37

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!

NEW! BEAUTIFUL!! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!

A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs, in metal frames, and

HIGHLY PERFUMED.

Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CALVIN WILLIS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address BLACKIE & CO., 718 Broadway, N. Y. tf

---

The Book of Wonders,

A new Medical Work of thrilling interest to married and single. Hints of great value to all. Price $1; Sealed, $1 25. Address
tf GEO. F. ARLINGTON, 658 Broadway, N. Y.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of Price. Address
FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

A Household Necessity exists for the Use of

DURNO'S CATARRH SNUFF,

Which, in the first stages of a cold, acts like magic—Headache, Hoarseness, Diphtheria, and Bronchitis, Sore Eyes, Deafness, Bad Taste and Smell, being the result of Catarrh. This snuff removes and prevents all these, and insures a healthy Head. Its effects are pleasant and safe, even for infants, who suffer from Snuffles.

It has the highest professional testimonials. Sold by all Druggists, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S., for 30 cents, for one box, or $1 for four boxes. Address
JAS. DURNO, P. O. Box 1235, New York.

Wholesale, by D. BARNES & CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y.
534-45eow

PHOTOGRAPHS

Of Tom Thumb, Wife and Baby, Washington Crowning Lincoln, Lincoln and Family, 100 Celebrities, Matrimonial Joys, Matrimonial Sufferings, First Kiss of Love, Love at First Sight, Courtship, Married, My Wife, My Sweetheart, Sweet Eighteen, Diana at the Bath, Toilet of Venus, Oriental Dancing, Spanish Coquette, Morning Bath, Silent Watching, Comin' Thro' the Rye, Longfellow's Children, Child's Prayer (beautiful). Price only 10 cents each, or $5 per 100. TOMLINSON & CO., Publishers, Boston, Mass.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 5291y

---

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1 25, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-37

JOE MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-37

"The Star-Spangled Banner,"

A racy and sparkling paper, only 30 cents a year. Clubs of ten, $2. Specimens FREE. Address "BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H. 534-7

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnhams & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Petre F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Salts, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 3410, Post Office, N. Y. 533-5

$1,500 PER YEAR! We went agents everywhere to sell our IMPROVED $20 Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. The ONLY machines sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine; or at No. 823 Broadway, New York; No. 236 Carter street, Philadelphia, Pa.; No. 14 Lombard's Block, Chicago, Ill.; No. 170 West 4th street, Cincinnati, O.; or No. 8 Spaulding's Exchange, Buffalo, N. Y.
534-46

Vieve Brower; or, Life in the Concert Saloons of New York. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78. HOLLAND, N. Y. 536-39

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Onguents and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

---

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sal Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co, Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND

REMEDY!

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"IT was early in the spring of 1855 that this compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it and got well. J. B. Clark, Esq., editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same preparation in the case of a severe cold, and was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with the results, and so confident of success attending its sales if placed before the public, that he finally persuaded me to give it a name and send it abroad to benefit the suffering. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in Manchester alone one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the lead of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. There is good reason for all this; it is very soothing and healing in its nature, is warming to the stomach, and pleasant withal to the taste, and is exceedingly cheap.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints, the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled. It was not originated for that purpose; but a person in using it for a cough, was not only cured of the cough, but was also cured of a kidney difficulty of ten years' standing. Since that accidental discovery many thousands have used it for the same complaint, and have been completely cured."

The above was written by Dr. Poland in 1860. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as preparations for the cure of Kidney difficulties, in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the New England States.

The past year has given great opportunity to test the virtues of the White Pine Compound. It has been an unusual time for Colds and Coughs, and very large quantities of the White Pine Compound have been sold and used with the happiest effects. It speaks well for the medicine, and the people where it is prepared are high in its praise.

One bottle of this Compound is generally sufficient to remove a bad cough, and frequently I have known persons to have a cold entirely removed in two days by using less than half a bottle. From one to two teaspoonfuls is a large dose. I sometimes put a little white sugar and hot water with it when taken on going to bed.

The limits to which I purposely confine myself in this circular will not allow of that full expression which I would like to give in favor of the White Pine Compound. It is universally admired by all who use it; it has attained to such a popularity among those whose opinion is valuable indeed, that VANITY may possibly, in part, prompt me to record more here than hurried people will have patience to read; so I will stop, by merely recommending to all who need a cough or kidney remedy to test the virtues of the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

TESTIMONIALS.

A very large number of important testimonials have already been received from Physicians, Clergymen, Apothecaries, and, indeed, from all classes of society, speaking in the most flattering terms of the White Pine Compound.

Dr. Nichols, of Northfield, Vt., says:

"I find the White Pine Compound to be very efficacious not only in coughs and other pulmonic affections, but also in affections of the kidneys, debility of the stomach and other kindred organs."

Rev. J. K. Chase, of Rumney, N. H., writes:

"I have for years regarded your White Pine Compound as an invaluable remedy. I can truly say that I regard it as even more efficacious and valuable than ever. I have just taken the Compound for a cold, and it works charmingly."

REV. H. D. DODGE,

of West Randolph, Vt., who is a practising physician, as well as preacher, in a letter to Dr. P., dated May 21, 1863, says: "I find it an excellent medicine in kidney disease."

The White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, is not only as to its name inviting, but is a highly approved medicine. Dr. J. W. Poland, the inventor, has the confidence of the many who know him, a confidence which he enjoyed while laboring usefully many years as a Baptist minister. His experience as a sufferer led him to make experiments which issued in his medical discovery.—Boston Watchman and Reflector.

The editor of the Manchester Daily and Weekly Mirror, in a leader of the daily, thus speaks of the Compound:

"The White Pine Compound is advertised at much length in our columns, and we are happy to learn that the demand for it is increasing beyond all previous expectations. It is the very best medicine for coughs and colds we know of, and no family that has once used it will ever be without it. We speak from our own knowledge; it is sure to kill a Cold, and pleasant as sure. The greatest inventions come by accident, and it is singular that the White Pine Compound, made for Colds and Coughs, should prove to be the greatest remedy for kidney difficulties known. But so it is. We cannot doubt it, so many testimonials come to us from well-known men. Besides, the character of Dr. Poland is such that we know he will not countenance that what is wrong. For years a Baptist clergyman, studying medicine to find remedies for his ailments, with a delicate consumptive look, standing with one foot upon the grave, he made the discovery which has saved himself and called out from hundreds of others the strongest testimonials possible. We have known Dr. Poland for years, and never knew a more conscientious, honest, upright man, and we are glad to state that we believe whatever he says about his White Pine Compound."

Should you think favorably of this medicine, be careful, when purchasing, that it is the WHITE PINE COMPOUND that is offered to you, as we know that other preparations have been palmed off for it by unprincipled dealers.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is manufactured at the

NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT,

106 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON,

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor,

Under the supervision of

REV. J. W. POLAND, M. D.

DR. SWETT will attend to the business department, to whom all orders should be addressed.

Sold by wholesale and retail dealers in Medicine everywhere.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAACK, Chicago, Ill.,
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
COLLINS & BROTHER, St. Louis, Mo.,
WARD, KENNEDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.,
General Agents for the West.

Clergymen,
Teachers,
The Press,

Unite in saying that the new juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and circular to the Publishers, TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.
o

Make Your Own Soap!

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker, warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington street, N. Y.
528-40o

Army Corps Badge Pins and Rings, of 16 carat gold, richly enameled. BRYANT & BENTLEY, Manufacturing Jewelers, 12 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents.
533-45o

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Whiskers and Moustaches

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SEVIGNE'S RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

Ladies and Gentlemen, use the Patent Fasteners. A Pair sent by mail for 25 cents. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. Dealers and Agents, send price for Sample and Trade List. o

A Good Album for holding Fifty Photographs, only $3. $5 Albums for 50 Photographs—metal bound. Very handsome Fairy Albums for 80 pictures, $1 50; for 40 pictures, $1 25. All Albums sent postage paid. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. o

Away with Spectacles. Old Eyes Made New, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

Away with Uncomfortable Trusses. Comfort and Cure for the Ruptured. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
eowo

Husbands, take care of your Wives. Confidential Information for the Married. Sent free in sealed envelope. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York. eowo

Parents, take Care of your Children. Croup—its Causes, Cure, and how it may be prevented. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New. York. eowo

Beware of the Fatal Consequences of NEGLECTING THE FIRST SYMPTOMS OF CONSUMPTION.—When a cough first appears, or a dull pain in the chest, you should use ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM at once. It breaks up the most harrassing cough in an incredible short time, heals the irritated parts and restores health to the system.
o For sale by Dealers in Family Medicine generally.

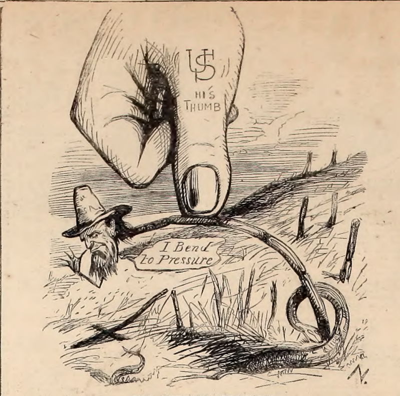
BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of Prof. De BREUX'S FRISER LE CHEVEUX. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

MUSICAL BOXES.



531-43o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

AGENTS WANTED.

Wanted, active and intelligent Men or Women to canvass for Benson J. Lossing's PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT CIVIL WAR IN THE UNITED STATES, got up at a cost of over $50,000, and will contain upwards of 2,000 Engravings. This work has been written since the conclusion of the war, and the engravings are from original designs by the author, who has traveled many thousand miles in the pursuit of his calling; and it will be found the most complete and reliable History of the War published. It has been endorsed by the Governors of all the States and the leading Officers of our Army and Navy, with other prominent men of the country. We give our agents exclusive territory to operate in, and pay a liberal per centage. This work will be sold exclusively by subscription, and will furnish employment to a steady canvasser for several years. Address 535-7o GEORGE W. CHILDS, Philadelphia, Pa.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

THE PRESENT POSITION.

THE GREAT

BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUM.

Elegant Useful Holiday Presents.

Ladies', Gents', Misses' and Children's Slippers, Gaiters, etc.,

At BROOKS' Agt.

575 BROADWAY, N. Y.
o Opposite the Metropolitan Hotel.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. They are not a whisky drink.—Indianapolis Gazette.

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist, 594 Broadway, New York, Agent. 526-38o

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S

Extract Bucku.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-47o

ITCH! SALT
ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by REIDE'S CRIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 35 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 535-47o

FOR THE HOLIDAYS!

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET

TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

An EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen, a Beautiful and Useful Present for the coming HOLIDAYS. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. APPROVED by the PRESS. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to
J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
tfo 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR Kidney Complaints
USE
DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER.
o

DEAFNESS

And Discharges from the Ear Radically Cured,

By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract

OTITINE.

Price $1 50 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. WEEKS & POTTER, Druggists, No. 170 Washington st., Wholesale Agents.

UNION ADAMS,

HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

GOLD AND SILVER
HOLIDAY GIFTS.

$1,000,000 Worth
OF
WATCHES AND JEWELLERY.

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:

100	Gold Hunting-Case Watches	each $125 00
500	Silver Watches	each $20 to 35 00
10,000	Gold Pens and Silver Cases	each 5 00 to 8 00
1,000	Elegant Silver Plated Castor Stands each	20 00 to 50 00
1,000	Elegant Silver Plated Fruit and Cake Baskets, each	15 00 to 25 00
2,500	Sets of Silver Plated Tea Spoons, each	8 00 to 15 00
2,500	Sets of Silver Plated Forks, each	8 00 to 15 00
2,000	Goblets, Engraved	4 00 to 8 00
3,000	Pairs of Table Spoons	5 00 to 8 00
3,000	Pairs of Salt Spoons	3 00 to 5 00
4,500	Magnificent Napkin Rings	4 00 to 9 50
8,000	Pairs of Pendant Ear Drops (assorted colors)	5 00 to 8 00
3,300	Sets Ladies' Jewellery, Imitation Ivory	5 00 to 10 00
2,500	Gold Lockets, engraved backs, watch face, perfect imitation Lady's Watch	10 00
10,000	Ladies' Back Combs, rich and unique patterns	5 00 to 25 00
4,400	Belt Buckles, Gold Jet, and Vulcanite	5 00 to 15 00
6,000	Latest Style Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 20 00
5,500	Gents' California Diamond Pins	5 00 to 20 00
4,000	California Diamond Ear Drops	5 00 to 10 00
3,000	Miniature and Emerald Revolving Pins	5 00 to 10 00

And a large assortment of Jewellery and Silverware of every description. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and one hundred for $15.

Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,
o No. 36 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4270, N. Y.

To Consumptives.

THE ADVERTISER, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure.

To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable; and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address
REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County, N. Y.

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the Superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 537-40o

Great American

PRIZE CONCERT!
AT
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEBRUARY 22d, 1866.

20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $96,300 will be presented to Ticket Holders.

100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD!

One Gift, in Greenbacks,	$10,000
One Gift, in 7.30 Bonds,	5,000
1 Gift, Residence three miles from Chicago	5,000
9 Square Grand Pianos, 9 Gifts, $500 each	4,500
50 Eng. Pat. Lever Gold Watches, $250 each	12,500
50 Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each,	5,000
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches,	5,000
38 Gifts, 38 Silver Lever Watches, $50 each,	1,900
5,000 Gifts 5,000 Tky. Morocco Gold Clasp Albums,	25,000
4,800 Gifts, 4,800 Clasp Albums, $3 each,	14,400
10,000 Gifts, $10,000 Cash, $1 each,	10,000
20,000 Gifts, Total value of which,	$96,800

The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public—

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.

2d. All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Pianos and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers names are sufficient guarantee that they are surpassed by none.

3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate No., these are placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed, a disinterested person, (selected by the ticket holders present at the Concert,) draws these duplicate No.'s from the wheel, the first one drawn out gets the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in like manner until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first sell sufficient number of tickets to insure us against loss, the Prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unlike all other Gift Sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietor makes a dead loss of the value you draw, consequently you seldom if ever get anything worth what your ticket cost you.

Dont throw your money away on valueless concerns, but send us your orders for tickets soon, if you would secure them; over 50,000 already sold. Every ticket is registered before being sent out, the number, name of party purchasing, and address, and all will be notified by mail of the result of drawing.

Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp. Address—

BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.
144 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.
o

SERPENTS de PHARAON,
OR
SERPENTS' EGGS,
THE LATEST SCIENTIFIC MIRACLE.

"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and retail by OLDEN & SAWYER, 246 Canal street, New York. 50 cents a Box, free by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Self-adjusting Enamelled White, 50c. Linen finished, 75c. Snow White Illusion Stitched, $1, $1.25, $1.50. Ladies' Sett $2.50. Fancy, $3 Mailed free. Send price and size. Sold by first class houses.
o

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal,

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
o 505 Broadway, New York.

$50 Per Week!

10,000 ACTIVE, STIRRING AGENTS, (men or women) wanted in every city, town, village, neighborhood, factory and shop in the land. Business strictly honorable and little or no capital needed to commence. To the right sort of applicants we offer inducements which will enable them to make $50 per week in the cities, and a proportionate amount in the interior.

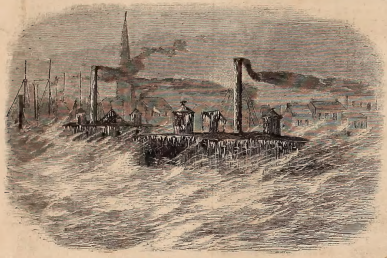
Send $1 for five samples worth $1 each, for your own use, if you do not choose to sell them again, and our confidential circular of terms to Agents will be also forwarded. T. & H. GAUGHAN & CO., Importers,
o 116 Broadway, New York.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 TIMES, mailed to any address for 50 cts THREE of different powers for $1. Address
000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S
AGRAFFE PIANOS:

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo



FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York

No. 539—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, JANUARY 27, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. $1 00 Weekly

Specie Payments.

The tone of the President's Message, the tenor of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and perhaps some other causes less obvious, have sent up the prices of American securities abroad, and this, in conjunction with the introduction in Congress of a bill by Mr. Morrell, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to fund such portion of Government issues as he may think proper, have put down the price of gold, and promise to send it to a still lower figure. It is clear, and in this the Secretary of the Treasury receives the hearty support of all reflecting men, that the policy of the Government is directed to the absorption of the surplus issue of Government notes. This may add, or appear to add, to the total of our interest-bearing debt, but it will tend to bring back prices to the gold

SCENE ON THE RIVER—THE FERRYBOAT.

FROZEN TO DEATH IN BAXTER STREET.

NEW YORK STREET SCENE, MONDAY, JANUARY 8TH.

THE COLD SNAP.

standard or nearly there. We are now sending abroad our securities to pay for things which we really do not require, and which, for the most part, are only articles of luxury, at the rate of 66 cents on the dollar! That is to say, we are getting for our six per cent. gold interest bonds, but 66 cents on the dollar, while the British three per cent. consols fetch 88 and 90 cents! This ruinous traffic must cease. Where again can be found such rich and utility constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and the completest Household Journal published. It is the most elaborately Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of FRANK LESLIE'S Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine,

With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of colored plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian painting, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a Plate of a Paper Doll, with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady's wardrobe in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Baby"—and a doll model the walking costume the article of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the February and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscribe for the year 1866, four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the amount.

Subscriptions to be sent to

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 00 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and is the most satirical paper of America.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cents a number, or $1 50 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 00.

Illustrated Almanacs for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—60 Eng....15 cents with 4 Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Almanac—70 Eng.....50 cents with four Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Comic Almanac—80 Eng.....15 cents

A copy of any of the above Illustrated Almanacs sent gratis to every person forwarding a year's subscription to either of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspapers, Chimney Corner or Lady's Magazine.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 27, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

The Monroe Doctrine Before the People.

MR. SEWARD, in a letter to Mr. Bigelow, our Minister in Paris, dated no longer than the 6th of last September, declares, among the reasons why the French Emperor should speedily retire from Mexico, that with the subsidence of public interest in our domestic affairs, consequent on the close of the war, "it may be reasonably anticipated that henceforth the Congress of the United States, and the people, in their primary assemblies, will give a very large share of attention to questions of an extraneous character, and chief among these is likely to be that of our relations toward France with regard to Mexico."

Events are rapidly justifying Mr. Seward's anticipations. The number and tenor of the resolutions which have been introduced in Congress, bearing on the Mexican question, evince the interest taken in it by the representatives of the people, and their importance at the prolongation of the French intervention. Outside of Congress this impatience manifests itself, not alone through the press, but through public assemblages of most significant and decided character. Commerce, it has been said, is always cowardly and seldom patriotic. But even here, in New York, where its conservative influence is strongest, the people have spoken, "in their primary capacity," on the absorbing question of the day, and in language that cannot be misunderstood.

The great "Monroe Doctrine Vindication Meeting," at the Cooper Institute, on the evening of the 6th Jan., was the first, we believe, ever held for the single purpose of supporting the Monroe Doctrine in principle and practice. "As such it is invested with special importance. It is the initiation of a movement which promises to spread all over the country, and to have an important bearing on our politics. Since the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine, in 1823, although it has been always accepted as embodying the sentiment and defining the policy of our people, it has never, or until lately, been called into practical application. It was, it is true, the basis of our successful opposition to the attempts of the Holy Alliance to build up a so-called "Mosquito Kingdom," and to organize the "Colony of the Bay Islands" out of the territory of the republic of Honduras. Our opposition to these attempts was, however, mainly urged upon other grounds, and our success can hardly be claimed as a clear vindication of the Monroe Doctrine as a rule of our policy. Now, however, it comes up in a direct and distinct shape. We are put precisely in the position where we must confess that it is the "higher law governing generalities" of which we have heard, a deception to ourselves and a fraud towards others, or a just and vital rule of action, founded on the judgment of the people, to be maintained by every consideration of honor and interest, and enforced, if need be, by the whole power of the country.

It is proper, therefore, on an issue so important as this, that the people should speak in their primary assemblies. Their daring so to solves no reflection on the Government, or those whose immediate duty it is to administer it. We are assembled in such meetings, beside indicating what all republican governments should be most anxious to know, the real state of public sentiment, serve to strengthen the Executive arm, and give additional force to its action. If Mr. Seward could have placed the French Emperor among the people who filled the great hall of the Cooper Institute on the occasion we have referred to, he would have done more to cure him of his Mexican madness, than could be effected through a hundred reams of correspondence how'ever able. It would have enabled him to see that the "Monroe Doctrine" is a cardinal principle in the political creed of the American people, and that its enforcement is a necessary consequence of their convictions—as much so as the vindication of the integrity of the country proved itself to be during the late terrible war.

And if the Emperor of the United States had been present, he would have discovered, and rejoiced in the discovery, that in all he may do, or feel disposed to do, to destroy or limit slavery, he has the sympathies of our republic in their crusade against free institutions, he will have the steady, unflinching support of the people—a support accorded, because, as we have said, the "Monroe Doctrine" commends itself to their judgment and appeals to their sympathies. The people are in earnest in this matter, and their temper and purposes should not be mistaken either by our own or foreign governments. The interests of peace will best be promoted by discerning the depth and strength of the popular current before the gathering volume shall burst the limits of control.

The resolutions of the Cooper Institute meeting were strong but dispassionate, and fairly spoke the united sentiment of the country, and as the question to which they refer is now the most important one before the public, and likely to increase in interest, we subjoin those portions of their character:

Whereas, It was early declared, with a solemnity becoming the enunciation of a great principle, by a President of the United States, that "it is impossible that the gratitude of mankind was secured by its ennoblement to the European Continents, by the free and independent positions which they had assumed of late years, hereafter to be maintained and to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power;" and Whereas, the attempt by European Powers to "extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere would be dangerous to our peace and safety;" and Whereas, it was equally declared that "we could not behold any European Power, for the purpose of oppressing the Republics of America, or controlling their destinies, extend its system to any portion of this continent without endangering our peace and happiness;" and Whereas, in open contempt of the principles thus early laid down, France has introduced by open force a new Republic of Mexico, and to control its destiny against the choice of its people; and Whereas, Spain has interfered to extend her system over Hayti, and is now interfering to oppress the Republics of Chile and Peru; therefore,

Resolved, That the United States is bound, by her traditions, by every consideration of honor and dignity, by her plighted faith to the Republics of America, for the sake of her self-respect, and respect and reverence, to vindicate the great principles enunciated by Monroe, in all parts of this continent, and to establish, if necessary by force of arms, that America belongs to Americans and is consecrated to republican institutions.

Resolved, That by the "preemigration of the "Monroe Doctrine," and by a correct interpretation, we have assumed a responsibility towards our sister Republics, and an obligation to defend and protect them which it would be cowardly and dishonorable to neglect or repudiate.

Resolved, That the worst-out diplomacy of European Governments, in connection with and unwarrantably aiding of American institutions; and that our statesmanship should be based at all times on honesty and fair dealing, but on frank acknowledgment of other nations' rights, and a firm determination to maintain our own.

THE Soldiers' and Sailors' National Union League of Washington has issued an address, urging all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors to procure their Discharge papers, and not to part with them to speculators for any sum. This advice is very important, and has the following reference to them: "The Thirty-Second Congress, which has addressed a communication to the Paymaster-General, as follows:

"It has been brought to my notice that certain claim agents are advertising that they are engaged in the collection of extra bounty, from $100 to $200, for soldiers who enlisted in 1861 and 1862, and all other times when the $100 was paid, and are thus fraudulently obtaining possession of soldiers' discharges. In no case, except that of a veteran, has the extra bounty referred to been authorized, nor can it be paid without further legislation, and it is very important that soldiers should not part with their discharges through a misrepresentation of their rights. I would, therefore, respectfully suggest the propriety of giving official notice that, in no case, as above, to a soldier, who enlisted prior to June 25th, 1863, entitled to more than $100 bounty."

IT is reply to a question of the House of Representatives, inquiring why Jefferson Davis is confined, and why he is not brought to trial, the Secretary of War explains that Jefferson Davis is held on charges of treason, of inciting the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, and of starving Union prisoners, and that the Department has refused to have him first tried for treason, and that the Attorney-General advised Virginia as the most proper tribunal to try him, but that the Supreme Court of the Supreme Court declines to hold a court within the limits of that circuit.

IF the debate, in the House of Representatives, on the question of extending to negroes the right of suffrage, Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, said:

"Three thousand five hundred and forty-nine black men marched from this District in defense of our country. They have come to the Government and what would we not be true to them? According to the census of 1860, there were 14,316 persons of color in this District, since which time the number has been increased. There are owned 14,316,000 of real estate. Their church property is valued at $125,000. The 32 churches are valued at $100,000. The 14,000 have 4,300 communicants. The average church sit-ninces is 800. There are 1,000 who have schools, literary and charitable institutions, and 4,000 can read and write."

MR. Kelley remarked that the President had personally assured him he was in favor of negro suffrage in the District, as well as in Tennessee.

THE following important resolution passed the House of Representatives, a few days ago, by a vote of 94 yeas to 37 nays:

Resolved, That in order to the maintenance of the national authority and the protection of loyal citizens of the United States, it is the sense of the House that the military forces of the Government should not be withdrawn from those States until the Senate and House of Congress shall have ascertained and declared that their further presence there is no longer necessary.

A REED-WITTED merchant, who liked his cups, somewhat surprised his temperance friends by yielding to them and signing a temperance pledge. But, to their horror, they saw no change in his habits, and a reproved and reluctant man he duly bound. He defended his honor, and to wipe off all stain produced the document which he had signed, and showed that it was written in red wine without an internal reverse mange.

NOTHING can better illustrate the industry and and thrift, as well as the general competence of the people of Massachusetts, than a single item from the Gov. Report to the Legislature of the Legislature of that State, viz.: that the number of depositors in the savings banks of the commonwealth is nearly 300,000, and the amount of the deposits $60,000,000.

ADMIRAL DAVIS, Superintendent of the U. S. Naval Observatory, reports the discovery of a new comet, on the night of January 5th, as follows:

"From observations with the equatorial, the following was calculated by M. Mac Clure, Assistant, equatorial astronomer:

	M. T. W.	R. A.	Dec.
Jan. 5, 1866.	8h. 12m. 9.9s.	23h. 32m. 29.94s.	2°.27'.5.0"

"The comet is about 5' south of 2 Aquarii, and 20' are in diameter, with a slight condensation at the centre."

THE literary tendencies of the Southern States seem to have been stimulated, rather than repressed, by the war. A Georgia paper tells us:

"The circulation of brand new books, now displayed in the South, is unexampled. All manner of books are purchased eagerly—not second hand books, as during a few years ago would have swarmed on the shelves of booksellers and dealers, but books from the counter of as now bought up and read with a ready relish; and books of a higher class than were ever sold before at some tender female to weep over the hops and mishaps of a century of war epitaphs.

"We are glad to see this evident bearing of the public mind. A people without a book-reading is hopeless in the history of a nation. It is significant of wealth and prosperity. It argues that the minds of the people are turned away from cold, stale, and are seeking food for more substantial reading. It shows that the sour and its concomitant fruit are no longer having the public taste. It is a sign of nothing but good. It is fatal to the same intellectual stall, and feeds together for the same purpose, as an act of loyalty to our national history. Let us have it."

MR. BADMAN is responsible for the following story, which appears in his History of Humbug:

"It is said that a Yankee tin pedlar, who had frequently chased many of the people in the vicinity of a New England village, through which he was passing, was induced, by some of the same sort, to join them in a drinking bout. He finally became stone drunk; and, while in that state, was put into a cart, and, on a rocky cart, near the village, then, dressing the sleeper in raw-head-and-bloody-bones style, awaited his return to consciousness. As he began rousing himself, they lighted some huge torches, and also set fire to some bundles of straw and three or four rolls of brimstone, which they had placed in different parts of the cavern. The pedlar rubbed his eyes, and seeing and smelling all these evidences of Pandemonium, concluded he had died, and was now partaking of his final doom. But he took it very philosophically, for he complacently remarked to himself: 'In hell—just as I expected!'"

GEN. PALMER made an address to upwards of four thousand emancipated slaves in Louisville, Ky., on the 1st of January. Alluding to the systematic attempts to force the freedmen to work at a low rate of wages, he justly remarked: "He that compels the black man to work for half price compels the white man to do the same. The interests of the black man are therefore the interests of every white man in the country." Every combination to control the price of labor is radically wrong. Let labor command in the market what it will fetch. Every man who works is interested that the law of supply and demand shall not be interfered with.

TOWN GOSSIP.

"FROM grave to gay, from lively to severe," from 20 degrees below zero to 40 above, is about as much of a change as human nature has a right to expect, or is willing to bear within 48 hours, and yet that is what New York has had to bear during the past week. One day Broadway is frozen and deserted, save and except by some solitary pedestrian, who travels at a dog-trot, and doth perpetually blow his fingers; and the next it is blooming in the beauty of an Indian summer, and crowded by lovely women and children, almost rejecting their furs.

The relief from this terribly cold weather—of the effects of which we give some relation in another column—none can estimate save those who have experienced it. We have our doubts whether it was not hailed with genuine joy by every living creature, except corner grocery men, who, of course, felt that the sudden changes kept them too busy changing prices. The cold snap, instead of having the same effect on their goods that it had on all inanimate things, making them a degree smaller, produced exactly the contrary effect. They instantly dilated, and half a peck of potatoes that, with the thermometer at 40, would not be charged at over 25 cents, instantly, on the fall of the instrument to zero, swelled to 35 cents, and all things else, especially coal, in the same ratio. The result of this very singular operation of the weather is that thousands, as soon as the weather grows cold are pinched by it, and, in return, pinch themselves. The stout laborer, who has been wont to solace himself at noon with a good dinner and a warm stove, finds his viands sadly cut down both in quantity and quality, and the heat cut off. This is not apt to add to his working qualities, to his health, or his good humor; but, if it did not occur, how could Teutonic and Milesian corner grocers grow rich and run for aldermen? That's the question.

The consequence of this cold weather has been skating of every degree. All the ponds are frozen to that emphatic iciness, that it is much doubted whether the sport cannot be followed straight through the next summer.

The Central Park comes first, of course, and on its frozen waters somewhere about 20,000 people per day disport themselves, and freeze their fingers and toes to the poetry of motion, while on the drive thousands of gay vehicles dash along, or land their fair cargoes on the ponds. The Central Park is growing daily as a resort, and when it becomes double its present age with the same rate of progression, we wager that it will be the fastest and most brilliant spot in the world—if it is not already so. This is what a country friend writes home about it, after a study of a few weeks. Parsons and parsons' wives may be seen there in fashionable "drags," putting "three-minute" and "two-forty" horses to the very top of their trotting speed, wheel-and-wheel with fast actresses; and rich philanthropists, who profess to believe that the Republic owes its salvation to the negro, driven by black fellows with the badge of servitude on their hats and collars, sweep along in the same column with gamblers, and painted women several degrees below the grades of the demi-monde. We speak by the card, for we have seen this beautiful moving mosaic half a dozen times within the past month, and are free to say that, so far as outward gauds were concerned, it was difficult to distinguish piety and philanthropy from profligacy and plundermongery, or the professional fast women from the virtuous matrons and maidens who vied with them in the theatrical style of their costumes and surrounding.

To return to skating, we have not only the Central Park Ponds, but a dozen of others about the city, while in the city a feature has been made by flooding St. John's Park, in Hudson street, and charging a trifling sum for admission, which we take it is the perquisite of the park-keeper for keeping the place in order. It is a safe place to learn on.

It is a supposable case that while this extreme cold weather lasts, neither the people nor the authorities will think for an instant of the coming cholera, for coming it surely is as certainly as warm weather comes. There are a hundred things to correct, but a few that are imperative. Among these we class slaughter houses, and our attention has been especially called to them from an account we read in a Chicago paper of the building of an abattoir or general slaughter-house in that city. Though the Chicago people have given into the hands of one firm, or company, the charge of these abatoirs, a course of which we do not approve, yet even with this disadvantage it is so much better than our way that even that were worthy. Among all the nuisances and dangers of our streets none are greater than cattle driving and slaughtering. A neighborhood infested by these slaughter houses is not fit for human dwellings, and none but the extreme poor will inhabit houses in the vicinity. We have never yet known one of them to be kept clean, and while they destroy the physical health of a neighborhood, they also destroy its moral prosperity. The killing of the animals has a horrible charm for the children, and during the slaughter on visiting the slaughter houses at such a time it will be always found that a dozen or a score of the little ones are gathered, gazing with intense and horrified eyes on the struggles of the dying animals. We hardly believe that such a sight can improve them, any more than the presence of these pest houses can improve our chances of avoiding the cholera. There is one more thing we would mention in connection with this, which is that the cholera was first propagated in the east by the stench arising from the decaying offal of animals slaughtered by religious devotees.

Last week, in our illustrated items, we gave an instance of "one of those murders out of the pale of the law;" or, in other words, murders which the law cannot take notice of as such. We will give here one or two more instances that have happened within the past week and are happening every day. This paragraph we take from a daily paper:

POISONED BY THE USE OF MUSTY FLOUR.—Information was lodged with the Health Officer yesterday, to the effect that an entire family, residing at No. 536 Columbia street, had been poisoned by the use of musty flour, bought at a neighboring grocery store. The members—five in number—were taken sick with dysentery; two recovered, and one child died, and two are still down with the sickness.

This is only one child died! but there are hopes that the other two will die; and yet, in the face of this fact, we do not hear even the name of the wretch who sold this flour and committed a murder for the sake of making perhaps five cents.

Then we have another case, showing the horrors of an emigrant ship. We will take this also from the daily press accounts:

HORRIBLE TALE OF SUFFERING—Criminal Neglect of a Passenger at Sea—Coroner's Investigation—Verdict against the Surgeon of the Neptune.—Coroner Gover, assisted by Deputy Coroner Beach, yesterday investigated one of the most revolting cases of neglect and suffering ever brought before the authorities. It appears that the emigrant ship Neptune, of the Liverpool Black Ball Line, Capt. Enoch W. Peabody, from Liverpool, arrived in the harbor on Wednesday. All of the passengers except Mrs. Mary A. Gilroy, 25 years of age, were landed at the Battery. This woman, who was delivered of a still-born child, on the 9th inst., was left on the vessel between decks, without attention of any kind. She was not provided with clean clothing or fire. The cold was so intense that her wet clothing was frozen to her body, and her premature offspring was left lying at her side. The ship was taken to the foot of Beekman street, East river, when officer Daniels, on Wednesday afternoon, learned of the condition of the poor woman. Capt. DeCamp, of the 2d Precint Police, laid the matter before the Commissioners of Emigaation, and Mrs. Gilroy was removed from between decks to the cabin. On Wednesday night, a nurse was sent to the ship to stay with the woman. Medical attendance was also secured. Yesterday Deputy Coroner John Beach made an examination of the woman, and found that her lower limbs were frozen to the knees, and insensible to the touch. Her nose was also frost-bitten. Dr. Beach believes that her recovery is impossible. Coroner Gover having empannelled a jury, several witnesses were examined, who testified to the above facts. The case was then submitted to the jury, and a verdict rendered censuring Dr. J. C. Herrick, the ship's surgeon, for neglecting to properly attend Mrs. Gilroy during her confinement.

Dr. Herrick left for his home at Southampton, L. I., yesterday. Coroner Gover has issued a warrant for his arrest.

Do we have any faith that this doctor or the captain of the ship will be punished? Not a bit! They will be held to bail, perhaps, in a couple of thousand dollars, and that will be the last of it, even though the woman dies.

Ah! we are a great people, a busy people, and a Christian people!

The theatrical item of the week has been the re-appearance of Mr. John Owens at the Broadway Theatre. Mr. Owens having made his great hit in The People's Lawyer, a play in which there was only one character and no construction. This character is Solon Shingle, and though the same play, and the same character, has been done for a series of years, and by a series of actors, yet it has never attracted real attention until Mr. John Owens introduced it to the New York public, and made it entirely his own, playing it 170 consecutive nights. Mr. Owens then transported Solon Shingle to England, where he was received by the intellectual portion of the public with the highest order of approbation, but they instantly dis-associated Solon from the play and emphatically condemned the latter, as the New York public would have done if they had not a habit of swallowing everything dramatic that is offered them, without distinction. The result of this dis-association was that Mr. Owens undertook the reconstruction of the play, and we are forced to say in so doing has not bettered it. Many of the most telling points have been altered, and the play—as we opine—having been jobbed by an Englishman, has words and ideas not recognised among us. Of the first we would simply say that we call an obligation to pay money a note, not a bill, and that we do not know such an official as a bailiff. There are many other points that are equally bad. We see no relief for them but for Mr. Owens to call on the dramatic writers of this country, if there are any such, and have a play that, while it is really good, will show the capabilities he possesses in such a high degree.

It is needless to say that Solon was received with the wildest enthusiasm, and that the theatre is crowded every night to its greatest capacity, and will be, without doubt, for at least three months to come.

The Caledonian Club, the representative of the Scots in this country, gave a brilliant ball at the City Assembly Rooms, on the night of the 11th inst. It was emphatically one of the affairs of the season, and especially showy from the display of the beautiful Scottish costumes. The opening of the ball, and the entrance of the club is something that once seen will hardly be forgotten.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The people of Gloucester, Massachusetts, intend to erect a "Memorial Hall" in honor of the soldiers from that town who have fallen during the war. It is proposed to expend $20,000 upon a building having in it a hall, to be let for public uses, the nett proceeds to be devoted to the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and to the aid of returned soldiers in destitute circumstances.

—— The Chicago papers publish broadsides of the year's statistics of trade and commerce. The following items are interesting: The money expended on buildings in 1865 was $6,950,000. The total valuation of property is $64,709,177, and the tax levied is $1,294,000. The lumber receipts were 614,000 feet, exclusive of shingles, laths and telegraph polls. The wool receipts were 7,690,000 pounds; hides, 18,000,000; lake fish, 95,000 packages; coal, 346,000 tons; flour, 1,186,000 barrels, and wheat, 9,465,000 bushels.

—— A company of gentlemen in Providence have organized the "Narragansett Club," which is an association of persons "interested in the preservation and dissemination of an early literature not easily accessible to general readers," and that it proposes to reprint several of the rare books relating to Rhode Island and other parts of New England. The first work undertaken is a new edition of the writings of Roger Williams; to be followed by reprints of the works of John Cotton, George Fox and John Clarke.

—— The Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, has furnished the following statement of the number of volunteers called for by the President at various periods:

State.	Aggregate.	Aggregate reduced to three yr's standard.
Maine	71,745	56,595
New Hampshire	34,605	30,827
Vermont	35,256	29,052
Massachusetts	151,785	123,844
Rhode Island	23,711	17,878
Connecticut	57,270	50,514
New York	455,568	380,980
New Jersey	79,511	55,785
Pennsylvania	366,326	267,558
Delaware	13,651	10,303
Maryland	49,730	20,692
West Virginia	30,003	27,653
District of Columbia	16,872	11,506
Ohio	317,133	239,976
Indiana	195,148	152,283
Illinois	258,217	212,694
Michigan	90,119	80,865
Wisconsin	96,118	78,985
Minnesota	25,034	19,675
Iowa	75,860	68,182
Missouri	108,773	86,192
Kentucky	78,540	70,348
Kansas	20,097	18,654
Total	2,753,062	2,129,041

—— A merchant in Pittsburg, Pa., by the name of Shaw, stands charged with having caused the abduction of his wife and her confinement in a lunatic asylum, on the plea that she was insane and dangerous. By some means he obtained the certificates of two physicians to that effect, and a few days since, had the police seize her, and, despite the heartrending cries of the helpless woman, she was forced into the street cars and hurried to the asylum.

—— The different railroad companies at St. Louis, Mo., have commenced running their huge four-horsed omnibuses, loaded with passengers, across the Mississippi river, on the ice. The event is interesting as one which does not occur in many years. There is no doubt that if iron tracks were laid, the steam locomotive could cross with equal safety.

—— The total amount of naval captures reaches $30,000,000 in value. One-half of this goes to Government, and the other divided among officers and seamen. The average per man is but $120, whereas, in the matter of bounties to soldiers, the average has been nearly $1,000 per man, and about $700,000,000 have been expended in bounties alone.

—— The Salt Island of Anse, in the parish of Saint Mary's, Louisiana, and which has been so serviceable to the rebels during the war, contains about 2,000 acres of pure rock salt lying at an average depth from the surface of 16 feet and of great thickness. The island is surrounded by Vermillion Bayou through which vessels of 1,500 tons burthen can approach it.

—— William P. Cooledge and David D. Howes, two conductors on the Metropolitan Horse Railroad in Boston, were arrested last week, the former on a charge of embezzling 40 cents, and the latter 60 cents, from the funds of the company. Cooledge was discharged, and Howes was fined $15 and costs, from which sentence he appealed and gave bonds to prosecute his appeal.

—— A couple in Litchfied county, Conn., had lived together for ten years, supposing themselves married. Difficulties have arisen, one applied to the court for a divorce. Upon investigation it was found out that they had never been legally married. Like sensible people, they gave up the idea of a divorce and were married.

—— The Secretary of the Treasury has signed a warrant in favor of Mrs. Lincoln for the sum of $25,000, less the amount drawn for his salary in March last.

—— Practical Science—and especially Chemistry and Geology as applied to Agriculture—has lost a useful and zealous champion in James J. Mapes, who died in New York, January 10th.

—— Massachusetts sent 159,165 troops to the war, spent $27,705,109, paid interest on all her bonds promptly in gold, has her treasury amply provided for, and her credit unsurpassed, if equaled, by that of any State or of the Nation.

—— Secretary Stanton has applied to Congress for an appropriation of $100,000 to purchase Ford's Theatre, to be fitted up for the custody of papers relating to sick or wounded soldiers during the rebellion, and to hospitals, and the operations of the medical and surgical departments of the army.

—— The Petersburg (Va.) Express says: "Butler's celebrated tower near Bermuda Hundreds, from which, for so many months, lynx-eyed sentinels pried into the movements of the Confederate troops, was sold at public auction for the sum of $5. There were at least 30 cords of good timber in the structure.

—— Peter Klasser, of Waukesha, Wis., killed himself by drinking whiskey that had stood in a copper kettle several days, at Plum Creek. He died in half an hour, and a man who drank with him died in an hour, and his wife, who drank but little, came near dying.

—— A Charleston editor, having received from a Northern city a proposition to publish certain advertisements and take his pay in hoop skirts, replies, that "Hoop skirts will not cover our nakedness. Perhaps if you were to make some proposal to accompany them with cloth sufficient to fill up the interstices, they might be made serviceable."

—— The latest sensation in Chicago, Ill., is the elopement of a young and pretty married woman with two married men, either old enough to be her father. These Lotharios sold their families into beggary, and borrowed several thousand dollars of their friends.

—— Some relics of slavery still remain in the South. A few days ago five negroes, convicted of various petty crimes, were placed in a chain-gang and set to work on the public streets. The authorities, however, declare they will serve white and black offenders alike.

—— The selling of colored people in Delaware for a term of years, as a punishment for crime, the Wilmington Republican says: "is now a face. Four persons were sold a few days since, and brought from 12 to 15 cents each, and their purchasers immediately let them go."

—— The Insurance Companies of Montreal have given each member of the fire police of that city, a free policy of insurance for $1,000, and to that they have added the promise of $5 each per week in case of accident received at fires. This is for their good conduct as firemen.

—— In Boston there are in full operation 14 large gambling establishments and many minor ones, the annual profits from which to the proprietors are estimated at from $300,000 to $500,000.

—— Miss Hanna J. Duke, the Iowa giantess, weighing 585 pounds, was married in Philadelphia, to a Mr. Rein, who weighs 140 pounds. The Siamese twins were the groomsmen.

Foreign.—A little brochure has been issued at Paris, at the low price of 50 centimes (10 cents), giving a history of the popular subscription in Paris to the Lincoln medal. From this we learn that it is intended to present the medal to Mrs. Lincoln on the 14th of April, 1866, the anniversary of the assassination. The brochure is entitled La Medaille de la Liberté, and contains, besides the narrative and correspondence in relation to the medal, a biography of the late President.

—— A new song announced in London is, The Vanquished Banner: a Song of the South. The music is by Sir Henry Smart.

—— Several extremely curious experiments have been made in Paris on the effects of santonic acid (an extract of the flowers of santolina). When a dose of about ten centigrammes is taken, a kind of intoxication is produced, which causes all objects to appear yellow to the patient; and when about fifteen centigrammes are taken, the same objects appear violet-colored.

—— The total number of paupers in England and Wales, on the 1st of last July, was 891,291, or 1 in 22 of the population. On the 1st of July, 1864, the corresponding number was 911,877. Of the former number 233,538 were able-bodied persons, exclusive of vagrants.

—— The London Examiner, in putting in a strong plea for universal suffrage, asks why, in the name of common sense, should machanics and artizans be excluded? and adds: "We are all for qualifying men by their legitimate avocations, as far as it is possible to do so; and we say, with confidence, that there is more of a moral right to vote acquired by a man out of the profession or handicraft he has spent his youth and time in mastering, than out of any statutable number of bricks, rafters and flags, in the midst of which he may happen to sleep."

—— A statue of the Empress Josephine is about to be set up in a place in Paris, formed by the junction of the new Boulevard Beaujon and the Avenue Josephine, opposite the bridge of the Alma. The statue is by M. Dubray, and represents the Empress in court costume, having in her right hand a rose, and in her left a miniature of the Emperor, her husband. The statue, with its pedestal, measures nearly 12 feet in height.

—— The commerce of the world is estimated to require 3,600,000 able-bodied men to be constantly traversing the ocean, of whom 7,500 die every year. The amount of property moved on the water is from $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000, and the amount annually lost by the casualties of the sea averages $25,000,000.

—— Queen Victoria always sends a gift of £3 to any poor mother in her dominions who may give birth to triplets. The latest successful candidate for the money is the wife of James Gibson, a weaver of Kilbarchan, Scotland.

—— A Parisian, named Jared, surnamed Jules, has sued a spinster, of high social status, for a complexion bill, the item of which was a dozen of Email, or Enamel of Paris. In the course of the trial, old Jared, a deformed quasimodish character, stoutly affirmed that his Email de Paris was used by all the beauties of the realm, including the Empress. He was snubbed at once, the criers called silence, but the aged enameler would give his testimony. The thing got into the local reports and feuilletons; the Empress's adherents stormed; the Emperor rather liked it; all the public joked and made merry, and now we know where the complexions came from. Ladies, you must needs have recourse to beautifiers, but do not touch ink; it will spatter you.

SLEIGHING.—THE CITY AND THE COUNTRY.

BOTH town and country have their attractions at every season. In the summer they both bloom, and the can't-get-aways have enjoyments among the bricks and mortar during the heats of August, that are hardly surpassed by rustling leaves, murmuring streams, cool breezes and musical birds. In the winter, while the city has its hundred attractions away from home, the country is limited in that line, and is thrown more upon the happy trifles that gather about even the homeliest hearths.

But when the snow and the ice comes, then both town and country are on a level. Then the skates and sleighs come out, and are rubbed up. The fiddlers put fresh grease on their elbows, and the rural taverns build good fires, and put their larders into respectable condition, knowing that they will certainly be subjected to an irruption of sleighers and skaters, and that they always come with dancing, eating and drinking proclivities.

Is there one Goth among us that does not look back on the homely country sleigh-ride—that does not remember the straw-filled box, the great coats, blankets, chatting girls, the happy beaux, the flying horses, the waiting supper, the merry music, and soforth, or, as some happy swain has expressed it to his lady-love:

"Sweet Susy Brown! my pretty one!
I'm sure you must remember—
If not for love, at least for fun—
The sleigh-ride in December;
When all the belles and all the beaux,
In spite of frosts would go forth,
And squeeze beneath the buffaloes,
Each others hands, &c.

Can any city got-up sleighing bring the solid enjoyment of that rural jollification? Can all the style of $5,000 teams, gorgeous sleighs, suppers at Delmonico's, and costly robes, equal it. Never! Education but makes us blasé, and whether we can, after twenty years of city dissipation, again enjoy the homely pleasures of our rural youth or not, we never can forget them, or cease to take delight in the recollection of them. Even the memory of the mishaps have a charm which all the smooth drives of the city cannot equal for a moment.

We, who know that, in twenty-four hours after the fall of even the heaviest snow in and about the city, it will be packed for miles upon miles, and splendidly useable, even for the most delicate navigation, can hardly realize the difficulties that sometimes in an extra snowstorm beset the seekers after sleigh rides in the country. In the town, before enough has fallen to fairly cover the stones, everything that can go upon runners is out, and "Ringing, swinging,

Dashing they go,
Over the crest of the beautiful snow,"

Until

"Snow so pure when it falls from the sky,
Is trampled and tracked by the crowd—
Trampled and tracked by the thousands of feet rushing by,
Till it blends with the horrible filth of the street,"

Or if not in that state, is well packed and in good going condition anywhere within the bills of mortality, before the flakes have ceased to quiver through the air.

In the country it is different, and the sleighing party must calculate on all the mishaps and difficulties of drifts, depth and heavy loads. They must expect ruts, holes, sweeping winds, and an occasional upset, if not an absolute snowing up, and a necessity to lay by until aid can be had, or the fall is over, all of which only adds to the zest of the affair. But in good time come the days when the roads are fairly broken, and then the music of the jingling bells is heard from hill to valley, and the merry laugh goes up on the frosty air or the moonlight, and many a contract for life is made under the buffaloes, or by the bridges, under the stimulation of taking toll. Bless the inventor of snow, and, secondly, the inventor of sleighing.

MR. STEPHEN MASSETT has been very successful before the "Press Club" of Philadelphia. He drew a crowded house. The Philadelphia Inquirer says this of him:

"Last evening, at the Assembly Buildings, a large audience greeted Stephen Massett, Esq., in his lecture delivered under the auspices of the Press Club. As 'Jeemes Pipes, of Pipesville,' his serio-comic address on 'Drifting About; or, Sketches of Travels on Many Lands,' replete with anecdotes, puns and witticisms, was heartily received, liberally cheered and loudly laughed at.

"The lecturer humorously described the many disadvantages under which he labored in submitting his address to his friends. Each criticised it from his own stand-point, and he was well nigh distracted in trying to reconcile their different views, but was now satisfied to trust it to the verdict of the public.

"He had traveled throughout the many points of interest in the world, and perpetrated various practical jokes therein. He had been fond, always, of the sea, and of all those who came to see him. The first thing in sailing, was to heave the anchor, and it was strange that a ship should begin to move by having the heaves. A whistle, a toll of the bell on board a ship, and we are now off; not like the old time, when the old tars sang their songs to the hoisting of the anchor, and the discordant orders of the officers broke in upon their voices.

"The speaker happily portrayed the proceedings of a meeting, held in California, to take into consideration the present state of the nation's troubles. The various speakers were humorously described, and their characteristics of voice and manner were given with laughable effect. The question was finally put, but he might as well try to explain it here as to pick out from a congressional speech the subject before the House.

"The touching poems of 'Beautiful Snow,' and 'The Vagabonds,' were recited with pathetic and impressive effect.

"Twelve years ago he had started for San Francisco, that great city which, in his boyhood, had no buildings and no name, and found its streets lined with warehouses, and business spreading abroad its many interests. What would not the Pacific Railroad make of it! Imitations of Madame Anna Bishop and Edwin Forrest, in contrast with the reading of the sorrowful death of Joe, in Bleak House, vividly showed the great powers of imitation the speaker possessed. Their illustration of different emotions will serve as an index of the unconnected, diversified materials of which the discourse consisted, flavored with stories and ballads."

MR. B. S. OSBON, who will be remembered as the naval editor of the New York Herald, has again opened his Bureau of Maritime and Naval Information, at No. 137 Nassau street. The aim of the bureau is to furnish reliable facts, dates and all information pertaining to the Navy, Mercantile Marine and Revenue Service. It proposes to answer all questions about individuals that are or have been in the service, and to render all aid to such as have claims on the Government growing from the navy. To reach this information or assistance, a fee of one dollar must be remitted. We think the institution is needed, and will fill a known void.

JONES is a strong believer in guardian angels. "If it were not for them," he asks, "what would keep people from rolling out of bed when they are fast asleep?"

DESCRIPTION OF FASHIONS.

No. 1. — The Blanchette paletot of gray cloth defines closely the figure. It is trimmed with three rows of narrow galoon, headed with a row of loops formed of the same galoon. The trimming is put on so as to simulate revers in front and so as to form pockets on the sides.

No. 2.—The Ural paletot is of tight fitting black cloth, with two seams down the centre of the back, united by cord, terminating in tassels. The trimming consists of a bias band of black silk put on in waves, stitched with the machine.

Nos. 3, 4 and 5, are Evening dresses, from the establishment of Madame McKenzie, 105 Brevoort Place (10th street), New York.

No. 3 is a skirt of white illusion, ornamented to the waist with graduated puffs, separated by rows of narrow poncean velvet. The tunic is also of illusion, bordered with rich chantilly lace, headed by a band of poncean satin. At the back is a sash with three pointed ends of poncean satin, edged with narrow lace. They are graduated in width and are lined with white satin, edged with narrow lace, headed with a puff of illusion. These ends are turned up, over the tunic, and are kept in place by rich pendant ornaments. Low corsage, with a pointed berthe of illusion edged with narrow lace, headed by a band of poncean satin. Puffed short sleeves.

No. 4 is a skirt of white silk, edged with a flounce of Cluny guipure. Over-skirt of white tulle, with a gauffered flounce of the same, bound with blue velvet. The flounce is headed with six rows of narrow blue velvet. The corsage, with short basques, is of blue velvet, with long tabs of same falling on both sides of the skirt. The front of the corsage is of tulle, strapped across with blue velvet covered with Cluny insertion, which trimming also forms heading and borders the tunic and side tabs. Silver drop buttons edge the latter, and silver tassels on the points of tabs and basque complete this tasteful and elegant toilet.

No. 5 is a white silk slip, covered with a skirt of plain white illusion, with a puffing around the bottom of dotted illusion, kept in place by ruches of white and mauve silk. Over-skirt of dotted illusion, looped back on one side with an exquisite bouquet of white roses, and on the other by ruches of white and mauve silk. The corsage and basque are of white silk, edged with lace and headed with a ruche to match those upon the skirt. The front of the corsage is open in the shape of a V, and is composed of illusion. Tiny fan-shaped sleeves, with a few flowers on one shoulder, make up a toilet unique in its daintiness and purity.

Nos. 6 and 7.—Back and front of the Parepa paletot. It is made of a superior quality of cloth and defines, without fitting closely to the figure. It is trimmed up both back and front, as well as around the bottom, on the shoulders and sleeves, with fringe of two widths, and also with wide and narrow beaded galoon. Tassels ornament the garment, which is cut polaled, both front and back, and opens midway up the skirt.

1. THE BLANCHETTE PALETOT.

2. THE URAL PALETOT.

3. SKIRT OF WHITE ILLUSION. 4. SKIRT OF WHITE SILK. 5. WHITE SILK SLIP.

6 AND 7. FRONT AND BACK VIEW OF PAREPA PALETOT.

THE COLD SNAP.

CERTAIN portions of the Northern States have just passed through a few days of the most fearful and intense cold that has ever been recorded. When it is understood that in some parts of Vermont and New Hampshire, the thermometer has marked 30 degrees below zero, some estimate may be formed of the terrible suffering that must have arisen from its intensity.

But it is in a great city like New York that the cold must be experienced to realise the effect. Here, in the midst of our hundreds of thousands of poor, the suffering is the greatest, and yet least heard of. In the late terrible cold there were many deaths, but the most fearful were those where women were the victims. In a house in Baxter street the lowest of city slums, a woman, named Oakley, was left to take charge of a blind female. During the night of the 7th she was stricken, and in the morning was found dead and stiff on the floor, where she had got from her bed. Another case was that of Mrs. Lafferty, in 52d street, who was found frozen and dead, with her baby clasped to her breast, and so stiff that it required the efforts of two men to get the child, which, was still living, from her clasp.

Those who were through the night of the 7th and 8th exposed realised it dreadfully. Car and omnibus drivers were especial instances, and there are several recorded cases of their suffering, and through both days even the ordinary pedestrians were awakened to some sense of a North Pole climate, by finding themselves suddenly with frosted feet, hands or faces, and speechless from its intensity. On the ponds, at the Centre Park and the neighborhood of the city, the ice forms schibly in a few hours, and skaters, even in the coldest hours of the following days, flocked in thousands to the sport.

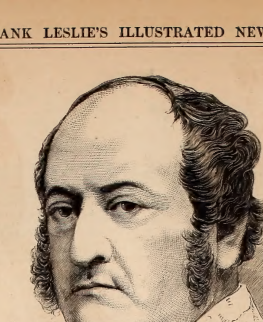
"The oldest inhabitant" asserts that nothing anywhere like it has been known since the night of the great fire in December, 1835, and even then the thermometer only indicated 5 degrees below zero, almost summer heat to the present experience. Such as keep a record declare that the last weather that was of the same grade was in 1806, when the North River froze sufficiently solid to load teams crossing to the Jersey shore.

In the present case the cold was accompanied by a high wind, and the boats crossing the rivers were, by the dying of the frozen spray, covered with a mass of ice, which, however picturesque it may have been, did not add to the convenience or safety of their voyages.



We believe in the old saying, that "a green Christmas makes a full churchyard," and we pray, in the winter time, for a clear, freezing cold; but the late cold snap is giving us more than we prayed for, and our prayer is now that we may never again have to record such fearful weather as that of the 7th, 8th and 9th of January, 1866.

THE REV. J. W. CUMMINGS, D.D., Of St. Stephen's Catholic Church.

A GREAT man and a good has passed away from among us in the person of Dr. Cummings, one of the most popular of the Catholic clergy of New York.

Dr. Cummings was a representative man among the native ministers of the country. Born in April, 1814, at Washington, D. C., he passed, owing to peculiar domestic arrangements, the greater portion of his earliest youth under the immediate control of his mother, and in her society almost exclusively. Having removed to this city, his mother secured for him a preparatory course of training here, and, subsequently, at a college near Nyack, on the Hudson, after which he was sent to Rome, to be thoroughly grounded and cultured in the faith, and fitted, under the auspices of the Propaganda, for the ministry here. It was there that Dr. Cummings laid up that store of theological and practical erudition for which, in later years, he became distinguished. Having graduated with the highest honors, receiving from the Propaganda the honorary degree of D.D., he returned to this country, and was at once stationed, in 1837, at St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Mulberry street. After a long and successful career there, he moved to a school-house, which he had built, on 27th street and Madison avenue, leaving that to erect St. Stephen's Church, on 28th street, of which he continued the pastor until his death.

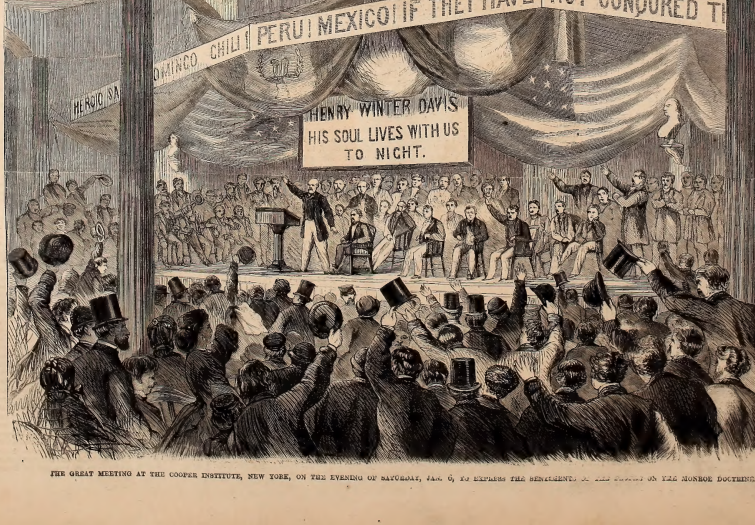
Dr. Cummings was a plain and practical man. His polemical abilities and powers of rhetoric were universally recognized. He was a thorough Italian scholar and poet, a perfect linguist, an accomplished musician, and familiar as well with the lighter branches of modern science as with the more profound. As a minister and speaker, he was greatly beloved and very popular. Singularly free from bigotry and asceticism, he found friends in the ranks of every denomination and among all classes of men. He was an attractive lecturer, a successful writer, and an intelligent and agreeable companion. He was liberal in his ideas and benevolent in his action, conscientious to a fault and tolerant to a degree. The doctor's aptitude and fondness for music were of great advantage to the church, and resulted in many practical and valuable suggestions concerning church music and ecclesiastical ritual.

THE LATE REV. J. W. CUMMINGS, OF ST. STEPHEN'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, TWENTY-EIGHTH STREET, N. Y.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY FREDRICKS.

Dr. Cummings, who resided at No. 80 East 29th street, had been troubled during the past year with dropsical tendencies, but was enabled, with comparative ease down to Christmas last, to attend to the duties of his office. A few days since he caught cold, and was somewhat inconvenienced by its consequences, so much so that on the night of the 24 inst. his friends were greatly alarmed. He was somewhat easier on the next day, and sat in his room surrounded by his family and friends, and Rev. Dr. McGlynn, his assistant. Suddenly, without an instant's warning, he placed his hands upon his breast, and fell dead before them.

To the poor his loss is irreparable, and only those who have known him can understand the social void made by his death.

THE GREAT MEETING TO ENDORSE THE MONROE DOCTRINE.



AN immense meeting of citizens was held on Saturday evening, the 6th inst., in the large hall of the Cooper Institute, for the purpose of expressing their sympathy with the South American republics, and to give their emphatic support to the Monroe doctrine. The platform was handsomely decorated with the emblems of the United States and Mexico. A tribute to the memory of Henry Winter Davis, the great advocate of the Monroe Doctrine, appeared on a mourning transparency over the speaker's desk, and above all these, running the entire width of the stage, was a streamer, bearing the following, in bold, black letters: "Heroic Santo Domingo! Chili! Peru! Mexico! If they have not conquered, they will conquer!"

Among those on the platform was Wm. Cullen Bryant, Hon. S. S. Cox, Rev. Joshua Leavitt, Peter Cooper, Hon. E. G. Squier, and others.

Mr. Squier called the meeting to order, and, in the course of his remarks, he paid an eloquent and touching tribute to the late Henry Winter Davis, as the great supporter of the cause of republics on this continent. Wm. Cullen Bryant was made chairman. Speeches were made by Senor Mackenna, Mr. Bryant, Hon. S. S. Cox and Theodore E. Tomlinson, the sentiments of which were responded to with immense enthusiasm. After which, resolutions of respect to the memory of Henry Winter Davis, who was to have been their chairman, and the meeting adjourned, to meet again at the call of the committee.

It was a most positive proof of the public pulse, that indicated, without a chance of mistake, that the cause is one dear to the American people.

A LITERARY BITER BIT.—Mr. Fields, a London bookseller, is known for his wonderful memory and knowledge of English literature. It is said that, when any author in the neighborhood is at a loss for a particular passage, he goes at once down to the "book store" for the desired information. One day, at a dinner party, a would-be-wit, thinking to puzzle Mr. Fields and make sport for the company, announced prior to Mr. Fields' arrival, that he had himself written some poetry, and intended to submit it to Mr. Fields as Southey's. At the proper moment, therefore, after the guests were seated, he began: "Friend Fields, I have been a good deal exercised of late, trying to find out in Southey's poems his well-known lines running thus: —repeating the lines he had composed—can you tell us about what time he wrote them?" "I do not remember to have met with them before," replied Mr. Fields; "and there were only two periods in Southey's life when such lines could possibly have been written by him." "When were those?" gleefully asked the witty questioner. "Somewhere," said Mr. Fields, "about that early period of his existence when he was having the measles and cutting his first teeth; or near the close of his life, when his brain had softened, and he had fallen into idiocy. The versification belongs to the measles period, but the expression clearly betrays the latter one." The questioner smiled faintly, but the company roared.

THE GREAT MEETING AT THE COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK, ON THE EVENING OF SATURDAY, JAN. 6, TO EXPRESS THE SENTIMENTS OF THE PEOPLE ON THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

THE SULTAN.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

Power, and beauty, and gold are mine.
My seat is the highest, my drink is wine.

The gold and the power were mine by right,
The beauty, I won in Fate's despite.

My cheek grew pale with my soul's disgust;
No heart to love, no friend to trust.

I tore the jewels from brow and wrist;
Diamond and pearl and amethyst.

Flung by the robe of Asian silk,
The gossamer sashes white as milk.

Then smiled to see a Sultan stand,
A seeming tiller of the land.

The day went by, the night came down;
I slipped the palace, I gained the town.

Unknown I walked from street to street,
And found my freedom strangely sweet.

At last I spied a door ajar,
From which a lamp's light, like a star,

Shone out across the summer night,
To guide the expected feet aright.

A sudden fancy fired my brain.
"I am not lord," I said, "in vain."

My right to know who waits within—
So let my night's romance begin.

The threshold crossed, a corridor,
I found, ran straightly on before.

This trod, with cautious feet I stopped,
Before a curtain halfway dropped.

With beating heart, and eyeballs keen,
I peered the amber folds between.

Illih il' Allah! I have lied,
If what I saw I can describe.

Asleep upon a silk divan,
The fairest girl of Ispahan.

And as I gazed, my brain went round—
Whose pearl had I so strangely found?

Whose?—mine, I laughed beneath my breath,
For other claimants—certain death.

I dropped the curtain; gained the street,
And then the palace; never feet

Did better service. Fled an hour.
I had the girl within my power—

My power! oh fool, you cannot take,
The dead within your arms, or make

A statue speak, or kiss, or thrill—
Can only curse, and love it still.

That hour she died, and this, my heart,
Broke when they tore my arms apart

The third morn. Turns the world around.
In vain, since she is in the ground.

Second Marriage.

Dear Mary, I would have written to you before, but it is only now that I am calm enough, after my great grief—to give you the history of the last year.

Listen! You remember hearing that there was a friend of poor Frank's who stayed with us about three weeks at M——. I may as well describe him to you at once, for he is to be my second husband. I dare say you will think me light and unfeeling when you read this, but you would not long think so, if you could only now look in on my thin pale face and trembling hand. I hate this man, so that it will require an effort to describe him to you impartially.

People call him handsome. I do not know that he is not so; there seems to me to be in his face only mind, soul—something more than earthly, and which terrifies me. He is in the House of Commons, and people make a great fuss about his speeches. I never read them.

This man—Richard Thorne is his name—came to stay with us for two months. My husband was then stationed at M——, and we occupied a pretty little house near the barracks. Mr. Thorne was at first agreeable, and pleasant in his manners and conversation, though there was always something about him so superior to either Frank or me, that I was uncomfortable in his presence—never at ease. Frank used to tease me about it, say "I was in love with this wise man, this philosopher" (he called him) "and that I would end by getting wise myself, and looking down on my poor blundering Captain of Dragoons." But he knew better—he knew that I had never loved any body but him, and never would.

Suddenly Mr. Thorne became very still and grave, and left us at the end of three weeks. I questioned Frank about the reason for his leaving, but he would never tell me—only looked grave when his name was mentioned, and swore that he was the noblest fellow who ever had lived.

It was not till my husband was on his death-bed that I saw him again. I would not believe that Frank was going to die, but he called me to him one day and told me I must promise to marry again. I told him, in a storm of grief and tears, "No, that would never be." Then he reasoned with me—told me how he had run through what little fortune had belonged to him, and I would be left quite penniless; told me that I could not take up the old business of teaching while I had our little baby to care for.

I would not listen. I said that if God would not let me die too, then I would work for myself, but never would I be the wife of any other man.

At last the doctor said that it was impossible for Frank to recover. I would not believe, even then. I must hurry over the saddest part of my story.

It was twilight in the spring. I had left Mr. Thorne in the sick room. My husband had sent for him as soon as the doctor gave his verdict. I was standing by the open door to breathe the fresh air, when I felt a hand on my shoulder, and this man said, "Quick! Come, quick!" Almost before he had time to turn from the door, I was at Frank's bedside.

"Ruth," he said, "where is Thorne?"

"Oh, Frank, I do not know, I am here. You do not want any other one." I felt jealous that he should care to have any one but me near him, but he said again:

"Where is Thorne? Where is Thorne?"

He answered for himself as he came in the door: "I am here."

There was a hastiness of expression in the man's voice, a kind of trembling expectation. My husband spoke again:

"Ruth, I am dying; promise me that you will be his wife."

"No," I said, "I will never marry."

"Ruth, come here—let me die in peace—promise! promise!"

"Oh, Frank, for God's sake send him away. Let me stay with you alone. I can never, never, marry again!"

"I do not ask you to love him, my poor unprotected darling. Only let him give you his name, his protection. He has loved you so nobly—promise, promise—then I will send him out of the room—then we can be alone. Oh, Ruth, you can comfort me so, if you will only promise."

I could not speak. I held out my hand to Mr. Thorne, thinking of nothing but how to comfort my husband in this terrible hour. Then Frank said:

"Thorne, swear that you will marry her, even though you know that she has no love for you. She will fulfil her promise; only one thing, if she should love any one else."

"In such case she shall be released."

"God bless you, dear friend; and you will provide a safe home for her till this year is over?"

He bowed his head, then touched my husband's brow with his lips, and went out.

I stayed there with my husband, with my arms clasped round his neck, until his soul passed me on its way to heaven.

Of the succeeding days I have only confused and disturbed memories. Mr. Thorne placed me here with his aunt. Aunt Eleanor, I have learned to call her. I love her.

My little baby died a month after Frank's death, so I am very lonely. It is beautiful country all around here, and I take long, sad walks every day. I begged Mr. Thorne not to see me, or write to me, till our marriage day. Alas! it is to-morrow.

He left me ten months ago in such grief, that if he had been any other man or I any other woman, I might have pitied him; to-morrow he will be here.

Oh, dear Mary, I am writing recklessly, despairingly, and even this comfort is taken from me—you are going to India. I shall have none to speak to of my sorrow, but I shall write to you a little every day, and wait for your return to read it. Dear aunt Eleanor, I cannot talk to her against the nephew whom she idolizes. "If I should love any one else I should be released." I am glad that I can never love again. Good-bye, dear Mary. Pray that I may soon be released from tossing about on the waves of this troublesome world.

April 3d.—Alas! he is coming to-day. Aunt Eleanor has begged me to wear white—only through the ceremony, she says—and I have yielded, because I would not distress her on this last day, so there lies the white dress on the bed, and the gloves and veil. Oh, Frank, I am as listless and uncaring as if this was not to be one of the most miserable days of my life. There, aunt Eleanor calls me. I must go down to meet him.

Ah! good-bye, little room, good-bye all things here which I have learned to love; good-bye all the peaceful, quiet, melancholy days which I have passed here with aunt Eleanor. Another hour from now, and I shall be his wife.

For one thing I must thank him, that he did not at our meeting trouble me with any demonstration of affection. He led me into a separate room, and said:

"Ruth, do you love any one?"

His face was pale as he spoke, and the light which flashed upon it as I calmly answered "No," taught me that I was mistaken, and that he still loved me, despite his seeming coldness, but he became immediately grave and quiet again.

"Ruth, I have come to claim your promise; are you ready?"

"Yes."

That was all that passed, and I have come up to get ready. It would be less pain to me if some one should come here and put me in a coffin and carry me away. There is the carriage at the door, and I look down at my white dress and sigh, for, alas! I am going in it as his bride.

Thorneborough, April 20th.—I have been here a fortnight, and too much bewildered and confused to write in all that time. I must begin now with our marriage day:

After the ceremony was over, and I had put on my black dress again, I bade good-bye to dear aunt Eleanor on the steps. Then I was overcome, and I sat back in the carriage, while the tears ran down my cheeks like rain. I was angry, too; for there he sat, as calm and immoveable as a marble pillar, with lips compressed, and a frown gathering on his brow. He might, I thought, have at least attempted to soothe me. I began to wonder at this strange conduct, and at last, through very pique, I stopped crying. He spoke then:

"Ruth," he said, "there is no necessity to distress yourself so. Why are you so unhappy?"

"Because I am your wife!"

"Listen," he said, "and let us have no more tears."

("Yes," I thought, "he already begins to make himself master.")

"Ruth, you are going to live in the same house with me, and people will call you Mrs. Thorne—that is the only change in your position. To the world we will be husband and wife—I hope that you have powers of dissembling sufficient to appear an affectionate wife; to each other we will be nothing. Remember, that you are only fulfilling a sacred promise which I, but for my own, would never have asked you to fulfil, for I know how hard it is for you."

We were quiet after that, he and I—an extraordinary new-married couple. It was nearly evening when he said:

"Here we are at home! Welcome home, and may God make you happy."

As the door opened, and he lifted me out, light fell upon his face, and I saw how pale he was, and how his lips quivered. I could not, at that moment, help liking him a little, for making me so comparatively happy, but I would not let him see that.

Since then we have lived on in peace, he treats me just as I would have him. He never fails to be in at mealtimes, and then talks so well and intelligently that I can but admire him, while, at the same time, he has a way of putting me quite at my ease, so that I do not realise what a strange position we hold to each other. I begin to find out that he is delightful for a mere companion—begin to have yearnings for deeper and higher things than I have thought of since I was a young girl, with the full world, as I felt it then to be, lying before me. I gave up all those thoughts when I married, dear, bright, careless Frank, who cared for none of these things. I am afraid that if Mr. Thorne were to go away I should miss him at first. I hear him downstairs; it must be nearly dinner-time, or he would not have got back from the city. No, it is only four o'clock—I shall not go down yet.

Thorneborough is a beautiful place, situated in the midst of woods, and spring flowers are covering every hill and valley round about. The house is just such a one as I have always longed to live in, and I should be perfectly happy if it were not for this man. A great change has come over him, he is so perfectly at ease. I believe in my heart that I was right at first, and that he has ceased to love me at all. Heigh, ho! that, at least is a blessing! He never joins me except at mealtimes, and if I take my work into the breakfast-room, and find him there, he immediately leaves the room. He needn't take the trouble; I'm sure I don't care whether he stays or goes. I have found great pleasure in visiting the tenants on the place since I came here. Last night I unexpectedly met him coming out of a cottage, as I was entering. He look pleased, and half turned to go in again, but changed his mind, and went on his own way. Do I care? I'm glad he did not go in with me; I should not have known what to say in a walk home alone with him—it would have been awkward. My lord may keep himself away from me as much as he choses—that pleases me.

Last night, instead of going to his own room, he sat with me through the evening. It was cold enough for a fire, and the room looked cheerful, but he sat on one side of the table, I on the other. I was reading when he came in, and though my work was there, and I could easily have taken it up, I would not put down my book, for I did not wish him to see that his being there made any difference. Of course it makes no difference, but if he had been an indifferent acquaintance I should have been more civil to him. Perhaps I was rather uncivil; it would have done no harm, I suppose, if I had tried a little politeness. At any rate, I was sorry when he went out, coolly wishing me good-night, that I had not been more gracious. It may be that he will come again this evening. I shall not take my book down to the sitting-room with me.

23d.—He did not come near me last evening. I don't care for that. He told me at breakfast that he would be obliged to leave home on the next Wednesday for two months. When will it be next Wednesday? A week from to-day. I wonder why he is going, and where he is going? I am glad that I am to be left at home, for I like Thorneborough exceedingly, and him not at all. I wonder what the place will be like when he is not in it? All his people love him so much that I shall have to be very attentive during his absence. Ah, well, it is a week yet!

24th.—He come again to the sitting-room last night. I had my work, and kept my eyes fixed on it. I had intended to be polite and talk to him a little, but somehow or other I lost all power of being entertaining as soon as I heard him come in. He spoke first;

"Ruth," he said, "it will be very lonely for you to spend the summer with no one in the house to make a companion of, I propose you should invite some friend to stay with you."

"I have no friends to invite."

"I have friends who I am sure you will like, and they will make the place gayer for you, shall we asked them?"

I would much rather have answered "no, let me stay here alone;" but I did not wish to let him think I desired to have any voice in the management of matters, so I said:

"Just as you like."

I was angry with myself, even as I spoke, for answering so coldly, for his voice had quite a tender tone in it when he asked, "Shall we invite them?" He gave me some paper, and I wrote the invitations then and there. Goodness knows what I am to do with the people when they come. Mr. and Mrs. Walker, his cousins, and their son, and Miss Marion Adams, a young lady, who is staying with them. When I had written the invitations he asked me, if I was sure it would give me pleasure to have them with me, in this lonely home. I had half a mind to say "no," and throw the note into the fire, but instead of that I said "yes," and they are coming; those people are coming. Oh, how much rather would I stay here alone. "The whole summer," he said. Are May and June the whole summer? He said he was going for two months. I wish he was not going at all, and to leave me with these people. That is the stupid part of it. I don't like innovation; I was doing very well, getting used to have him about, now he not only goes away, but posters me with a crowd of people I never saw. It would be different if it were Aunt Eleanor. Ah, no; it would not do to have dear Aunt Eleanor, with her clear eyes, and her great love for Mr. Thorne here. What would she think of me?

26th.—I found myself watching for him to come to the breakfast-room the night before last. That is much the pleasantest room in the house, and I always sit there. He came then; and last night he staid away till so late that I was just lighting my candle to come upstairs.

"Ruth," he said, "will you go with me to church to-morrow?"

"Yes, if it is a fine day."

"Remember, then, that service begins at half-past ten. Good-night, Ruth."

"Good-night."

I had a mind to hold out my hand to him, but did not. I wonder if it will be a fine day to-morrow.

27th.—I have been to church with him. Indeed, we spent the day together. It looked very cloudy this morning, and as we sat at breakfast it rained a little. Pshaw, that little rain would not do me any harm. I determined, in my own mind, that it was going to be a fine day, and as I left the room, I said, carelessly:

"I am going to get ready for church; I suppose it is nearly time."

When I came down I found him standing at the halldoor. He was going to drive himself, and I must sit in the back seat. Foolish thing, why did he not let John drive? I would have been glad to go on with a conversation which began at dinner yesterday, and in which I got so interested, as quite to forget all unpleasant things. I forgot myself, too, and talked better than I ever imagined I could. I know that, because there was a look of real interest in his face. He listened to my ideas on the subject we were discussing, just as he might listen to some brilliant talker. I believe I was brilliant for the time, and I felt my cheeks burn while he listened. Surely I find a new character developing in myself; a character which has been asleep under the circumstances of my life always before. We did not exchange a word till we got to church. Well, he may be as quiet as he pleases. I'm sure I don't care. We rode home in the same unsociable manner. I believe that he made a few observations on the surrounding country, and that I answered. He has been reading to me this afternoon. He has a beautiful voice. I wonder what he will do after tea. Go up to his own library I suppose, which adjoins his room, and next Sunday he will not be here.

28th.—No, he sat with me again last evening. I was tired, and had pulled the sofa out near the fire, for it was really cold. He began to read to himself after coming in, but I noticed that sometimes he looked at me as I lay back on the crimson cushions.

"You are not comfortable," he said. "Let me move the sofa," and he moved it in such a way that I could no longer see him without turning my head.

This is Monday. The day after to-morrow he is going away, and on Saturday those stupid people are coming. I wish they would not come till after Sunday.

29th.—I find tears in my eyes. What are they doing there? He has said good-bye to me, for he is going at four o'clock in the morning. He lighted my candle, and stood with his eyes fixed on the floor, as he said good-bye, and held out his hand to me. I am afraid that mine trembled. Well, I shall see him pass the window in the morning. I like early rising. I shall get up very early for the future.

30th.—Ah, I cannot write to-day. I have nothing to write about. I wish I was sleeping underneath the flowers with Frank, instead of living here, married to a man who does not care a rush about me. My husband has an unpleasant day for his journey; it is raining hard, and he will be two days on the road. I wonder what he is thinking of. Ah, me! how lonely this great house is.

May 5th.—I have been sick for the last few days; too sick to write. The doctor said I was threatened with nervous fever, but I think he was mistaken. I never get fevers like other people. Never get sick enough to lie down in bed, and forget things. To-day my guests have arrived. I am glad they did not come before Sunday. I just managed to get to church yesterday, and sat where I sat with him last Sunday. I don't know what the priest preached about; I tried to listen, but I could not. Then tried to think about dear Frank, and my little baby, but I could not think of them. Instead of that, I was thinking of Mr. Thorne.

"He has a fine intellect," said I to myself, and I am sure a tender heart when he loves any one.

I suppose he did once love me, but I have never seen any evidence of that. At any rate, that has been long over. Over, I fancy, before he came to claim me as his bride, according to that unfortunate promise made to Frank. How Frank loved him. He, too, must have had some perception of the noble, great spirit, which is too far above me to stoop down and care for such an one as I. What a grand, calm way he has; what an independent mind, which walks erect and undisturbed through all chances and changes—which leaves on either side all prejudices, all affectations, with a fine simplicity and singleness of purpose, beautiful to see.

I have read lately some of his speeches—how the people who listen must be stirred by them. If he ever comes home again I shall go to hear him speak. Home! Yes, surely this is his home and mine. Our home.

All this I thought yesterday in church. Of course it was foolish in me. Of course I do not love Mr. Thorne, but even a stranger must, I think, admire some points in his character. I have been sick and depressed, so things have more power to move me than they would have, in health. Well, I can write no longer. I must go down and entertain my guests.

8th.—I have just received a letter from Aunt Eleanor, in which she speaks so lovingly of my husband. I keep the letter in my bosom. I love

Aunt Eleanor. Now if these stupid people were not here, I would run over and see her at once. But they are really not stupid, but I wish they were away for all that. Mr. and Mrs. Walker are very agreeable, and their son is intelligent and companionable. Marion Adams you husband knew (as before he was married) is very beautiful. I am plain. She sings beautifully. My voice, after she has been singing, sounds like a wren's. I wonder if she will be here on his return: she has very sweet eyes, but I already see that she is artful. I do not like her at all. But as she is my husband's friend, I do her justice.

26th.—I have become very fond of Mr. and Mrs. Walker, but I am sad, nevertheless. My time is all taken up through the day, and at night, when I wish to write, I fall into such fits of misery, that I forget what I am about.

July 31st.—I have been sick—almost at death's door. Mrs. Walker has been as kind to me as if I were a daughter. Marion Adams comes in to see me once a day. I wish she would stay away. My husband wrote to the steward, two months ago, that he was obliged to go to France on business, and that he must be very careful to see that I "wanted for nothing" till his return.

"Wanted for nothing!" Whatever I that I want? Last week, when I was so very ill, Mrs. Walker wrote to apprise him of my danger. She will be sure. She says that he will have been dreadfully alarmed at not hearing from me for so long a time. Poor lady! how little she knows about it. He will get that letter to-day, and if he should think it worth while to come, he will be here in a few days. I wish that I could be alone when he comes home. Alas! they are not going away till the 1st of September.

August 2nd.—I have been downstairs for the first time to-day. I am getting stronger, but I am sorry for that. I should like to die, and then he come home. I wonder if he will come to-morrow? How everybody I meet seems to love him. What is that?

Yes, it was Mr. Thorne. I ran down, and had just reached the parlor door when he came in. I wished to run across the hall to meet him, but I could not move my feet. He came quickly towards me—I think he meant to kiss me—but I turned away.

"Oh, Judi!" he said, "what a relief to find you down stairs; but you look pale, poor child, and faint. Let me take you to—"

I wish I had fainted, so that he might have carried me into the parlor. I said:

"I have been walking too far to-day. It was very imprudent, for I am not quite strong yet."

And you, Mr. Thorne; I am sorry that Mrs. Walker should have alarmed you about my health."

"I thank her for writing to me, Ruth. I can see, by your appearance, that you must have been very sick."

My appearance! Ah, yes, he must see that I am very pale, and thin—very plain, while that beautiful Marion Adams looks more beautiful than when she came with her clear skin and flashing eyes, with that rich warm calm in her cheeks, and her regal figure, in which one finds no angles, no awkwardness. He did not offer to kiss me again. Indeed, foolish thing, he might have seen how glad it would make me.

Ah,—he is thankful to live in this way. He said to me this morning:

"Ruth, because there are people here to observe us, it is best that we should act as husband and wife in their presence, and be as much together as possible."

I said "very well," and so he has adopted a manner towards me which, while it deceives others, only makes me feel more sharply what a separation there is between us. This cold thing is quite clear, that he does not care for me at all.

He is passionately fond of music, and Marion Adams is singing for him until every note is running till night. I wish she would hold her tongue, for see has now passing the window with a turn in her. I wonder where they are going?

9th.—I cannot bear this any longer. Last night, as he was giving me my candle, I turned quite faint and said: I heard Mrs. Walker say:

"Look at Ruth, Richard, look at Ruth."

He caught me as I was falling. As soon as I felt the kind better, I rose up quickly, and said, I was so afraid that he might think I was only pretending in order that he might support me. I said that I was all right now, and sorry to have troubled him. Mrs. Walker told me afterwards that she had never seen a woman so cold in her manner as I could be sometimes.

August 12th.—I went in late in the morning and found Marion singing while he sat beside her, with his hand covering his eyes. I shut the door very softly and came away. I wish I had told him that I loved some one else when he asked me to marry him before we were married. Then he might have been happy. Oh, me, if he were only happy —it would be no matter about me.

16th.—Frank Walker has returned and brought two young friends with him. And why make quite a gay party now. I see them now from the window, entering the lawn. Marion returns by my husband's side. I excuse myself always from joining them in the evening, on account of weakness. Mr. Thorne says I am not nearly strong enough to go. He often says that to me. I am home with him, but it is clear that is only carrying out the compact between us that we should be affectionate before strangers. I never accept the offer. I know that it means nothing. This morning I was getting some sugar out of the sideboard when he startled me by speaking close at my side. almost in a whisper:

"Ruth, may I stay at home with you to-day?"

"Oh, no, I would rather not."

I shall not interfere with his enjoyments. Poor man, he has few enough—tied to a woman he cannot love. Yesterday, Marion and I found ourselves opposite the large mirror at the same time. I happened to glance up, and caught her eye. I knew what was in her mind, and felt quite defiant about it.

"Marion Adams," I said, "there is a great difference, is there not?" Then I round towards the window with her. Turn your face towards the recess. Mr. Thorne, look at us. What do I look like beside a real good girl, there any likeness between us?"

"No, Ruth, you are very unlike."

Marion pretended to treat it all as a joke, and held me there longer than I wished to stay, till I felt my cheeks burning as red as hers, and my eyes on fire.

Suddenly she looked into my face. Perhaps she was astonished to find that roses could bloom in my cheeks also. At any rate, she released her hold upon me at once. My husband's eyes followed me. Does he see that I am jealous?

11th.—I wish they were gone; and yet I dread it. Perhaps he, too, will find some excuse for going as soon as Marion leaves.

20th.—Marion ought not to act as she does. This morning we were all sitting together, when she went to the piano, and began to sing, with her beautiful voice:

"Canst thou not learn to love me,
Can no my sorrow move thee,
Do I not languish for thee?
Can no my sorrow move thee,
Do I not languish for thee?

"My misery is speaking,
By the warden of an hour
God keep thy heart from breaking,
As mine is breaking now."

I did not dare to look up, my heart was too full. I longed to escape from the room. Once only I raised my eyes, to encounter the furtive, cold glance of his wife, which was immediately fixed on the singer. He need not look guilty. He was free to love her if he chose. He had promise, but he cannot prevent himself from loving another. Oh, beautiful Marion, why are you not better fed? But, Marion, you should not sing such songs as those, you only make him more unhappy. If you were his wife, you would not be worthy of him. Still, I pray that you may one day be his wife, because he loves you. I love him, I know. I know that he would be glad to marry him, because he has wealth and position, and consequently power. But you would not know how to love him; you are too cold. You would not suffer, as I suffer. I am unusual, and I am growing paler and thinner day by day.

25th.—Yes, every day I am weaker. Yesterday he brought the doctor in to see me. The doctor said to him, before me:

"It is not her body, but her mind; something troubles her. You must take her to change of climate."

When the doctor had gone, he stood by the mantle-piece, with his hand over his eyes.

"Ruth," he said, "will you go abroad with me?"

"No."

I could not, at that moment, say more. I know that he wishes to do all he can for me. He shall make no more sacrifices for me. I will not have any. I shall go soon to Frank! Will he forgive me for carrying into that other world another and more cruel sin than that which I left in this? Yes, I know he will.

26th.—He, too, grows very sad and pale. Oh, Marion, grow thin, that he may love you once more! Sing and still stay near him, while you know that your presence only tortures me. I am glad of it in my heart. I couldn't do so. Can you not wait? Can you not be patient? It will not be long before the last leaves the Sound for the land of the dead, the grave.

September 1st.—Is this the same broken-hearted woman who sat here writing twodays ago? Am I the same Ruth? I am changed indeed. I am quite dizzy, and my hand trembles so that it is hard to hold the pen. Ah, I have grown so happy! I see the world is shining for me. I feel I shall try to write quickly, and tell you about it, poor little book, who have listened to all my miseries, and I watched from the window this morning till I saw them crossing the lawn to the boat that should take Adams on his arm. I don't think he meant to go with them; indeed, I am sure that he did not mean it.

"Oh, Mr. Thorne, I am going to hold you to your promise, and you must take me to-day to Frank! Will you? Will you?"

He looked at me, but I would not see it.

"Of course he will," said Mrs. Walker. "Mr. Thorne is not a man who will break his promise, under any temptation."

Then I came away and shut myself in my room. He came to the door, but I told Anne, who was in the room, to say that I "Mrs. Thorne was lying down." I watched till they were out of sight, and then wandered about the house. Then I felt a great longing to be in some place which belonged to him, and went into the library, a room in which he always sits, when not downstairs with the company. It looked out upon the lawn, and contained fewer books than the large one downstairs. The door was slightly ajar, and so I pushed it and went in. On a table in the middle I found my head against the back—there, where his dear head rested when he sat in the chair—and sat in that chair my more. I stooped down and kissed the place. Oh, I love him, I love him, and pale, and laid my head on them. I could not help the tears, and I cried like a child. I cried as I should have cried had never myself, as a weary, passionate child might moan and sob. I heard no one come in, and started up, to find Mr. Thorne standing near me, and raised my head to find him kneeling down by my side.

"My poor Ruth," he said, "how can I comfort you? Oh, be sure that I would never leave you to your grief, if I had known how hard it would be for you. Oh, be sure that I have tried to do all I could for you, and that I have done so. I found that I could not stay without letting you see how dear you were to me. I would put my life to make you happy. You are the only woman I have ever loved, and see, I have made you miserable! Tell me—"

Here he stopped. I think he must have seen some change in my face, for he rose and took something in the eyes, from which no more tears were falling. I know that I looked at him with a great astonishment—a great joy. Whether some change came in my eyes, I cannot tell, but only that he rose up and took me in his arms—that he sat down then in the chair where I had been sitting with me on his embrace like a child, unfolded with a sure protection. He held my head up, and turned my face to the window, and round on the thin finger. I flissed the ring.

Then I looked up and looked out on the wall. He has gone to see about our poor, neglected guests, who leave to-morrow. They are packing up for their journey in the morning. I am not writing I, too, am going away with my husband. In all the world there is no woman so happy as I.

RUTH THORNE.

The Chinese tread their wives as badly as the Christians. Mr. Govinda Rogoo, a native merchant at Bombay by Mrs. Govinda Rogoo: "I am the lawful wife of the prisoner, Govinda Rogoo. I was married to him according to Hindoo rites. I was then but a cart driver, and I lately lived with him in a room in a house in Nagpore. He used to go out to his day's work. We went to the room of one Muckabye with whom he had lived. The prisoner then lay down on a cart and told me to beat him. I did so. He did not been lying an hour when the prisoner took an unsheathed knife and struck him in the left side of the chest. He did so laughing. He then with the end of the turban tied my wrists behind my back. I asked him to desist, but he kissed across my body and kept me down. He then had fastened my limbs he let off the end of the turban to my hair, to which he fastened it. He did not speak while doing so, but was laughing. After he had finished tying me he sat down beside me, and said: 'I will you run away from me?' I promised I would not. He then said, 'I will take your life,' or 'I shall make you lame, and I do not care if I am hanged for it.' He ordered me to keep quiet; and taking a knife from his pocket stabbed me in my abdomen, then on my right side, and several times in my body. I attempted to cry, but he tried to stuff something in my mouth. After he had stabbed me, he wiped the knife and put it into his pocket."

SPLENDID NAVAL ENCAGEMENT
Between the Covadongas and the Esmeraldas—The Chilean Victory.

NOTHING is spoken about or communicated upon by the press of Chile except the naval engagement between the Covadongas and Esmeralds. When the news of the victory of the Chilean fleet reached Chile, and that Parejo had established a blockade, we had not heard of the existence of two Spanish vessels and Maipo had both escaped from Valparaiso, fully manned, armed and provisioned for a cruise. Many supposed that they would cross the Pacific Ocean to keep up and destroy Spanish merchant vessels; but others said they would rest be far off, and would be ready to strike when the time for action came. The latter were right. The Esmeralds is a screw corvette of 16 guns, and the Covadonga a screw gunboat of 4 guns. They are the former consists of medium 32-pounders. Since their departure from Spain, the fate of these vessels somewhat mysterious. It was known that they were in the vicinity of the coast of Chile, and it is only now we learn that, with their secret well kept, a steamship had been intrusted to one of them upon the squadron of Spain, and a most meritorious officer, Admiral Parejo's pride, if he has any in his composition.

The Covadonga is a screw gunboat of about 700 tons and a 'horse power. Her gun—crew is 120 men and two 32's." She was reputed to be of good speed, and was commanded by a most excellent and able naval officer. She had been to Coquimbo, and there met the English mail steamer bound south, and from her received information which small dispatches and money. On the 30th of November the British mail steamer Valparaiso left Valparaiso, and on board of her dongs was there, although she had left Coquimbo some hours in advance of the mail steamer. About the time that the Valparaiso was off Coquimbo the sound of a distant cannonade to the northward was distinctly heard by those on board, and smoke in the far off in the hills surrounding the city. All were on tipties of excitement to know what it meant, and the sound of the guns was heard by many who were on the deck ment more intense. At 11 o'clock that night, however, the true purpose and object of the cannonade was known, distant 40 miles, dated on board the corvette Esmeralda the same day in which her commander, Senor Don Juan Williams, announced to the Minister of Foreign, that he had this morning intercepted the Covadonga en route for Coquimbo from Valparaiso, and after an engagement of half an hour had captured her, she having two killed and 14 wounded, while the Chilean vessel had escaped unscathed. The loss on the Spanish vessel he captured as prisoners of war seven officers and 90 men. The Covadonga was provided with stores or armament, was also taken: Four heavy guns, as before stated, with their carriages, all complete in every ace, 200 boarding plates, an ample supply of shot, shell, powder, &c. The magazines and cabin were filled with coal. The signal book was also captured. When the Esmeralda and this corvelonga were taken into the port of Fuzido, the prisoners landed and marched through the streets to the jail, and the vessel was in almost period order, having suffered but trifling damage. The vessel captured said Covadonga is the Chilenos, and sailed the same night, with the Esmeralda, for Valparaiso.

The affair altogether was a most creditable one for the Chilean Gulf. Coquimbo is liable to up such vessels as that Parejo and his big frigates are in danger, that he is liable to be attacked by them. Parejo, also, is aware of this danger, made doubly strong by this disaster, and knowing that he has committed himself to a great safety, and in this manner the blockade of all but one of the ports of Chile, and the whole of the coast line around him, the iron-clad Numancia among them, he will be looking for such dispatches as would connect with the late victory, the Chilenos will arrange some plan for the capture of the Numancia or her destroyer. No one will be left unturned, now that the ball is fairly opened, that will bring about such a crushing blow as will prevent him in future even showing his nose this side of the Cape, or sending out any of his piratical errands.

We say that the news of the victory was received with great joy in Chile, is hardly sufficient to describe the feeling of delight that pervaded all classes when the glad ne west half mad. The day of the republic appeared to have arrived. Business was at once suspended in the streets, and crowds of people joined in singing the national song of Chile, and in the cheers for Commodore Williams, his officers and c.ew. A solemn Te Deum was sung in the Cathedral, at which attended the Archbishop of Santiago, and the President and all the high officers of the government, and the diplomatic body of the Cogadongs—the proud banner of Spain—which had been flaunted in the face of Esmeralda, was deposited in the cathedral "as a trophee of homage and humble repentance for the insult offered to Him who is adored for the just cause." After the ceremony the President and Cabinet, the Senate, and immediately proceeded Commander Williams to the rank of post captain, and the officers and crew of the Esmeralda and Covadonga announced a subscription for a sword of honor for Captain Williams, and it will be one worthy of a generous people.

THE REFORMED ROBBER.

In the year 1810, Father Raphael, an ecclesiastic of Orne, Normandy, set out one day for the city the country to prepare a highwayman for death. The criminal was not more than 20 years of age, and was with an interesting physiognomy, and had been seduced by bad company. He had frankly confessed all the circumstances of his crime, and his confession were taken off, as usual, previous to his execution; and as there was no appearance of a reprieve, he was completely and the culprit were shut up in a small chapel, which stood detached from my other buildings, at the extremity of the village, and received all its light from an aperture in the middle of the vaulted roof.

Here the criminal's devotions commenced an earnest exhortation to repentance; but though he made it as persuasive and pathetic as possible, he observed that the culprit did not seem to pay much attention to what said. As his appearance, age and confession, gave the clergyman reason to suspect a hardened criminal, he was somewhat surprised at this inattention. He ascribed it, however, to a natural levity of disposition, and, thinking that the approach of eternity would prompt his companion to make the best use of the short time that had yet to live,

"Hyall means, reverend father," replied the prisoner, "that is just what I should wish to do. Your exhortations are very good indeed, and yet I doubt whether your reverence would yourself pay much attention to them if you were in my place. If you were in my place, Fa, to say nothing about the confoundedly disagreeable sensation, arising from the knowledge that in a few hours one's neck is to be broken, there is one thing which suggests itself with such force as to occupy my whole soul."

"Ill—it! What do you mean?"

"Don't you see that opening in the roof?"

"Yes, certainly; but what then?"

"That it is a considerable height is evident enough. But if we were to put that star exactly underneath it, and upon the star that chair; if your reverence would get upon the chair, and then suffer me to get upon your shoulders, I should certainly be able to reach it."

"And when you had got there what would you do?"

I would scramble down the roof to the cornice, and then a bag of tree or six yards would be but a trifle for a man in my situation. I hope that nobody is watching us, and that when I have once reached the roof, I would not be cut; I can assure you that as soon as I reached the ground, I would run as fast as my legs would carry me."

Here the poor fellow paused. The priest considering the whole plan as useless, and its difficulty repressed on involuntary smile, and replied:

"Excellent! And I am to assist you to do this! At a great risk to myself, I am to enable a robber to continue his guilty course! All the depredations which you would have committed—"

"No, reverend sir, never would I commit any more. I am now fully aware of the consequences. I have thus far repressed my feelings, but I am now about to die; a future as far as lies in my power. I will betake myself to work, and endeavor to atone a part of the sins I owe so hard to do it. Help me but this once, I entreat you!"

The father did not suffer him to solicit long; he only exacted a solemn promise of amendment, and the, though he knew it was long before released in the prisoner, he complied with his request. He assisted to remove the altar, placed the chair upon it himself, and patiently waited to lengthen out the singular affair. The poor fellow certainly had great difficulty to reach the opening in the roof, and it was not till he had accomplish? When he had crept out, the father listened attentively for some time, and as the legs was followed by no voice or sound, he removed the chair, returned to their proper places, and consciently waited full two hours to see how the affair would end.

At length the officers of justice, conceiving that the prisoner had been allowed sufficient time to prepare himself, the doors of the execution-shed were flung away. The former knocked at the door. The executioner's wife then replied, that he had long been anxiously wishing to be released. The executioner then opened the door of the chapel, and with still greater astonishment, beheld the father sitting all alone in the midst of it.

"Where is the prisoner?" was very naturally the first question.

"The prisoner," calmly replied the ecclesiastic, "was taken as a penitent, and he has escaped from me as a man. While I was endeavoring, to the best of my ability, to bring him to a due sense of his guilt, he suddenly rose from my side, and escaped through the open aperture. I looked after him, petrified with astonishment, unable to move, or utter a single word to stop him. It was not till you knocked that I regained the power to speak or act."

The jailor and executioner would willingly have suspected that the priest had connived at the escape, but as the criminal was irreconcilably lost, they knew not whether to consider him as a sinner or a saint.

Several of the villagers assembled; but after the most diligent search, nothing was to be seen or heard of where the criminal could be discovered. The executioner, who was his profession, hour by hour, expected to acquaint the officers of justice with the circumstance. The reverend father, as in duty bound, had immediately repeated the same story as before. He added, that in the case you to be sent to ask for the reprieve of the prisoner, and that he was almost convinced that repaid would give him the pleasure of finding that he had carried out the aperture in the roof. The superstition of the people would be of great service to him, and the false hook no pains to refute it.

The reverend father and the circumstance of the lost criminal was almost forgotten by the good people of Orne, when, one day Father Raphael was surprised through a flittant province, and was belated as that the night overtook him upon the highway, and in the midst of a dep forest. In the midst of his troubles a bright glimmer of light in the distance relieved the made his way. It proved to proceed from a small and comfortable cottage, into which he entered, and in a comely young woman to find a good-featured, stalwart man sitting by a blazing fire.

The good father noted a strange manner about the man on first entering, and was somewhat alarmed to find upon the cottager and his wife's part to shower upon him all the consideration and attention in their ton the house could give and the choice bed was his, and the choicest supper was set before him; and the father upon his way within sight of his destination, a hearty meal of bread and milk.

They jogged pleasantly on until the time came for parting, when the host, who had been absent during the a small purse with, for a poor man, a liberal allowance of coin, and begged him to bring to Father Raphael "in love of God," said:

"Now, father, we must part, but before you go let me ask you a question. Do you not remember me?"

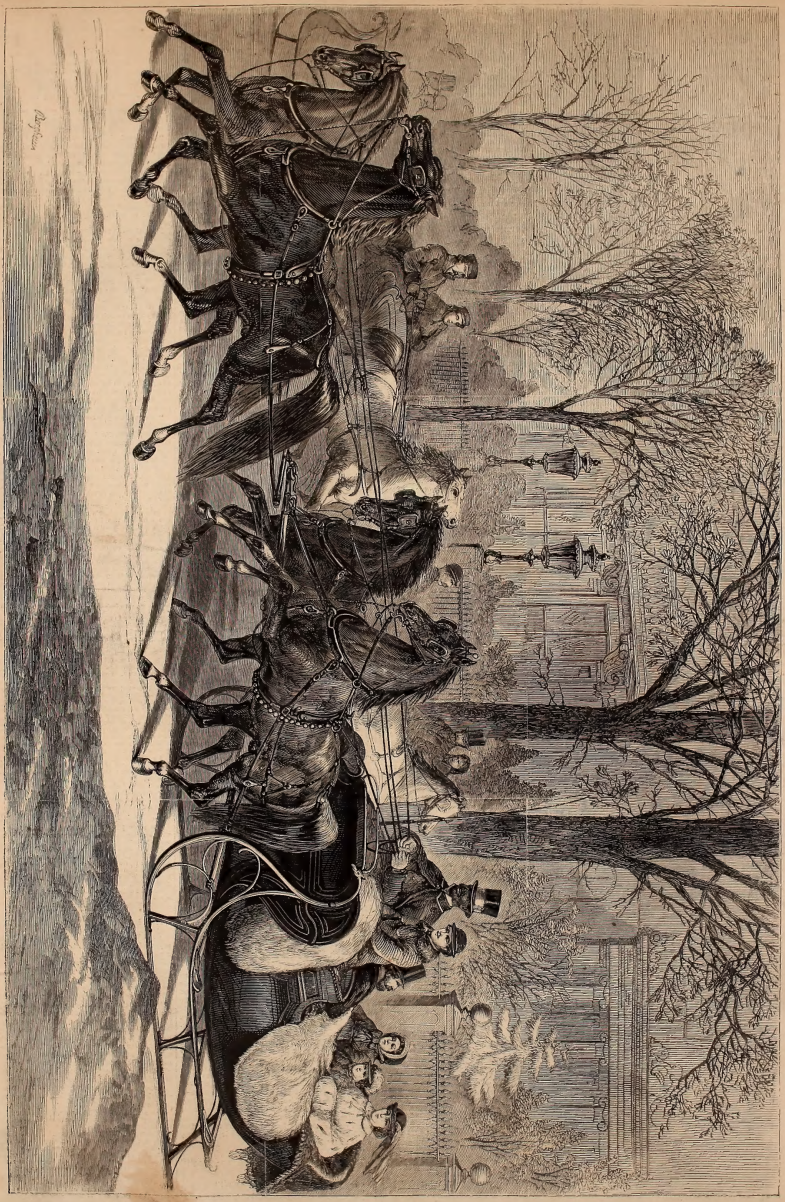
"No, my son, I do not."

"Strange!" said the man, "when you once saw d my face."

The story is told. It was the identical highwayman who had undergone the benevolent operation, and, in many years before, escaped an ignominious death.

He had kept his promise faithfully, had become an honest man, married and prospered, and the father had met it forward, as he had promised, to the end of life in giving him to the world, but ever afterwards, about the beginning of the month of September, he found in his gold pieces, found its way mysteriously to the father's hands, and aided not a little in smoothing the winter of his life.

THE LAST CASE OF BARBARITY.



The universal Yankee notion is generally suppose to be a kind of inventive mania, but occasionally John Bull surpasses us, and puts in something that the shaggers our views of labor-saving machinery. Of this style is the machine for shaving the hair, the description of which is the following paper.

Few things could better illustrate the many purposes to which machinery may be turned, than its applicat ar to hair-brushing; and certainly two or three years ago it would have been one of the last things thought of. When the announcement was first made, it was not looked on it as a mere puff; but a few trials served to convince the most incredulous that the thing is both more pleasantly and more effectively brushed by machinery, than in the ordinary manner.

Hitherto, the hair-brushing machine has been for too cumbrous and complicated for private houses; but this important desideratum has been secured in two objects, and its extreme simplicity must commend it to general use.

The hair-brush, as it is seen, consists mainly of an ordinary chair—somewhat more solid, perhaps, than the fine, flimsy articles which modern upholsterers usually with such "lear and trembling," but neither more heavy nor more cumbrous than many others admitted into our houses. To this chair is affixed a support by no means unornamental, and to the support are attached the roller and driving-wheel, to give motion to the brush. The speediness is made to revolve by a common treadle, similar to that of a lathe or sewing machine, and any domestic can both work the treadle and manipulate the brush at the same time. On the whole, the invention is both simple and effective—a combination quite essential to success—and there is a sentence about it which is not to be least spared.

Transcriber's Note: Text in italics is enclosed in _underscores_.

SLEIGHING IN THE CITY.

SLEIGHING IN PIKE COUNTY.

"REQUIESCAT IN PACE."

BY M. ELIZABETH PERRY.

Frozen, for aye,
The girlish face
And peerless form
In death's embrace.

Silent, and cold,
The full lips close;
For ever more
In pale repose.

Never a word
They'll speak again—
Never utter
A moan of pain.

No light can break
From those dull eyes,
Nor loving glance
Of sweet surprise.

Thank God, for this
We know the dead
Have never more
A tear to shed.

Fold the dark hair
Around her brow,
Where angel's seal
Is resting now.

Cross the white hands
Upon her breast.
So let her lie,
Taking her rest.

That perfect rest
Which mortals crave
And find at last
Within the grave.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LIII.—THE DEPARTURE.

After spending some hours, of a pleasant kind enough to a boy, in purchasing things that Bob thought would be useful when he got abroad, they set off to the pier in a cab, with all their acquired treasures about them.

"Aint you goin' to wear them things as I give you?" asked Bob.

"Them! No. Not if am to be a gentleman. It's only low swells as mounts false jewelry."

Bob was delighted with his "sperrit," and began to express his sentiments by a kind of triumphant cockcrow.

"If you'll give me the real ones," said Esau, archly.

"You'll wear 'em? I believe yer, my boy. But you shall, honor bright, as soon as we're abroad."

Esau was so far from objecting to go abroad when the critical moment came, that he was actually the first to stand in the gangway of the gigantic steamer, looking up with his old saucy cock of the eye at the captain, who had mounted the bridge.

Presently Bob and his inseparable joined the lad, and they all went down below to get a bottle of ale. When Esau tired of this, he asked Bob if he mightn't go upon deck. Bob graciously consented. But he soon followed, as if with a misgiving, that Esau's conduct did not at all justify. He was standing at the bulwark, leaning his elbow on it, and so supporting his head, and seemed lost in thought. Bob went to him, touched his shoulder, took out a little package that Esau knew well, and beckoned him to follow.

And now for Esau's hour of glory. Taking the things out of the parcel, one by one, Bob gave Esau the gold watch, aad fastened the gold chain to it, and put the ring on Esau's finger, and fastened in his neck-scarf the diamond pin.

"Might be a markis just come into his estates," said Bob, admiringly, as he saw the result. But Esau didn't, after all, care to make much display of his wealth. Bob, having hooked his victim, felt safe, and went back to his ale. Esau found another and less conspicuous corner, out of the way of the people who thronged the principal parts of the deck, and of the sailors who were disposing of packages newly come on board, and then he took a good look, one by one, at his acquisitions, beginning with the ring, but ending with the watch.

His whole heart was evidently in that superb piece of workmanship, which, though it had cost so much just now, was not new, but had originally cost far more. It was incredible to Esau what he had heard and partly understood—"guaranteed to keep within three seconds for a twelvemonth together!" And now he was watching the secon s: one—two—three! And that was the only error his darling watch would commit during a whole year—was it? He felt greatly inclined to hug it. But as he looked, some inexplicable feeling or thought caused a tear to come into his eye, which sparkled in the bright sun as it rolled down his cheek. He looked and listened to the tick, and opened out the dial face, and touched it with his fingers. Then he got to the inner works, and saw the jewels gleaming in the sun.

Presently he dashed the tear from his eye, and began, without changing his seat, to busy himself in a curious way. He took a silk handkerchief from his pocket, and he put the watch into it—rolled up in one corner. He then took off the ring, and put that next. Lastly, he stuck the breastpin into the bundle, in such a manner as to keep the contents tightly fastened together in half the handkerchief. Then he rolled the little hard knot up in the remainder of the handkerchief, and held it in his hand, which he slid into his breast, as if intending to watch for an opportunity to do something with it: perhaps give it to a stranger to give to his father. He now rose, and began to walk about. His father, at some distance, saw him, and began to stroll towards him; but Esau didn't or wouldn't see him, and so turned out of his way.

It didn't matter to Bob. He was glad to see the boy stare at the packages, read the nam es d addresses, peep down the hatchway, exchange salutes with a grinning stoker, for all he wanted was to get the lad safely off, and then he and Esau would discuss these things with quite a new light.

While he is lighting his pipe, and exchanging a few last words with his comrade, Esau happens, unobserved, to become a listener.

"What's this?" demanded a voice, in a tone not unlike the tone of a modern cabman when he receives sixpence for his fare, and asks the same question. "Five pounds for a job as is worth five-and-twenty! Better make it ten, Bob, or I'll be happening to get hold of that 'ere gent as was so sweet on the boy."

"Will you, Bill? That's very good on yer. Then I'll make it six if ye'll promise to give him my compliments—Bob Stonor's compliments (spell the name for him if he likes)—and say where you left us, and what we're after."

Bill looked black as thunder, but felt Bob was too much for him.

"And there's t'other gent—Mister Sleuth. Won't you go him? He wants this devil's imp back too. Of course he does! Only try him. Why, Bill, I didn't think you had been such a spooney."

"Anyhow, I can tell him it's all his money, not yourn."

Bob felt that stroke, and said, in a less bantering tone—

"And what good 'ud that do him? I've got it, and I means to keep it. But mind you, for his good as well as my own. But come, Bill, I can afford to overlook the failin's of an old pal. I can afford to be generous. So here; 'old your 'and, Bill, and there's five more to make a man on yer. Take my adwice—Bob's parting adwice to his countrymen of the humbler class: work hard, don't get drunk, live on nothink a day, if that's all you've got, and allus take care of your charakter. Why, Bill, that's adwice as is worth more to you than the ten pounds. What's ten pounds? If you were to give them back to me, it wouldn't much matter. Try, if you like. But that adwice is a very essence of gold, and diamonds, and walleyable stones; for it's what I reads in my paper is the whole duty of man, purvided he's poor and knows his place. It's political economy, and religion, and I don't know what besides."

Bill shook hands, a little mollified by the other five pounds, and then the two worthies parted—Bill, with a kind of chivalrous feeling, declining to go to Esau and wish him good-bye, lest Bob might mistrust his intentions. As they parted, however, Bob whispered in his low and very unwhisper-like tone—

"Look out, will yer, till we're off?"

Esau flew from the place where he had listened to all this, and was presently seen sauntering about as before.

The vessel now begins to move. Bill hurries off, and Bob watches him ashore, then looks round. He doesn't see Esau, but that's no wonder, there are so many people. He walks quietly along the deck; still he doesn't see him. He runs down into the cabin; up again to the deck, with the same result. He hears now a splash in the water, and a cry—"Man overboard!"

"Easy, easy!" cries the captain, while looking out from the bridge.

"I say, Mister Captain, stop, if you please—it's my boy. He's tumbled over."

"Pooh, pooh, my man! all a mistake. I've been watching for him, and I see no sign. It's something else. Go on!"

"But, I say, put me ashore!"

"I can't. Pray be quiet. I'm busy."

"You must; I won't go. Stop, Mister Captain. I can't go without him!"

"Here! remove this man!" shouted the captain. "Easy, easy! Let her go!"

CHAPTER LIV.—LONG WICKHAM.

In the old part of Long Wickham town, wedged in tightly between a stonemason's and a builder's yard, was a curious, age-blackened, thatched house. It was approached by a garden, with a few trees in it; but these were not luxuriant enough to hide the builder's planks leaning over it on the one side, nor the chipped and grimy images and tombstones in the mason's yard on the other. It was a house that had seen better days, and that was determined not to smile on the present ones. Its old thatch had come loose, and hung in a frowning mass over the door. Its green-veined face was nearly always weeping, and, by its deathly coldness, repelled the vine and the clematis, which, weary of trying all the summer to comfort it, and make it young and fair again, and deaden for it the weary sound of the sawing and chipping of the tombstones, had now shuddered down, and lay huddled on the mould in death.

In the silence of the September evening, when the children of Long Wickham were at play at the new end of the town, and the blacksmith at the forge opposite was putting on his coat to go home, he saw a stranger open the garden gate of the dull house, and go up and stand some time at the door without knocking. He stood so long that the blacksmith grew tired of waiting to see who he was and what reception he might meet with, so he jerked his key out of the forge door and went his way.

The thatch, from one of its hollow tubes, let fall a drop of dew on the pale face that looked up at it, the dying clematis rustled and sighed on the ground, the tall sunflower near the door waved him back, the stone faces in the mason's yard seemed to change from white to green and from green to black as they stared at him. Death, in the shape of a great white tombstone, looked over the wall at him, and seemed to say, "You have made sure of finding your last friend here; did you forget me? What if I have been to seek him before you?"

The twilight was deepening, damps were rising from the earth, a moist wind blew, the little garden was black and desolate, and full of death. The guest at the dull house was footsore, cold, hungry. He doubled up a white, stiff hand, and knocked at the door. There was no answer, He did not knock again. He put his thumb on the latch, and with a fierce movement tried to push the door in. It yielded—opened. Light came on his face, and laughter to his ears. He stepped in, and stood in the wide, old-fashioned passage, and shut out the ghastly images grinning over the mason's yard, and shut out the odors of death. Then he looked at the stream of light coming from an open door, and listened to the sound of children's laughter till the tears stood in his eyes.

Presently he crept along the passage and looked in at that open door. Amid the shrieks of laughter he had heard, as he came along the passage, cries of—"The queen! the queen! Make way there for the queen!" As soon as his eyes had become accustomed to the light, Anthony saw that her majesty, who was making so much noise, was no other than his once irreproachable acquaintance, Miss Elizabeth Jane Harris.

Her coronation had just been celebrated, and there she sat, her father's shoulder for a throne, her father's paper cap for a crown, and a toasting-fork for a sceptre, which she waved with a right royal air, bringing down at every movement a perfect storm of applause from her admiring subjects. Her eldest brother was perched on a high window-sill, trying his flute. Suddenly he struck out with an enlivening martial air, to which the royal cortège began to dance.

Away flew chairs and stools, round went the toasting-fork, and down it came on poor Harris's head or shoulder if he paused an instant to take breath in the wild dance. So irresistible was the music, that the queen's mother, who was frying the supper, was obliged to dance too on the hearth-rug, waving her fork, with a sausage on it, to the tune.

This movement, unfortunately, threw a damp on the festivity, as her majesty set up a lusty cry for the sausage. Harris, no longer under the stimulus of the sceptre, stopped, looking very much dragged about the coat-tails, which, indeed, had nearly been sacrificed to the mad loyalty of her majesty's younger subjects.

"There's a queen for you!" shouted Harris, holding her up as high as his arms could reach. "Aint she the beautifulest queen as ever wanted to grab what wasn't her'n? Show me a better, if you can, from Chayni to Morrocker!"

Nobody accepting the challenge, he set the queen on her feet, and watched her admiringly as she toddled to her mother, to whom she put up a very touching, but altogether unqueenlike appeal for the coveted treasure.

As he stood there in the middle of the room, hot and panting, his eye wandering round with a good-humored dismay at the confusion and mess they had made, he had what seemed to him a strange fancy that he had heard his own name uttered. His ears were still tingling from her majesty's grip, and he thought they might easily have deceived him. He moved away, and stooped to pick up a chair next the door. Then he heard distinctly a faint voice, calling quite near:

"Harris! Harris!"

"Hollo!" roared Harris, pitching his voice as if to answer a call from half a mile off.

Immediately after he had shouted out, and brought his wife and children running to the door, he caught sight of a pair of sunken, wistful eyes, a pale face half smiling at him, a figure leaning against the passage hall. He was conscious of seeing the figure slide a little, as if it would fall, conscious of catching at it and laying one of its arms over his shoulder, and bearing its weight against him. As to the exact moment of his recognising his guest, or the first feelings of surprise at finding him in such a state, he never could remember anything about it afterwards. Surprise was so soon overpowered and forgotten in the much deeper, much quieter emotion with which he felt the hand that had been so generous to them grow stiff in his, the form which had burned with fever for their sakes, becoming more and more of a dead weight against his chest.

He waved back the children and bore him into the room, the old sofa was hastily cleared of her majesty's toys and rubbish—a proceeding which she contemplated, finger in mouth, from the folds of her mother's gown.

"Now, Bessie," said Harris, in a wonderfully quiet, firm voice, "send Tom for some brandy."

He had his arm under him still, when he had laid him down. He felt the form move on it when he gave the order about the brandy, and then felt a breath on his ear. The white lips were speaking. Harris bent close down and heard the words:

"Don't send for anything for me. I'm a beggar, Harris—don't send, I can't pay for it."

Harris looked up after his boy with a strange glitter in his eyes.

"The best brandy, Tom," he said.

He was wonderfully wise at that minute for so simple and slow a man. The tone in which he said "The best brandy, Tom," said all he wished to say in answer to Anthony's wild words.

When Tom had gone Anthony sat up and looked round him, and held out his hands to Harry and to his wife. He begged for a bit of bread, and her majesty handing him her crust, Mrs. Harris burst out crying to see how ravenously he ate it. Harris spoke very sharply to her, and got up and began to cuff the children right and left, giving all an excuse for a good blubbering, which he saw was beginning. Indeed, he had to give vent to his feelings in the same way several times that evening while Anthony told his story.

CHAPTER LV.—CALMER MOMENTS.

At breakfast, next morning, Anthony sat with his host, so wonderfully refreshed that the recent collapse seemed alike incredible to all.

He said nothing about it, further than was involved in the completion of his story, which was listened to with an emotion that more than once compelled Anthony to stop and try to laugh off the tragical influence.

And then, when he had shown his real position, and saw how his very fall only raised him the more mysteriously in their eyes, he dropped all reference to himself, and began to turn the talk to them.

"And how goes on the cabinet-making?"

"Cabinet-making? I gave that up long ago. Don't you know what I'm a doing now?"

"Not in the least."

"Now, what might you have been thinking—if one might make so bold as to ask—what might you ha' bin expectin' to find my state of things here?"

"Before I got in, I was afraid lest you might be out of work; and then—well, then, as I saw you all so comfortable, I was afraid lest you might get out of work. One does get such odd fancies, you know."

Harris replied with a hearty laugh that puzzled Anthony, and said:

"To be sure. Well, I wish you'd go out there, through that door, and ask my masters if they think o' discharging me! I've got a little job as must be done this evening—promised; and I don't like to break my word."

Anthony went out, and, to his surprise, found he was in the yard he had previously noticed. It was half a builder's, half a wheelwright's, with a dozen men, most of them the very ideals of contented industry, with their hard, horny hands, occasionally bright, handsome features, and little jets of song, laughter and whistling. They were hard at work, in all sorts of ways and places, chipping away with adzes at a block underfoot, mending big wagons, putting in the rungs of strong ladders, and so on.

Anthony stared in sheer amazement. What! Harris, whom he had dreaded to find so poor that he might even be unable to take a temporary hospitality from him, he the master of all this! He was perfectly bewildered.

Harris came out, pretending to want to speak to one of the men; but Anthony, who saw his shy yet proud look, understood what he had really come for.

Very odd! There was not a single face that looked in trouble in that busy little workshop except the master's own. Prosperity had brought with it its own fresh troubles.

Could he play the master? Anthony wondered. No doubt about that. All Harris's ordinary hesitation disappeared when he spoke to the men, which he did in few words, in a low tone, and generally with a bit of a smile, but always so as to be promptly understood and obeyed.

Anthony began then to understand his host better. The painful circumstances connected with his original acquaintance with Anthony in the streets on the one hand, and his sense of his ignorance, contrasted with his belief in Anthony's supereminent acquisitions and position as a scholar and a gentleman, on the other, these were the things that made him so bashful before his young benefactor, so untrue to his better self and his native manliness of character in essentials.

Anthony began to muse over this unexpected change of fortune, and contrast it with his own. Harris had risen while he had fallen. Was it from their respective merit and demerit? Hardly. Still it made Anthony very thoughtful, as he wondered what he should do next day. He was quite determined not to stay as he was an hour longer than he was compelled.

When he got back into the room, he found Harris sitting at a writing-desk, the very picture of an aged schoolboy, hopeless of mastering a lesson. He stopped suddenly, not noticing Anthony's entrance, and thrust both his hands through his grizzly, straggling hair, the dusty points of which stuck out as if in sympathetic hopelessness and chaos.

"You look puzzled?" said Anthony, going towards him.

"Do I?" said Harris, glancing up with a painful, confused look, which instantly brightened at the sight of Anthony. Then, as if conscious he couldn't manage the two ideas at the same time—his work and Anthony—he was going to put by his papers of figures, but Anthony would not allow him.

"Go on. Don't let me stop you," he said.

"No, it don't matter; when the children and the missus is gone to bed, I'll try it agin. That's my inspired time, as I often says to wife."

"I wonder whether I could help you?"

"No, no, I couldn't let you, with all this trouble on your shoulders. I couldn't, really. But if you see me bothered a bit, you mustn't mind. You won't, will you? I often am bothered. Figures aint in my way; and yet, somehow, I can't get on without 'em. I wish I could; it 'ud be better for me."

Harris sighed as he said this. Anthony again spoke:

"I wish you'd let me try at the thing you have in hand just now. I must do something, you know, and immediately. And most likely, it will be to get into some large firm in a very humble capacity, and then trust that the advantages my education has given me, and the spur of necessity which goads me on, will together enable me to rise. That is now my only hope. So let me try if I am able to help you out of your perplexity. If I can, don't you see what a comfort it will be to me? Besides, how do you know I mayn't have to give a reference to somebody who can speak of my skill in such things? And if I can say, 'Go to Mr. John Harris, of Long Wickham,' think of that, my friend."

A shy laugh crossed the troubled face for a moment; and then, again, there appeared on it a strange medley of conflicting expressions. He glanced towards his family, and Anthony fancied he was thinking of his exposure before them, who were accustomed, as did he, to such and daily exercises in figures as the foundation of all the family's prosperity, and to reverence him and them accordingly.

Harris saw, however, they were for the moment occupied, and he looked wistfully at Anthony, who read in his face the sense of shame at having to reveal the extent of his ignorance and arithmetical incapacity—mingled, however, with a sense of the honor, as he seemed to think it, of Anthony's offer, which, however, delicious to him, was excessively embarrassing. This was not at all to Anthony's satisfaction, who felt now that he, and not Harris, was in the really false position. So, without further ado, he sat down close by Harris, and said:

"I suspect you've got some valuable trade secrets here, and I give you fair warning, I mean to find them all out."

The enjoyment of Harris at this stroke settled the last lingering doubts and hesitations of which Anthony was soon hard at work castingup the items of an account which, with immense labor, Harris had prepared, full of ludicrous errors in grammar and spelling, and which he could not bring, he said, to a correct total, though the figures were there at the bottom that ought to represent it.

"It stood so right—do you think it can?" he asked Anthony, with a most earnest face. "When I've added 'em up four—no, five times—and every time I makes it come quite different, shouldn't you say there must be something wrong?"

"Well, yes, I should," responded Anthony, gravely. "Let me try."

He began to reckon, but stopped frequently, with his finger pointing at particular figures, to ask questions and get answers, and then went along again.

"Eight!"

"Yes."

"Ought?"

"Yes."

"Four?"

"No, that's nine. Stop—no, it's two. Stop. —I think it must be seven."

Thus Anthony finished his first calculation, and corrected in Harris's previous total, which was very nearly right. Then he verified this calculation by a second process, and found it was quite correct.

"There," he said. "That's done, I think, so that you may rely on it."

Harris, who had been watching Anthony's eye and lips as he ran up and down the many columns, heedless of all the little interruptions made necessary by the uncertainty as to the figures themselves, stared almost in awe, and said nothing. The eyes and lips were to him as the incantations of some wizard, and every number his own wonder grew. He took the figures and himself laboriously went through the items, and when last Anthony looked so disheveled, that Anthony saw the work was not yet clear.

"Come, now," he said; "you cast them up aloud, and we'll see who agrees. I'll say another time when I find you tripping, I'll pull you up pretty sharp."

Harris laughed, and did as he was told, and soon the whole mystery was out. Two misobvious imps of figures, which he knew very well to be a five and a six before he began reckoning, always, by some glance and artfulness on their part, became eight and nine during his reckoning, and so upset everything.

He wiped the sweat from his brow as he turned to Anthony, and said:

"That just was a spell—wasn't it? Would you like anything? Glass of wine?"

"Yes, I should like, not wine, but permission to copy this account for you, if you don't mind," said Anthony.

"I! I don't mind! Hear that, missus?" Harris shouted. And then he stood, looking over his friend's shoulder with as much interest in the process as if Anthony was not simply copying, but creating the very items of the account, and his own weal or woe depended on the result.

Once he held up his hand with a solemn "Hush!" to Mrs. Harris, who happened to approach unheard to give him a message.

Never will Anthony Maude forget how Harris studied each copy of the account with the most presented to him, written in the most beautiful of handwritings, or how he himself studied the red face—so it struck him—so full of naive self-confidence, and so unconscious of its own revealings.

Anthony, as he was reading and comparing particular words and phrases—in fact, discovering an own son's consummate and eminent want—he wondered if it would prove he had been treading on hoary-headed ground.

After a lengthened perusal and a deep sigh—whether of regret at his own state, or of boundless confidence in Anthony's ability to see such a full matter—Harris said:

"Well, I'm sure you've got some valuable trade secrets here, and I give you fair warning, I mean to find them all out."

"I suspect you've got some valuable trade secrets here, and I give you fair warning, I mean to find them all out."

"And you've got the specifications?"

"Oh, yes."

"And you understand them?"

"I understand the words and the names of things, and I know how to get good men to undertake, under me, bricklaying, and plastering and that, and I can keep 'em well at it: but I'm afeared the right up this dockement, and the more I've talked to about the specifications, 'ud be too much for me—so I'd best drop it."

"Will you let me see the agreements?"

"Yes, I can manage that. Only put me with my brickwork right in the hands and eyes of a gen, and I can get on; but when it comes to the writin' and calkerlating, or agreein' over people, as they call 'em, then I'm nobody and nowhere."

Anthony, luckily, was accustomed for this subject of building, for he had studied minutely the whole while lately preparing to build his own magnificent house. Accordingly, he had discovered that Harris was a perfect jewel of a man of business in his own way—that is, that his mechanical skill, his integrity, his perseverance and his unqualified reputation for honesty, made him invaluable, as one of themselves, who assumed no superiority, but always looked in confidence to find work done to their hands, and to understand because that was "business,"—where these qualities were sufficient, John Harris was a king, and was in everybody's favor.

But obviously, by the build, if nothing else, a trustworthy accountant always at his side.

The tender was soon drawn up, and the new picture by an old master over more thrilled with delight the eyes of a knot of consciousness than did his fresh exhibition of Anthony's managing powers charm and impress Harris and his household. They evidently thought the whole evening a thing more required to win the day, and that was that the board should give a slight deduction.

"But how is it," asked Anthony, a little dubious of his friend's position in more ways than one, "that you do things so much cheaper than your original impressions? Is that wise?"

"Ah! I thought, missis, how I had come out afore long. I bin a waitin' for him. I'm a reckless calculator, by nature, Anthony, I'm afeared—but be thinks I'd like him to go through a different sort of account—and I'm glad I've got it."

"No, Mr. Anthony," said the proud wife, "we don't owe for nothing but materials—wood and iron, and things o' that; and Harris took home all alike pays for 'em when he gets paid for the job. He's five shillings in the pound right and left on bargs, once in a way, two pounds to look up, and that's like how we keep ahead of things, and everybody ever comes here asking twice for what belongs to them. Nobody. There's alius the money ready—is it not, Harris?"

"Ah! now I understand," said Anthony. "Your handful works hard, and you direct constantly, and people are finding it out, and placing their work in your hands, and you know what you do."

"Well! if you'd read it all in a book, you couldn't ha' been more exact—leastwise, as far as intentions goes in my case. But, Mr. Anthony, I'm afeared you've spoiled it all. You've got interested, into the yard, and I'll show you something."

They were immediately joined by Harris took him a little crazy shed apart, which, crazy as it looked, was perfectly locked. It was a shed of secrets, and if he was opening his great money safe, and there was an unfinished and unpainted plough.

"Mr. Anthony," he said, in a whisper, "I ain't much of a man of business, and I'm a wretchedly bad hand at figures. I don't know the names of but such as I picked up at nights, and mayhaps I've forgotten them, and I'm a wretchedly bad and hard work. But I've got an idea better than building or calkerlating or agreeing. They'll do it a time, but not for long. Builders are a-goen lot in these parts—often fail, while a few become very rich.

"Well, now, I'm going to tell you. Since the war, I've been thinking that I'd like to have a bit of mine, a Scotchman, who's built to a grand general purpose, and I've thought that what my people are all in the dark about farming, and that when they begins to be enlightened, there'll be no end to the machines wanted. Now, Mr. Anthony, I've will—I zoned at the notion of it. He says the right sort of land is to be had very low, better ploughs, but plough by steam, and thrash corn by steam, and do away with the old ways that even as farmers might do all their reaping by steam; but the man who heard him couldn't stand that, so he stopped.

"But I've bin thinking, and watching, and spoken about it to a few, and I'm working quietly way; and I know that men are making a deal o' money by the new machines and implements, and that's what I'm goin' to do. I'm not going to be making a splutter, but I'm going to work in that way, and then, if there should be a spell o' work by-and-bye——"

"An excellent idea, too," said Anthony, whose brief life of country gentleman had made the home one of deep interest. "Have you a plough?"

"Ah, I'm trying to make an improvement on the sort of plough they use about here. I know what's wanted, but I'm no ploughs directly, if I can do what I think I can."

"What is it?" asked Anthony.

With extreme pleasure, as the work, Harris now explained all the qualities of a good plough, and how it ought to turn and throw the furrow-slice, as he had corrected; but there was a new danger, he feared, to come out of the present ploughs.

He showed Anthony what he meant, and he was glad to find that thoroughly that before he had done, Anthony was able to offer a suggestion springing almost obviously from Harris's own ideas, which seemed to be the first on a second time that dar into the shed.

"That is the point, if I knew it was to be done. I must go and tell the missus. I say, he's done it for me!"

And Anthony followed, once more musing over matters for him quite unprepared to speak of.

But when the children were disposed of in bed, Anthony requested, as a special favor, a kiss from Elizabeth Jane, if that young lady had not transferred her affections elsewhere; and when they were all sitting at the fireside, a strange fit of silence came over the three.

Anthony was the first to break it.

"My good friends," he said, "I'm going to make a proposal to you. You mayn't like it, and I dare say you will think I shouldn't make it, but I not just what you see. I don't go into that.

Would you like me to stay here a bit, and attend to the accounts, and do anything else you feel I could be especially useful for?"

"Oh, if you would, Mr. Anthony!" and poor Mrs. Harris, in the joy and relief of her heart, wiped her tears away with her apron.

Harris, however, looked at her severely.

"My missus doesn't think of things in a business point of view," said Harris.

"No," said Anthony, with a little inward shiver, as he saw, he thought, the idea was disagreeable, and forgot that what he was saying about the help was hardly complimentary to her.

"How could a woman go into such things as wheelbarrows, and carts, and——"

"If you satisfy Mr. Harris, I tell you frankly the gentleman must work or starve!"

"Yes, but, Harris, you don't think I could be of use to you for a little while?"

"Eh?" Rear that, missus? Tell him what you think, will you?"

That was a master-stroke of John Harris, who saw by his wife's manner that she knew much of his secret desires, and who thus skilfully threw the responsibility of the step on her, better than on himself.

"I beg pardon, Mr. Anthony," began the brave woman, who saw her children pleading to her to rise to the grandeur of the opportunity, as who went on speaking hurriedly, and reddening as she spoke. "I'm sure, Harris, you know, who don't you speak, father, for yourself?"

"Go on, missus; I'm a listening," said the sly Harris, shielding, as it were, behind Anthony's presence, the joy in meeting, as if he, too, couldn't guess what she was after.

"Well, yes, Mr. Anthony, thats it. We've got a growing family, and I mean to give them a good education—no more ignoramuses, as father there says, was I, and I'm sure he was glad. And we've got, you see, a nice bit of business together, Father don't make much more than we're making, but I do—at least, pretty near—and——"

"How much?" asked Harris, in a severely questioning mood.

"Well, father, I think as we shall make four hundred and fifty this present year."

Harris stole a side look at Anthony then, but pretended to look at his wife, with a pretty remember that that was his wife's look out. If she was making a speech, and it left him both, that was her affair—he washed his hands of it.

"Well, Mr. Anthony, I'm ashamed—father, there, he's ashamed—but I'm very much ashamed to offer it to you, but if you would kindly turn it over——"

"What, my dear lady?" asked Anthony.

Harris shouted with joy, let by his hands and looks, not to ruin him for evermore, but she went on.

"Why, to be partner with him. He ain't a gentleman, and never will be. I'll say that for him."

"Never!" said Harris, really understand you to offer me a share in your business?"

"Oh! I am not fit enough there," said Harris, still maintaining a kind of judicial tone. "Hit the nail on the head, missus; but she's a good woman—and when a woman once begins to speculate about their children's future, there's no end to the notions they have. Mr. Anthony, if it ain't the thing—and I'm sure it ain't—and I know you wouldn't make a gentleman of such a proposal? I think I 'do—leastwise—"

"And you prefer that to my own idea, which you merely to make a temporary arrangement—say so much a week to look after the bricklaying, and I shouldn't have a very heavy pull on you or your capital, and we'll see what understanding?"

"Couldn't do that, Mr. Anthony," said Harris, with considerable firmness. "I'm sure you see more pain than I'm going, knowingly, to bargain for. Am I not sure, missus? I see how it is. And the poor fellow's face became at once of gloom, that Anthony's heart quite smote him.

"Why, you want only a bit of present help, not to be tied down to any one place, and you can be with people like yourself—and where you ought to be, Mr. Harris, among you? Now, missus show Mr. Anthony that we can't been a thinkin' on our own selves only."

Mrs. Harris, now wiping away the tears from her eyes, went to some secret hoard in a corner, which Anthony had not noticed, and soon, and brought forth a great bag, evidently full of money. Anthony, from his seat by Mrs. Harris, with no surprise, did not now flinch in the least, but said:

"There, Mr. Anthony. Missus and I says what we believes, that we've been but stewards for each, and now we've got a chance, come, he must have it, and God's blessing with it."

"What is it?" he asked.

"There ain't much in it. We don't offer what we ain't got to offer. There's two hundred pound in it ours. Every sixpence. How much, missus?"

"Thirty-two pounds one shilling and tenpence half-penny."

"Every—what for?" demanded Harris.

"Every penny," said she.

"Then it's ours, Mr. Anthony; and that means a partnership, and you're to agree to it."

"To the Savings Bank, my friends, let it go for, upon my word, I'll not take a penny of it."

Then, seeing he had gone too far, and was, in fact, first driving these worthy people to believe, in spite of themselves, that he was too proud to be indebted to them in any way, and therefore wounding their pride, he added, in a tone that spoke his own, he said:

"That is how we offer. Do you both really believe that I should be—that I could be—worth the share you offer me—I mean, if I were to do my very best?"

Broad illuminations passed from face to face, and the very richness of the absurdity of the question seemed to be borne back to Anthony as he looked upon them.

Then he was silent, and for the first moment began seriously to consider this quite unexpected thing. His heart yearned to the two people and to the children. He yearned for the quiet of their humble home after the late storms. And, while he saw the chances were really extraordinary, if the same, so unsuitable a man as himself, with some few years from nothing to be worth four hundred pounds a year, what might not be done in twenty-five years? It was wonderful that he should have come, only hoping for kind faces and brief hospitality, and meet such an offer as this.

But Clarissa, Dr. Pompeus, his former associates, his mental habits, his tastes—how could all these be reconciled with the life of the business, and with such intimate commercial connection? But in the fourth respect they, he honored them for their admirable qualities, and he despised himself and the unpretentiousness of the world for suggesting now that he had better go forth, and hope to conquer fate in his own way and time.

"Will you give me a day or two to think it over?" he asked.

"Then you'll stay with us?"

"Of course I will."

"Then your wife, husband with a strange glow, but was admonished, by the dubious expression of his own, not to build any longer on weak foundations.

Anthony felt he ought to say something to explain the strange antithesis of his mood, somehow, he was afraid to speak any more till he had had the opportunity of a long meditation. And so a second evening came. They were about to separate for the night, and Anthony, but something of a depressed tone in the voices of husband and wife, when they heard a noise outside, a violent scuffling, Bab cried out in terror.

"It ain't no use you kicking. Be quiet, or I'll give you a worse one. Let's see what you've got about you."

"Why, it's Darby, the old constable, a making his rounds," said Mrs. Harris.

Then, as they came three tremendous thumps on the door, which set the guests speeding.

"I say, Mr. Harris, I caught a youngster here hanging about your place, and pretendin' he wants some Mr. Maude."

"Mr. Maude!"

Anthony rushed to the door. As he reached it, there was heard a wild sort of triumphant yell, answered by an exclamation from Anthony, and then he and him come back with a lad clinging about him, laughing and crying in his very clothes. Anthony dragged him to the fire-light, and looked at the face, holding it between his hands—then felt his arms.

"No more sin's no bones broke, Mr. Anthony," said Darby.

"My dear old boy, once more," cried Anthony. The vagabond seemed to be clinging to one another as if they were brothers; met the first time after terrible trouble, wherein they had been little shaken; and Esau, in few sentences, told how he had escaped by Anthony, their arms twined round each other.

"When the ship was a going, I knocked a big cheese overboard, and there I was, and there I was, and they all run, and he run, and then I run, but the cabin was in the stern of the ship, and I dropped there into the water by some chains I'd taken notice on a-going, and then I looked out for his friend, and I seed him, but he didn't see me, he didn't know what all the row was about among the passengers, and I thought I'd wait till the ship was fast, and when they took me off in the cart, and he'd got away, I'd get you till I found you, and, by golly knew you, you'd been aiming so much for me, and I'd been aiming so much for that."

"My friends," said Anthony, "do you know who this is?"

And he held Esau's hand.

"No," was expressed in both pair of eyes.

"This is my son," Anthony said, and ought to be now the possessor of the splendid property that you see me, for a brief time, in possession of."

"Your son!"

"Never!" said Anthony.

"Then this is my comfort!" added Esau.

"Mister Sleuth gave 'Esau never, if he would help to find out something word Anthony' 'en thousand pounds, and, when I didn't know it was true, he said he'd give him back what he gave me out on it, but I did find out, and he got tripped off the ship, and then I took care on 'em." So saying, Esau produced a gentleman's purse.

When the wonder of this exhibition was over, Anthony said to his friends: "Friends understand the poor boy's position with his father, and I'll take him."

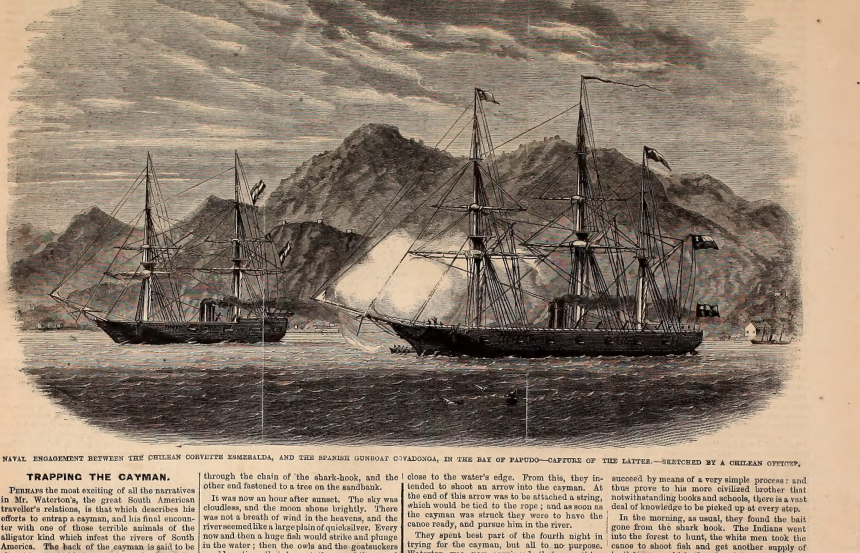
"Strange this boy should have come to-night. He settles our affair, I think."

"Strange indeed!" and poor Harris's quivering lip of self-repression could not compensate for the tell-tale gleam in his face.

"I mean, if you really dare to so unwise a thing as take me for a partner, I must, for this lad's sake, no longer hesitate. Harris, will you have me? Or, do you repent?"

Harris rushed to his hand with a smile, and it was clasped so fervently, that if the smallest doubt had existed, that touch removed it.

"The happiest day of my life!" he said. "I know it will, Mr. Anthony. No, don't say anything to spoil it. You've promised and forgiven. You've almost wrongs you now. I shall have to read the agreements to-night, for to-morrow morning I she can't stand it if I don't blow her up. You'll go and get that business over, while you and your missus attend to the children."



While Harris went to break the great news to his wife, Anthony said to Esau:

"Will, now, Esau, for a few serious words: You know how I feel towards you, and know what I say is meant for your good. You must be a—"

"—become industrious. Or, stop! you are very young. What do you say to going to sea now? You'd like that? Very well. And you'll try to become active and manly, and be a good sailor, like other people you know? Yes, yes, I understand. That's easy; but you've a motive, and friends, and you'll try? That's right."

And when, late that night, after everybody else was in bed, Anthony and Harris sat down together, and chatting over a thousand different things, Anthony, quite full, if anything, of Esau, thony's intentions as regarded Esau; and then, with about a wish to be kind to the boy, and to show they saw he must have another pupil; and that, to make Harris grateful for life, he had only to recommend to him Esau, and he was provided. And there was not in all England that night a happier little household than that under John Harris's cave, after the dull event at Long Wick-ham.

Farewell! a long farewell to them! When we next meet them the shadow of an awful calamity will be over them. Anthony, with unconscious now. Dream on, simple household in the future grandeur of the house of John Harris & Co. Dream on, Esau, of a life that, if no longer that of a vagabond, is to be spent by the side of Anthony. Dream on, Anthony, of the good you will here do, of the income you will help to create, of Clarissa, and of that grand day when you will go back to the old place, and appeal to the Rector to do justice to your character, and then give you Clarissa as a wife! Dream on while you may. There is a time to come which will leave you in little mood for such indulgence!

NAVAL ENGAGEMENT BETWEEN THE CHILEAN CORVETTE ESMERALDA, AND THE SPANISH GUNBOAT COVADONGA, IN THE BAY OF PAPUDO—CAPTURE OF THE LATTER.—SKETCHED BY A CHILEAN OFFICER.

TRAPPING THE CAYMAN.

PERHAPS the most exciting of all the narratives in Mr. Waterton's, the great South American traveller's relations, is that which describes his efforts to entrap a cayman, and his final encounter with one of those terrible animals of the alligator kind which infest the rivers of South America. The back of the cayman is said to be almost impenetrable to a musket-ball, though his sides are not so strong, and are easily pierced with an arrow. It is believed that no animal in existence bears more decided marks in his countenance of cruelty and malice. He is the scourge and terror of all the large rivers in South America near the line. Mr. Waterton had long desired to catch one of these monsters, and at length favorable opportunities appeared to present themselves during his third journey along the wild and solitary banks of the Essequibo. The scenes which ensue we will describe as closely as possible in the words of the adventurous naturalist. One day, an hour before sunset, he reached the place which two men, who had joined his party at the Falls, had pointed out as a proper one to find a cayman. There was a large creek close by, and a sandbank gently sloping to the water. Just within the forest on this bank they cleared a place of brushwood, suspended the hammocks from the trees, and then picked up enough of decayed wood for fuel.

THE LATE PROF. JAMES MAPES.—AMBROTYPED BY BRADY

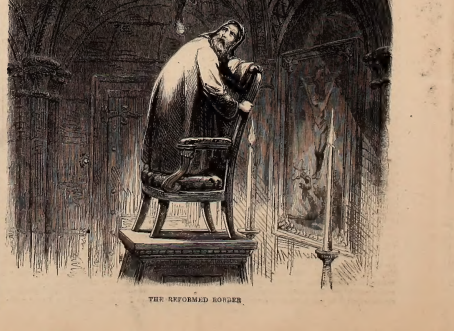
They now baited a shark-hook with a large fish, and put it upon a board, which they had brought on purpose. This board was carried out in the canoe, about 40 yards into the river. By means of a string, long enough to reach the bottom of the river, and at the end of which string was fastened a stone, the board was kept, as it were, at anchor. One end of the new rope was reeved through the chain of the shark-hook, and the other end fastened to a tree on the sandbank.

It was now an hour after sunset. The sky was cloudless, and the moon shone brightly. There was not a breath of wind in the heavens, and the river seemed like a large plain of quicksilver. Every now and then a huge fish would strike and plunge in the water; then the owls and the goatsuckers would continue their lamentations, and the sound of these was lost in the prowling tiger's growl. Then all was still again, and silent as midnight.

The caymen were now upon the stir, and at intervals their noise could be distinguished amid that of the jaguar, the owls, the goatsuckers and frogs. It was a singular and awful sound, like a suppressed sigh, bursting forth all of a sudden, and so loud that you might hear it above a mile off. First one emitted this horrible noise, and then another answered him; and, on looking at the countenances of the people round him, Mr. Waterton could plainly see that they expected to have a cayman that night. The party were at supper, when the Indian said he saw the cayman coming. Upon looking towards the place, there appeared something on the water like a black log of wood. It was so unlike anything alive, that the Englishman doubted if it were a cayman; but the Indian smiled, and said he was sure it was one, for he remembered seeing a cayman some years ago, when he was in the Essequibo.

At last it gradually approached the bait, and the board began to move. The moon shone so bright that they could distinctly see him open his huge jaws, and take in the bait. They pulled the rope. He immediately let drop the bait, and then they saw his black head retreating from the board to the distance of a few yards, where it remained quite motionless. The monster did not seem inclined to advance again, and so they finished their supper. In about an hour's time he again put himself in motion and took hold of the bait, but did not swallow it. They pulled the rope again, but with no better success than the first time. He retreated as usual, and came back again in about an hour. Thus the party watched till three o'clock in the morning, when, worn out with disappointment, they went to the hammocks, turned in, and fell asleep. When day broke, they found that he had contrived to get the bait from the hook, though they had tied it on with string. They had now no more hopes of taking a cayman till the return of night. The Indians went into the woods, and brought back a noble supply of game. The rest of the party went into the canoe and proceeded up the river to shoot fish, where they got even more than they could use.

The second night's attempt upon the cayman was a repetition of the first, and was quite unsuccessful. They went fishing the day after, and returned to experience a third night's disappointment. On the fourth day, about four o'clock, they began to erect a stage amongst the trees, close to the water's edge. From this, they intended to shoot an arrow into the cayman. At the end of this arrow was to be attached a string, which would be tied to the rope; and as soon as the cayman was struck they were to have the canoe ready, and pursue him in the river.



They spent best part of the fourth night in trying for the cayman, but all to no purpose. Waterton was now convinced that something was materially wrong. He shoved one of the Indians the shark-hook, who shook his head and laughed at it, and said it would not do. When he was a boy he had seen his father catch the cayman, and on the morrow he would make something that would answer.

In the meantime they set the shark-hook, but it availed nothing; a cayman came and took it, but would not swallow it. Seeing it was useless to attend the shark-hook any longer, they left it for the night and returned to their hammocks. Eve the English naturalist fell asleep, a new idea broke upon him. He considered that as far as the judgment of civilized man went, everything had been procured, and done to insure success. They had hooks, and lines, and baits and patience; they had spent nights in watching, had seen the cayman come and take the bait, yet all had ended in disappointment. Probably (he thought) this poor wild man of the woods would succeed by means of a very simple process: and thus prove to his more civilized brother that notwithstanding books and schools, there is a vast deal of knowledge to be picked up at every step.

In the morning, as usual, they found the bait gone from the shark hook. The Indians went into the forest to hunt, the white men took the canoe to shoot fish and get another supply of turtle's eggs, which they found in great abundance. They then went to the little shallow creek, and shot some young caymen about two feet long. When the arrow struck them, tiny as they were, they turned and bit it, and snapped at the men when they went into the water to take them up.

The day was now declining space, and the Indian had made his instrument to take the cayman. It was very simple—there were four pieces of tough, hard wood, a foot long, and about as thick as a little finger, and barbed at both ends; they were tied round the end of the rope in such a manner that if the rope be imagined to be an arrow, these four sticks would form the arrow's head; so that one end of the four united sticks answered to the point of the arrow's head, while the other end expanded at equal distances round the rope.

It was evident that if the cayman swallowed this (the other end of the rope, which was thirty yards long, being fastened to a tree), the more he pulled the faster the barbs would shoot. Nearly a mile from where they had their hammocks, the sandbanks were steep and abrupt, and the river very still and deep; there the Indian fixed the machine, which hung suspended a foot from the water, and the end of the rope was made fast to a stake driven well into the sand.

THE REFORMED ROBBER

The Indian then took the empty shell of the land tortoise, and gave it some heavy blows with a stick. Waterton asked him why he did that, and he replied that it was to let the cayman hear that something was going on.

Having done this, the party went back to the hammocks, not intending to visit it again till morning. During the night, the jaguars roared and grumbled in the forest, and at intervals they could hear the distant cayman. "The roaring of the jaguars," says the narrator, "was awful; but it was music to the dismal noise of these hideous and malicious reptiles."

CATCHING A CAYMAN.

About half-past five in the morning, the Indian stole off silently to take a look at the bait. On arriving at the place, he set up a tremendous shout. All now jumped out of their hammocks, and ran to him.

They found a cayman, ten feet and a half long, fast to the end of the rope. Nothing now remained to do but to get him out of the water without injuring his scales. The whole party consisted of three Indians from the creek, Mr. Waterton's Indian servant Yan, a negro called Daddy Quashi, and a man named James, whom he was instructing in the art of preserving birds.

"I informed the Indians," continues Mr. Waterton, "that it was my intention to draw him quietly out of the water, and then secure him. They looked and stared at each other, and said, 'I might do it myself, but they would have no hand in it; the cayman would worry some of us.' On saying this, they squatted on the grass with the most perfect indifference.

THE LAST INSTANCE OF BARBARITY.

"The Indians of these wilds have never been subject to the least restraint; and I knew enough of them to be aware that if I tried to force them against their will, they would take themselves off, and leave me and my presents unheeded, and never return.

"Daddy Quashi was for applying to our guns, as usual, considering them our best and safest friends. I immediately offered to knock him down for his cowardice, and he shrunk back, begging that I would be cautious, and not get myself worried, and apologizing for his own want of resolution. My Indian was now in conversation with the others, and they asked if I would allow them to shoot a dozen arrows into him, and thus disable him. This would have ruined all. I had come above three hundred miles on purpose to get a cayman uninjured, and not to carry back a mutilated specimen. I rejected their proposition with firmness, and darted a disdainful eye upon the Indians.

"Daddy Quashi was again beginning to remonstrate, and I chased him on the sandbank for a quarter of a mile. He told me afterwards, he thought he should have dropped down dead with fright, for he was firmly persuaded, if I had caught him, I should have bundled him in the cayman's jaws. Here, then, we stood in silence, like a calm before a thunderstorm. They wanted to kill him, and I wanted to take him alive.

"I now walked up and down the sand, revolving a dozen projects in my head. The canoe was at a considerable distance, and I ordered the people to bring it round to the place where we were. The mast was eight feet long, and not much thicker than my wrist. I took it out of the canoe, and wrapped the sail round the end of it. Now it appeared clear to me, that if I went down upon one knee, and held the mast in the same position as the soldier holds his bayonet when rushing to the charge, I could force it down the cayman's throat, should he come open-mouthed at me. When this was told to the Indians they hurried on, up, and said they would help me to pull him out of the river.

"Daddy Quashi hung in the rear. I showed him a large Spanish knife which I always carried in the waistband of my trousers; it spoke volumes to him, and he shrugged up his shoulders in absolute despair. The sun was just peeping over the high forests on the eastern hills, as if coming to look on, and bid us act with becoming fortitude. I placed all the people at the end of the rope, and ordered them to pull till the cayman appeared on the surface of the water; and then, should he plunge, to slacken the rope, and let him go again into the deep.

"I now took the mast of the canoe in my hand (the sail being tied round the end of the mast), and sunk down upon one knee, about four yards from the water's edge, determining to thrust it down his throat, in case he gave me an opportunity. It certainly felt somewhat uncomfortable in this situation. The people pulled the cayman to the surface; he plunged furiously as soon as he arrived in these upper regions, and immediately went below again on their slackening the rope. They pulled again, and we became. This was an interesting moment. I kept my position firmly, with my eye fixed steadfastly on him.

"By the time the cayman was within two yards of me, I saw he was in a state of fear and perturbation. I instantly dropped the mast, and sprung up, and jumped on his back, turning half round as I vaulted, so that I gained my seat, with my face in a right position. I immediately seized his fore legs, and by main force twisted them on his back; thus they served me for a bridle."

The cayman now seemed to have recovered from his surprise, and probably fancying himself in hostile company, began to plunge furiously, and lashed the sand with his long and powerful tail. Mr. Waterton was out of reach of the strokes of it, by being near his head. He continued to plunge and strike, and made his rider's seat very uncomfortable.

The people roared out in triumph, and were so vociferous that it was some time before they heard their master tell them to pull him and his singular beast of burden farther inland. He was apprehensive the rope might break, in which case there would have been every chance of going under water with the cayman.

The people now dragged them above forty yards on the sand. "It was the first and last time," says Waterton, "I was ever on a cayman's back. Should it be asked how I managed to keep my seat, I would answer, I hunted some years with Lord Darlington's fox-hounds."

After repeated attempts to regain his liberty, the cayman gave in, and became tranquil through exhaustion. They now managed to tie up his jaws, and firmly secured his fore feet, but they had another severe struggle for superiority before the huge monster was finally conveyed to the canoe, and then to the place where they had suspended the hammocks, where, after he was slain, the enthusiastic naturalist commenced dissecting him, thus making a valuable addition to scientific knowledge.

THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD.

WHEN the Swiss Guard upon which Charles X. had relied so unwisely for the maintenance of his military government, were disgorged by the revolution of 1830, a certain Captain Sutter, who had served in that body, determined to quit the country in which he and his comrades were an unpopular, and to seek his fortune in a new capacity in the far wilds of North America. A Swiss by birth, Sutter possessed all the industry and persevering energy peculiar to his countrymen. Ready to serve as a soldier where moderately good pay and a commission were offered to him, he was equally ready to clear a space in the primeval forest, or to build himself a home in the prairie.

Accordingly in 1830 he set sail from Havre for New York, whence in a short time he proceeded to the far-western state of Missouri. Here having acquired a little money by agriculture, he removed at the end of six years to the still more remote territory of Oregon, and finally, in 1839, he settled in California.

This country was then but little known, with the exception of the seaboard, where vessels from all parts traded with the Indians chiefly for skins; but the Swiss captain belonged to a class who can contrive to prosper anywhere. Far beyond the limits of civilized life he determined to lead an independent existence, and to become a sort of sovereign, on a small scale, of the wild country around him. Accordingly, he built with the aid of his men a fort on the River Sacramento, a very necessary protection from hostile tribes of Indians. This fort he named after his native country, New Helvetia; and in the prairie round this spot he gradually accumulated a herd of 4,000 oxen, besides 1,500 horses and mules, and 2,000 sheep. He also became the owner of a vast acreage of land under grain crops, and of two trading vessels in the river. His fort was supplied with 12 pieces of artillery, and defended by a garrison of 70 men, and its owner was beyond all question the wealthiest and most independent man in the vast range of country between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean.

It was in September, 1847, that Captain Sutter, being anxious to construct a saw mill to be turned by water power, near a pine forest, employed for that purpose a friend skilled in engineering named Marshall. The work progressed, and the supply of water to the mill was so situated as to wash down a great deal of mud and gravel from the higher land, passed through by the stream. Loitering by the side of the new mill one day, while the works were in progress, Mr. Marshall was struck by some glittering particles in this sand, and taking a portion away with him in a bottle he determined to show it to his enterprising employer.

"What are those bright grains?" asked the engineer, as he held up the bottle in the sun before his friend's eye.

The Swiss eyed them attentively for some time, and then replied:

"Gold. But where did this come from?"

"From yonder," replied Marshall, taking his companion to the door, and pointing to the range of hills clothed with pine trees in the distance; "if these glittering specks are gold, as I believe they are, there is wealth in those regions beside which all your flocks and herds will be a trifle."

"It is gold beyond doubt," replied the captain; "and this is how gold is generally found; but this sand is rich beyond example. We must keep this secret, and become gold-diggers together."

The precious secret was kept for a short time, and the captain and his friend found means to gather abundant proofs of the productiveness of the region in the precious metal; but it soon became whispered abroad that gold had been discovered at the American fork of the Sacramento river; and to the astonishment of the world a gold fever arose, such as had never been known before. A few laborers became possessed of some of the precious dust, and took it for sale to San Francisco, the town at the mouth of the Sacramento.

The news spread with the rapidity of a fire amidst the withered grass of the prairies. Soldiers and sailors deserted for the "diggings," shopkeepers closed their shops, and fled to the same attractive region; and in a few months the solitudes in which the flocks and herds of the ex-captain of the Swiss Guard had lately wandered at will were filled with a motley gathering, whose labors quickly became a subject of intense anxiety in every money market in the Old and New World.

THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD.

PROF. JAMES J. MAPES.

PROF. MAPES was born in New York, May 29, 1806. In very early youth he developed a mind of great activity, research and invention. The early developments of his intellect would have naturally led one to suppose that in after life he would have proved, not a farmer, but a soldier; for it is stated of him that when only 17 years of age he delivered a full course of lectures in this city on "Military Tactics," varying the interesting exercises on the closing night by the exhibition and explanation of a model machine of his own invention, illustrating the figure, &c., &c., the advance of Napoleon on Moscow and the subsequent retreat. This model he represented to have been a curious machine, but it is not known that its principle was ever applied to any useful purpose.

This invention and these ideas were the crude ones of youth. He began soon after to apply his inventive faculties to more useful subjects, and became interested in the refining of sugar, a business in which, after being engaged for six years, he failed financially. This life had led to the close study of chemistry, and he now divided his attention between that science and that of natural history. He had some knowledge of civil engineering, and is said to have been the first person who ever opened up an iron clay as a consulting engineer. On the profits of this profession he lived for nearly twelve years, devoting his spare time to his studies.

His success as a student of natural history was very great, and some of his articles attracting attention he was made a permanent member of the New York Lyceum, and honorary member of the Scientific Institute of Brussels, Royal Society of St. Petersburg, and Geographical Society of Paris; while one of our State universities conferred on him the degree of LL. D. He had begun as early as 1840 to attract some attention as a chemist (particularly by his analysis in a report to the State Senate of beer and wines, but still more so by his able lectures on scientific subjects published in the American Repository of Arts, Sciences and Manufactures, of which he was subsequently made the editor. He may be said to have injured his reputation by publishing a work on agriculture, which was so full of what were regarded as wild and visionary ideas of a disordered mind that in everywhere met with derision, even from the American Institute, before which he had lectured. Professor Mapes' reputation never entirely recovered from these attacks, though it was soon after found that he and Dr. Liebig, the great German authority on agricultural subjects, agreed with singular exactness in their philosophy respecting the "progression of primaries" and other theories. His success, as we have had, however, much more to do with the re-establishment of his reputation as a sound chemist than the circumstance of the correspondence of his ideas with those of the German chemist.

As a farmer Professor Mapes has given hundreds of valuable discoveries to the world, and not a few important inventions. The subsoil plough, rotary digger and spade, now in such common use, are his inventions, while his advice and experience in regard to chemical manures are accepted as authority all over the country.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A YOUNG widow of very polite address, whose husband had lately died, was visited soon after by the minister of the parish, who inquired, as usual, about her husband's disease. When she replied, with a peculiar sadness,

"He's dead, I thank you."

MRS. PARTINGTON is in New York. She came in from Brooklyn a week ago, and learned by telegraph that unusual activity prevailed in Wall street, but after several days' consideration she got into the shower is going back a disappointed woman.

In the midst of a stormy discussion, a gentleman rose to settle the matter in dispute. Waving his hand majestically over the excited disputants he began:

"Gentlemen, I want to reason with you."

"Exactly," Jerrold interrupted, "that is precisely what you do not want."

The discussion was lost in a burst of laughter.

At an evening party, a very elderly lady was dancing with a young beau. A stranger approached Jerrold, who was looking on, and said:

"Pray, is not that lady as in the young gentleman dancing with that very elderly lady?"

"Oh, yes, sir! Human Society, I should think," replied Jerrold.

"You do wrong to fish on a Sunday," said a clergyman to a boy whom he met so doing.

"Well, sir," replied the boy, "it can't be much harm, for I ain't catched nothing."

A MAN having hurt his forehead, was advised to rub it with brandy. Some days after, being asked if he had done so, he answered:

"I have tried several times, but can never get the glass to join the wound."

"WHICH, my dear lady, do you think the merriest place in the world?"

"That depends upon where the atmosphere that surrounds the earth, I should think."

"And why?"

"Because I am told that there all bodies lose their gravity!"

A MAN recently got married in Kentucky one day, and hung himself the next. No doubt he wanted to see if all varieties of woe, to which he had been subject.

"CAN'T we make your lover jealous, miss?"

"Oh, yes, sir, I think we can, if we put our heads together."

IT is said that a watch-dog is not so large in the morning as he was because he is let out at night and taken in the morning.

"WELL, MR. TREE, if you are about to leave, I shall deduct a trifle," exclaimed an incensed landlady to her lodger, who was slightly in arrears.

A MAN being asked what he had had for dinner, replied, "A lean pig, and the ruin of man's sauce." On being asked for an explanation, it appeared that his dinner consisted of a spare rib of pork and apple sauce.

THE celebrated speech of Sir Boyle Roche, "Mr. Speaker, I smell a rat; I see him dancing in the air; but mark me! I shall yet nip him in the bud!" was evidently the model upon which a writer in a late Kentucky paper remarks upon the result of a recent election. He says that "The fall of corruption has been dispelled, and the wheels of the State Government will no longer be transmitted by sharks that have been the public prosperity like locusts."

WHY cannot a gentleman legally possess a white walking-stick? Because it can never be long to him.

A GIRL who was making a dress, put the sleeves in wrong. She was unable to change them, as she could not determine whether she had got the right sleeve in the wrong place, or the wrong sleeve in the right place.

A SOLDIER boasted to Gen. Hooker of the many wounds he had received in his face. Hooker knowing him to be a coward, said to him, "The next time you run away, you had better take care how you run behind you."

KATE was talking glowingly about love-apples. "That's a range!" exclaimed Charley, her accepted lover. "My sturdy uncle here scrambled up apples! On the contrary, I thought that love always knelt in pain." Charley smiled approvingly.

A SHREWD little fellow, who had just begun to read Latin, astonished his master by the following translation:

"Vir, a man; gin, a trap—Virgin, a man-trap."

"Now, children," said a musical inspector, "who loves all men?"

A little girl, only four years old, and evidently not well up in the catechism, answered quickly:

"All except papa."

IT may be said generally of husbands, as the old woman said of hers, who had abused her to an old friend who reproached her for being such a fool as to marry him. "To be sure, he's not so good a husband as he should be, but he's a powerful deal better than none."

OWING to the high price of meat of all kinds, a company has been started to manufacture pork out of pig iron.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment does not advertise in the New York Herald. Circus and Drama twice each day. Only Circus on Broadway. Afternoon & Evening at 1½. CIRCUS TROUPE, and thoroughbred Horse. TRICK PONY WILD BILL. A galaxy of Equestrian Stars. Wild and Dashing Acts of Horsemanship. Previous to Circus, the Domestic Drama of UNCLE TOM'S FARM; or, THE ASSASSIN STEWARD. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer. Three scientific subjects published in the American Repository of Arts, Sciences and Manufactures, of which he was subsequently made the editor. The first was a thesis injured by examination by publishing a work on agriculture, which was so full of what were regarded as wild and visionary ideas of a disordered mind that he everywhere met with derision, even from the American Institute, before which he had lectured. Professor Mapes' reputation never entirely recovered from these attacks, though it was soon after found that he and Dr. Liebig, the great German authority on agricultural subjects, agreed with singular exactness in their philosophy respecting the "progression of primaries" and other theories. His success, as we have had, however, much more to do with the re-establishment of his reputation as a sound chemist than the circumstance of the correspondence of his ideas with those of the German chemist.

As a farmer Professor Mapes has given hundreds of valuable discoveries to the world, and not a few important inventions. The subsoil plough, rotary digger and spade, now in such common use, are his inventions, while his advice and experience in regard to chemical manures are accepted as authority all over the country.

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and Mexico, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN—Red or Brown, $2.50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE LINED—$5, $7, $9, $11, $15.
FRENCH—Full Size, $8, $9, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $75 to $300.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

NEW YORK WEEKLY MAGAZINE

OF

48 PAGES! 48 PAGES!

For 10 Cents a Week.

In the number for January 13th, is

HOW I MADE A FORTUNE IN WALL STREET, AND HOW I GOT MARRIED.

A SPLENDID

Original and True Story.

Written expressly for the NEW YORK WEEKLY MAGAZINE, by a gentleman of great experience, who knows all the ins and outs, and who will give more information about the straight and crooked ways of that celebrated street than has been ever published. To be continued in a few numbers. Also, a great variety of entertaining and instructive Literature, Popular Tales, etc. Well printed on large type and clean paper.

For Sale by all Newsdealers.

To parties who cannot obtain it of newsmen, we have the following

TERMS:

One copy, one year	$4.00
One copy, six months	1.00

Specimen copies sent by mail on receipt of 10 cents.
Address

G. H. BAILEY & CO.,
Publishers N. Y. Weekly Magazine,
No. 7 Beekman Street, New York.

The Fourth Exhibition in New York of French, English and German Pictures. Open daily from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., and on Monday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 10, at the Studio Building, No. 15 West Tenth Street.
E. GAMBART, Director. F. J. PILGERAN, Sec.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS!

Great Prize Distribution

BY THE

NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION.

25 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from $350 to $500
50 Melodeons and Rosewood Cases.....from 150 to 225
150 Music Boxes..... 15 to 45
100 Silver Revolving Patent Castors..... 12 to 40
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets..... 15 to 35
100 Gentlemen's Gold Watches..... 50 to 100
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches..... 75 to 150
150 Diamond Rings..... 10 to 500
200 Gold Watches..... 60 to 100
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 50 to 100
500 Silver Watches..... 25 to 50
1000 Solid Silver Tea Spoons..... 6 to 15
1000 Sets Silver Forks..... 9 to 20
1000 Sets Silver Spoons..... 9 to 20
Childrens' Silver Sets..... 5 to 10

Diamond Pins, Studs, Bracelets, Coral, Florentine, Mosaic, Jet, Lava and Cameo Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, Pencils, Gold Bracelets, Watch Guards, Silver Spectacles, Sets of Studs, Neck Chains, Vest Chains, Plain and Chased Gold Rings, Thimbles, Lockets, and FINE JEWELRY of every description, of the best make and latest style, valued at $500,000!

To be Sold for One Dollar Each, without regard to value.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these Envelopes, containing the Certificate of any Article, worth at least $1 at retail, will be sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of 25 cents. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it draws, and may then, for One Dollar more, send ONE TYPE RIDDLE DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR more and receive another Article, or can choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

$

We refer to those who have recently drawn valuable gifts from us, as follows:

S. Taylor, Ringtown, Pa., Gold Patent Lever Watch; Mrs. Ann Eliza Jones, Mauch Chunk, Pa., Silver Watch, $40; Geo. D. Wood, Whitby, Canada, Silver Watch, $40; Mrs. S. Brown, 82 Tenth street, Piano, value $350; Mrs. Teresa Miller, Lancaster, Pa., Diamond Ring, value $175; Miss Ellen J. Peck, Springfield, Ill., Melodeon, value $175; Van Riper, Hopkins & Co., N. Y., Gold Hunting Case Watch, value $150; Ed. H. Lindsey, Pittsburgh, Pa., Piano, value $350; Mrs. H. H. Farwell, Dubuque, Iowa, Diamond Ear-drops, value $250; Miss Lizzie Bell, 159 Pearl street, Albany, N. Y., Music Box, value $40; Mrs. R. C. Ingraed, Orleans, Ont., Canada, $40; Lieut. R. F. Hicks, Richard's Hotel, Washington, D. C., Silver Patent Lever Watch, value $55; Robert H. Hotchkiss, New Haven, Conn., Melodeon, value $250; W. F. T. Willis, West 24th street, New York, Melodeon, value $200; Mrs. R. C. Tappan, 16 York street, Gold Watch, value $100; Miss Lizzie A. Dickerson, Binghamton, New York, Melodeon, value $200; Wm. B. Redfield, Columbus, Ohio, Silver Watch, value $40.

Many persons, who have drawn valuable prizes, do not wish their names published, or we might extend this list. Letters from various parties throughout the country, acknowledging the receipt of valuable gifts, may be seen on file at our office.

713 BROADWAY, N. Y.

☞ NO BLANKS.—Every purchaser gets an article of value.

Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns, and the utmost satisfaction will be immediately sent to them by express or return mail.

Reliable and satisfactory agents wanted in all cases.

☞ Six Certificates for One Dollar; 13 for Two Dollars; 33 for Five Dollars. Great Inducements to Agents.

All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5567, P. O., New York.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

PUTTING ON AIRS;

OR,

A WARNING TO WIVES.

By the Author of The Jilt, etc., etc.

Among the thousand books which have been lately skewered through the heart, we have met with none which better deserves the division of an afternoon or two, than Putting on Airs; or, A Warning to Wives, by the clever authoress of the Jilt. It contains matter of peculiar interest to the fashionable and single—and to the general reader, its humor and its pathos, the management of its plot and the production of its moral do not fail to ensure for it an earnest and approving attention.—London Morning Chronicle.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

Mailed free of postage on receipt of price.

F. A. DRAYTON, Publisher, No. 22 Ann st., N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner

No. 34—Just Published

CONTAINS

The Baronet's Wife. A Story. Illustrated.
Hearts and Diamonds. A Story. Ill.
Sable Scenes. Ill.
A Memento Mori Watch. Ill.
Daniel in the Lion's Den. Ill.
Enamour. A Story.
The Rector of St. Mark's. By Mrs. Mary J. Holmes—Continued.
A Grand Old Poem.
Cleveland Hall—continued.
Mother Carey's Chickens. Illustrated. Poetry.
The Mothers of Great Men. Ill.
Blanche's Lover.
Lamentine Fishing. Ill.
An Opera. Ill.
The Romance of a Man of Business. An Essay.
How to Paper your Parlor.
Fresh Leaves from Life.
A History of Perfumery and the Toilet. Ill.
Weighing the Great Mogul. Ill.
The Dove's Wales. Ill.
The Wild Horse of Texas. Ill.
Jock's Adventure with a Serpent. Ill.
Grandfather Whitehead's Lectures—More about the Globe we Live on.
The Old Gray Goblin. A Fairy Story.
Habits of the Wasp.
Family Pastimes.
Edwin and Angelina. Three Comic Illustrations.
And a large amount of interesting miscellaneous matter.

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

R. R. R.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF

RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

The Cheapest and Best Medicine for Family Use in the World.

One 50-cent Bottle

WILL CURE MORE COMPLAINTS, AND PREVENT THE SYSTEM AGAINST SUDDEN ATTACKS OF EPIDEMICS AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES, THAN FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS EXPENDED FOR OTHER MEDICINES OR MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

THE MOMENT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF IS APPLIED EXTERNALLY, OR TAKEN INTERNALLY, ACCORDING TO DIRECTIONS, PAIN, FROM WHATEVER CAUSE, CEASES TO EXIST.

1849. Asiatic Cholera. 1849.

IN 1849 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF CURED OVER 10,000 PERSONS ATTACKED WITH ASIATIC CHOLERA, AND BY ITS TIMELY USE AS A PREVENTIVE SAVED OVER ONE MILLION OF LIVES.

1856. Yellow Fever. 1856.

IN 1856 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF cured thousands of persons seized with Yellow Fever. As a preventive of this terrible disease, Dr. Frederick B. Page, of Mississippi, urged the use of it throughout the South of the Southern States, and publicly recommended it as the most certain safeguard in the world.

During the War

More lives were saved by the use of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF than by the best efforts of the Medical Staff. We have hundreds of letters proving this fact. We have found it to be a perfect cure in cases of fevers, by exposure to malarious swamps, bottom lands, rice fields, &c. RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is invariably escaped sickness; those who did not were seized with Chills and Fever, Bilious Fevers, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Cholera, Rheumatism, etc., and those only who, when those seized, used the READY RELIEF, entirely recovered.

Its Universal Use.

It cures the worst diseases incidental to all climates. It has been tested in Asia, Africa, South America, Europe, the West Indies, and every part of the world; cures of Cholera, Dysentery, Fluxes, Fevers, Yellow Fever, Influenza, etc., are but the mildest and weaker forms of the more terrible diseases. It it cures the worst forms as fast as the most sickly climates, it will reliably cure the less as they prevail amongst us.

Domestic Purposes.

Every family should be provided with a bottle of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. One bottle costs only 50 cents, and in this article can be used for various purposes, with the assurance of doing more permanent good than can be obtained from one hundred dollars worth of other medicines and physicians's prescriptions. If suddenly seized with sickness, the nurse or the Relief will instantly arrest the disease, and afford immediate ease to the patient.

Ten Years' Rheumatism

CURED BY RUBBING THE SPINE WITH

Radway's Ready Relief.

ROBERT ELY, Esq., aged 60, has been afflicted with Rheumatism for 10 years. For the past 12 months he has been unable to walk, except on crutches. His limbs were distorted, swollen and misshapen; his hands cramped, so that he could not dress himself, nor even open nor shut his hands; rheumatic pains ran riot all over his body, and his brain was at times affected by intense sickness suffering. He was induced to have his spine rubbed and chafed with RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. The first rubbing gave him a sensation of pleasure; rubbing continued for some months completely restored the sufferer to health.

As a Family Medicine.

As a family medicine it is the most useful remedy known to the world. It arrest with pain or sickness, or threatening or malignant diseases, and you will quickly cure the patient and protect the system against sickness. IN A SHORT MINUTES after the application of the READY RELIEF externally, or its administration internally, the patient suffering from the most pervading PAINS, ACHES, CRAMPS, RHEUMATISM, NEURALGIA, GOUT, LUMBAGO, SPRAINS AND BRUISE, SPASMS, SORE THROAT, INFLUENZA, DIPHTHERIA, CONGESTION, OR DIFFICULT BREATHING, will cease and comfort.

IMPORTANT TO FARMERS AND OTHERS needing a sparingly settled districts where it is difficult to procure the services of a physician, RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is invaluable. It can't we make positive assurance that a few drops in all cases where pain or disease first is expressed, or if seized with INFLUENZA, DIPHTHERIA, SORE THROAT, HOARSENESS, HOARSENESS, BILIOUS COLIC, INFLAMMATION of the BOWELS, STOMACH, KIDNEYS, LIVER, BLADDER, or with CROUP, QUINSY, FEVER AND AGUE, or with NEURALGIA, RHEUMATISM, DIFFICULT BREATHING, ACHE, EARACHE, or with LUMBAGO, PAIN IN THE BACK, or SORE STOMACH, or with FLATULENCY, CHOLERA MORBUS, or DYSENTERY, or with BURNS, SCALDS, BRUISES, or with SPRAINS, CRAMPS, or SPASMS. The application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will not take place in the worst of these complaints in a few hours.

REMEMBER.—This painful disease has baffled the most skilful physicians and popular remedies. It is the most difficult of all diseases to cure. RADWAY'S READY RELIEF has never failed in affording immediate relief to the sufferer; and in all cases of Asthma, Inflammatory or Nervous Rheumatism, to effect a permanent cure. In Chronic Rheumatism and Gout, RADWAY'S CLEANSING SYRUP, called Resolvents Rondout, should be taken as an adjunct with the READY RELIEF.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERYWHERE.

Price 50 cents per Bottle.
Dr. JOHN RADWAY & Co., Montreal.
RADWAY & CO.,
Sole Proprietors of Maiden Lane, New York.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address

Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-36 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y

PARLOR ORGANS.

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, was awarded us by the late great FAIR of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, over all competitors, for the best instruments.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial. The award for the second best Instrument of this class was made to James M. Pelton, exhibitor and agent of the Pelouben organ; and the third award was given to Mason & Hamlin."—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms."
G. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."
GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"The best Instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHAS. FRADEL.

Illustrated Catalogues sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
528-40 No. 97 East 23d Street, N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,057, P. O., New York. tf

---

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

1 2

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $6 50 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired. 531-42

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

U. S. STEEL PEN WORKS,

FACTORY, CAMDEN, N. J.

R. ESTERBROOK & CO.,

STEEL PEN MANUFACTURERS,

WAREHOUSES, { 403 Arch Street, Philadelphia, 42 John Street, New York.

Samples and Prices on Application. Lots made to Order of any Pattern or Stamp required.

Caution. These Pens are of genuine American manufacture, and equal in finish, elasticity, and fineness of point to the best imported. They are, therefore, sure to gain the confidence of the American public. The fac-simile of our signature is sufficient security against foreign imitation.

For sale at retail by all stationers throughout the country. R. ESTERBROOK & CO.
530-37

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools readily yield to these peerless remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

Here it is!—Full instructions by which a person can master the art of Ventriloquism in a few hours, and make a world of fun and a fortune, sent by mail for 50 cts. Satisfaction given, or money refunded. Address FRANKLIN & JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill. 537-39

Curl your Hair!

My Golden Beauty will curl your hair into waving curls, and last six months. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address
537-39 M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill,

B. T. HAYWARD,

208 Broadway, N. Y.,

Manufacturer of Odd Fellows, Masonic, Army, Navy, Base Ball, Skating Club, Railroad Conductors, and Badges of every description. I will send a sample coin silver on the receipt of $1 50, together with my wholesale Illustrated Circular.

---

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 35 cents. Address E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.
tf

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Sent free for FIVE CENTS.
tf Address, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!

NEW! BEAUTIFUL!! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!

A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs, in metal frames, and

HIGHLY PERFUMED.

Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CALVIN WILLIS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address BLACKIE & Co., 718 Broadway, N. Y. tf

---

The Book of Wonders,

A new Medical Work of thrilling interest to married and single. Hints of great value to all. Price $1; Sealed, $1 25. Address
tf GEO. F. ARLINGTON, 658 Broadway, N. Y.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of Price. Address

FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. otf

A SURE FORTUNE.

The advertiser, a chemist of twenty-five years experience, both in Europe and America, wishing to retire from the profession, will send to any person valuable recipes, from the use of which any industrious young man or woman, with little or no capital, can make from the first day not only an excellent living, but in a very short time realize a moderate fortune. Address, with two stamps for return postage, S. P. CHESTERFIELD, Chemist, 412 Prune street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Love, Courtship and Married Life.—Whom to Marry, When to Marry, and Whom not to Marry; Likes and Dislikes; Adaptation; Right Age to Marry; Marrying Cousins; Jealousy: its Cause and Cure; Useful Hints to both Married and Single; with Physiognomy, Ethnology, Physiology and Psychology, in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 1866. New volume begins now. Only $2 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York. 537-38

LADIES DESIRING A

SMOOTH, CLEAR AND

A Beautiful Complexion

Should use GEORGE W. LAIRD'S Bloom of Youth. Has no equal for Preserving and Beautifying the Complexion and Skin. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot 74 Fulton street, New York. 538-41

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865,

No. 14866	drew	$100,000
No. 25240	"	50,000
No. 15580	"	25,000
No. 93	"	10,000
No. 16316	"	5,000
No. 7907	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

There is no Book for Choirs

Superior to the HARP OF JUDAH, by L. O. Emerson. Seventy-five thousand copies have already been sold and the book gives the greatest degree of satisfaction to all who have used it. For Choirs, Singing Schools, Conventions and Singers at Home, it is a Collection of Music that is universally liked. Price $1 38 a copy; $12 a dozen. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 5291y

---

JOE MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

"The Star-Spangled Banner,"

A racy and sparkling paper, only 30 cents a year. Clubs of ten, $2. Specimens FREE. Address "BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H. 534-7

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Salts, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 3410, Post Office, N. Y. 533-5

$1,500 PER YEAR! We went agents everywhere to sell our IMPROVED $20 Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. The ONLY machines sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine; or at No. 823 Broadway, New York; No. 236 Carter street, Philadelphia, Pa.; No. 14 Lombard's Block, Chicago, Ill.; No. 170 West 4th street, Cincinnati, O.; or No. 8 Spaulding's Exchange, Buffalo, N. Y.
534-46

Vieve Brower; or, Life in the Concert Saloons of New York. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78. HOLLAND, N. Y. 536-39

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.

S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Onguents and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

---

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sal Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co, Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare Illustrations. Sent Gratis.

CHARLES E. MACKEY,
tf 267 Broadway, New York.

---

144 COMIC VALENTINES $1
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.

B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 537-40

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
537-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK.

Photographic Materials,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.

Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties. tf

---

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.

Sample and Catalogue sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address
tf JAS. F. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, N. Y.

---

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address
536-45 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Whiskers! Whiskers!

My Golden Compound will force the Beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address FRANKLIN & JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND

REMEDY!

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"It was early in the spring of 1855 that this compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it and got well. J. B. Clark, Esq., editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same preparation in the case of a severe cold, and was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with the results, and so confident of success attending its sales if placed before the public, that he finally persuaded me to give it a name and send it abroad to benefit the suffering. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in Manchester alone one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the lead of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. There is good reason for all this; it is very soothing and healing in its nature, is warming to the stomach, and pleasant withal to the taste, and is exceedingly cheap.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints, the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled. It was not originated for that purpose; but a person in using it for a cough, was not only cured of the cough, but was also cured of a kidney difficulty of ten years' standing. Since that accidental discovery many thousands have used it for the same complaint, and have been completely cured."

The above was written by Dr. Poland in 1860. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as preparations for the cure of Kidney difficulties, in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the New England States.

The past year has given great opportunity to test the virtues of the White Pine Compound. It has been an unusual time for Colds and Coughs, and very large quantities of the White Pine Compound have been sold and used with the happiest effects. It speaks well for the medicine, and the people where it is prepared are high in its praise.

One bottle of this Compound is generally sufficient to remove a bad cough, and frequently I have known persons to have a cold entirely removed in two days by using less than half a bottle. From one to two teaspoonfuls is a large dose. I sometimes put a little white sugar and hot water with it when taken on going to bed.

The limits to which I purposely confine myself in this circular will not allow of that full expression which I would like to give in favor of the White Pine Compound. It is universally admired by all who use it; it has attained to such a popularity among those whose opinion is valuable indeed, that VANITY may possibly, in part, prompt me to record more here than hurried people will have patience to read; so I will stop, by merely recommending to all who need a cough or kidney remedy to test the virtues of the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

TESTIMONIALS.

A very large number of important testimonials have already been received from Physicians, Clergymen, Apothecaries, and, indeed, from all classes of society, speaking in the most flattering terms of the White Pine Compound.

Dr. Nichols, of Northfield, Vt., says:

"I find the White Pine Compound to be very efficacious not only in coughs and other pulmonic affections, but also in affections of the kidneys, debility of the stomach and other kindred organs."

Rev. J. K. Chase, of Rumney, N. H., writes:

"I have for years regarded your White Pine Compound as an invaluable remedy. I can truly say that I regard it as even more efficacious and valuable than ever. I have just taken the Compound for a cold, and it works charmingly."

REV. H. D. DODGE,

of West Randolph, Vt., who is a practising physician, as well as preacher, in a letter to Dr. P., dated May 21, 1863, says: "I find it an excellent medicine in kidney disease."

The White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, is not only as to its name inviting, but is a highly approved medicine. Dr. J. W. Poland, the inventor, has the confidence of the many who know him, a confidence which he enjoyed while laboring usefully many years as a Baptist minister. His experience as a sufferer led him to make experiments which issued in his medical discovery.—Boston Watchman and Reflector.

The editor of the Manchester Daily and Weekly Mirror, in a leader of the daily, thus speaks of the Compound:

"The White Pine Compound is advertised at much length in our columns, and we are happy to learn that the demand for it is increasing beyond all previous expectations. It is the very best medicine for coughs and colds we know of, and no family that has once used it will ever be without it. We speak from our own knowledge; it is sure to kill a Cold, and pleasant as sure. The greatest inventions come by accident, and it is singular that the White Pine Compound, made for Colds and Coughs, should prove to be the greatest remedy for kidney difficulties known. But so it is. We cannot doubt it, so many testimonials come to us from well-known men. Besides, the character of Dr. Poland is such that we know he will not countenance that what is wrong. For years a Baptist clergyman, studying medicine to find remedies for his ailments, with a delicate consumptive look, standing with one foot upon the grave, he made the discovery which has saved himself and called out from hundreds of others the strongest testimonials possible. We have known Dr. Poland for years, and never knew a more conscientious, honest, upright man, and we are glad to state that we believe whatever he says about his White Pine Compound."

Should you think favorably of this medicine, be careful, when purchasing, that it is the WHITE PINE COMPOUND that is offered to you, as we know that other preparations have been palmed off for it by unprincipled dealers.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is manufactured at the

NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT,

106 HANOVER STREET, BOSTON,

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor

Under the supervision of

REV. J. W. POLAND, M. D.

DR. SWETT will attend to the business department, to whom all orders should be addressed.

Sold by wholesale and retail dealers in Medicine everywhere.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAACK, Chicago, Ill.,
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
COLLINS & BROTHER, St. Louis, Mo.,
WARD, KENNEDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa
General Agents for the West.

Clergymen, Teachers, The Press,

Unite in saying that the new juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and new prospectus.

o

Make Your Own Soap!

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Powder, warranted to double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other powder or ley in market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, and one, two, three, five, ten, and fifteen pound cans, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 12 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington street, N. Y. 528-400

Army Corps Badge Pins and Rings, of 16 carat gold, richly enamelled. BRYANT & BENTLEY, Manufacturing Jewelers, 12 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of Prof. De Marny's FRISBEE LE CHEVEUX. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Free from injury to the hair. Price by mail, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-43o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

$5 Given Away.—The great $5 secret and other valuable information mailed free. Address STEPHENS & CO., 310 Broadway, N. Y. 529-40o

SKATES FOR THE MILLION!

DEPOT FOR

Lovatt's Patent Skates,

WITHOUT STRAPS, AND

NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,

WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.

A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates. Depot for the "Latest Kink" and "Patent Foot Shelia." Wholesale and Retail.

ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway, Skates Ground and Repaired. o

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet &c., address H. C. L. MEARS, 377 West 23d St., N. Y. 2o7o

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1863; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with Counter-balance movement, a most Practical and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is noiseless in operation, makes the regular stitch, alike on both sides, ornamental, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD OF ALL KINDS. The Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to a revolution of the wheel. Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c.; the strongest seam made. Warranted not to get out of order for THREE YEARS. It has taken the PREMIUMS at New York and other STATE FAIRS, and received the FULL APPROVAL of ALL the principal Journals, and of those who have used it. Also, the new Low Priced Machine Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others at the same price are INFRINGEMENTS.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch in the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal,

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
537-40o 505 Broadway, New York.

LITTLE CHILE ASSAULTED BULL TO THE RESCUE.

BULL TO MADAME SPAIN—"Sheer off, ma'am, don't touch the little boy—(to Chile)—I'll stand by you —while you have a copper."

THE GREAT

BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUM.

Elegant and Serviceable.

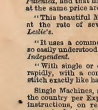
Ladies', Gents', Misses' and Children's Slippers, Gaiters, etc.,

At BROOKS' Agt.

375 BROADWAY, N. Y.
Opposite the Metropolitan Hotel.

"A Scientific Wonder,"

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,



One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen, A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to REMAIN SOLAR TIME, with absolute correctness and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down or will can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Accurately adapted to the Sun's time all who have used them. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to

J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
tfo 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 Per Day.—Active enterprising men wanted everywhere to sell an article required by every person. Useful, attractive and quick sales. Business honorable and profitable. Full particulars and a sample sent free by mail. Address AMERICAN GOLDEN PEN CO., Hartford, Conn. 539-40o

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 602 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $30 each.

o539-45

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newbern, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by ADAMS EXPRESS, No. 59 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates. 0000

TURN

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses.

SMOLANDER'S

Extract Buchu.

From ONE DOLLAR Agents for the South and West. D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-67o ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by RIDER'S SULPHUR OINTMENT. Price 25 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 538-47o

DEAFNESS

And Discharges from the Ear Radically Cured.

By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract

OTITINE.

Price $1 50 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. WEEKS & POTTER, Druggists, No. 170 Washington st., Wholesale Agents.

UNION ADAMS,

HOSIER, GLOVER,

AND

SHIRT MAKER,

No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

$1,000,000 Worth

OF

WATCHES AND JEWELLERY.

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches	- each	$12 to 60
500 Silver Watches	- each	$5 to 25 00
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Cases	each	5 00 to 8 00
1,000 Elegant Silver Plated Castor Stands	each	50 00 to 55 00
1,000 Elegant Silver Plated Fruit and Cake Baskets, each	-	15 00 to 25 00
2,500 Sets of Silver Plated Tea Spoons, each	-	8 00 to 15 00
2,500 Sets of Silver Plated Forks, each	-	8 00 to 15 00
2,000 Goblets, Engraved -	-	4 00 to 8 00
2,000 Pairs of Table Specimens	-	5 00 to 8 00
2,000 Pairs of Salt Spoons	-	3 00 to 5 00
1,500 Magnificent Napkin Rings	-	4 00 to 5 00
5,000 Pairs of Pendant Ear Drops (assorted colors)	-	5 00 to 8 00
2,500 Sets Ladies' Jewellery, Imitation Pearl	-	5 00 to 10 00
2,500 Gold Lockets, engraved blocks, each, perfect imitation
Lady's Watch		10 00
10,000 Ladies' Black Combs, rich and unique patterns		5 00 to 25 00
4,400 Rich Bosoms, Gold Jet, and Vulcanite		5 00 to 15 00
2,000 Latest Style Vest and Neck Chains		5 00 to 20 00
1,000 Gents' California Diamond Pins -		5 00 to 20 00
5,000 California Diamond Ear Drops -		5 00 to 10 00
3,000 Miniature and Emerald Dorothy Ring Pins		5 00 to 16 00

And a large assortment of Jewellery and Silverware of every description. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each article is, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $3; sixty-five for $10; and one hundred for $15.

Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,

o No. 36 Beekman st., ▣ O. Box 4715, N. Y.

The Reason why so many Die with CONSUMPTION, is because they neglect to use the proper remedy in season. When the system is first attacked with a cough, oppression of the chest, or seated pains in the breast, ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will cause the phlegm to raise, heals the irritated parts, and restore the system to health.

o For sale by Dealers in Family Medicine generally.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo

If you want a good Head of Hair, use PHALON'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-45o

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $30 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Horace Greeley, Editor of the Tribune:

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and available condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 537-40o

To Consumptives.

THE ADVERTISER, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure.

To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable; and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburg, Kings County, N. Y.

Great American

PRIZE CONCERT!

AT

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEBRUARY 22d, 1866.

20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $80,300 will be presented to Ticket-Holders.

100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD!

One Gift, in Greenbacks,	$10,000
One Gift, in 7-30 Bonds,	5,000
1 Gift, Residence three miles from Chicago	3,000
1 Square Grand Piano, 9 Gifts, $500 each	4,500
50 Eng. Fat Steers, Gifts, $200 each	10,000
10 Theaker & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each,	1,000
50 Gifts, Gold Hunting-Case Watches,	2,500
50 Gifts, Gold Lever Watches, $50 each,	1,500
2,500 Gifts, Silver-Plated Mammoth Gold Albums,	25,000
4,000 Gifts, 4,000 Cheap Albums, $3 each,	12,000
1,000 Gifts, $10,000 Cash, $10 each,	10,000
20,000 Gifts, Total value of which,	$86,700

The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public.

All the Prizes are a great deal more valuable, etc.

All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Diamond and Sparkling Jewelry, and in like manner until all are drawn.

We will not dispose of the valuable Prizes, as that will be different to number of tickets to insure us against loss, the Prizes are distributed in order of the numbers upon the Ticket, and should any other Gifts, where you buy private stakes a greater loss of the value you draw, consequently you seldom if ever get anything worth what your ticket cost you.

Dont throw your money away on valueless concerts, but send us your money for tickets soon, if you would secure them; over 50,000 already sold. Every ticket is a prize, and is now being sent out, the number, name of Gift, and the result of drawn, and will be published in the papers.

Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and name. Address

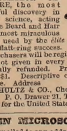
BRICCS, LEMON & CO.,
144 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.

SERPENTS de PHARAON,

or

SERPENTS' EGGS.

THE LATEST SCIENTIFIC MIRACLE.



"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and retail by FLORIDA SAWYER, 246 Canal street, New York. 50 cents a Box, free by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Self-adjusting Reversible Wire, the Linen finished, The Neat and Durable Collar. Sold by all dealers. Price $1.20 per dozen. Sent by mail, 15 cts. extra. Send price and size. Sold by first class houses.

o

Whiskers and Mustaches

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to six days by using DR. SEVIGNE'S RESTAURATEUR, or PILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery of modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the ele of Paris and London with the most flat-ring success.

The natural ill purposes will be restored, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Sent by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts. Terms of different powers for $1. Address

000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address

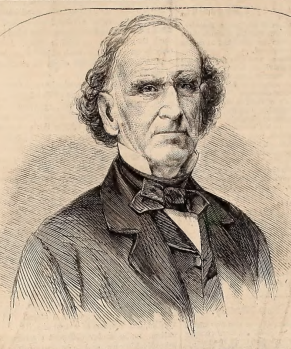
o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 540 Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 3, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 BY YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Righting Ship.



"OLD things have passed away and all things are become new," is evinced in nothing more clearly than the advanced, some may say, the revolutionary, propositions before Congress, or which have been adopted by the National Legislature. Apart from the proposed amendments of the Constitution, fifteen or twenty in number, we have pending legislative measures correspondingly numerous and radical.

Among these is a bill for giving to the negroes in the District of Columbia, which is under the direct control of Congress, the right of suffrage. This has passed the Lower House by a vote of 116 to 54, the members of the dominant party voting almost solid for it, and refusing to qualify the measure by limiting the right to such as can read and right. There is no doubt a considerable section of the party out of Congress who would not only be glad to see this qualification made, but would apply it to white men as well as negroes. If there be any virtue whatever in the ability of a man to read and write, if through these acquirements he becomes a better man and citizen, or better able to take a part in public affairs, then we see no reason why the qualification should not be made universal. An ignorant white man cannot be the peer of any other man, black or white, who is educated. That intelligence, and not property or color should be the basis of Republican Government and institutions, follows necessarily on the fact that this is the highest efforts of human intelligence and virtue. We are not called upon, through the proposed measures, to extend the suffrage—of which so many people affect to be afraid—but rather to limit it. What would be the result, in the sinks of sin and ignorance of our own city, if the qualifications proposed to be required to constitute a voter in the District of Columbia were made applicable here? Would not a large per centage of official corruption, profligacy, extravagance and crime, disappear? Every decent citizen can give a prompt and just answer.

As a sequence, or rather amplification of the propositions referred to, is another to strike out the words "free white person" in our naturalization laws, so that all men, whatever their color, landing on the soil of the United States, may be citizens thereof, and entitled to all rights and privileges pertaining to such.

Mr. Conkling, of New York, following in the same direction, proposes that all taxation shall be apportioned according to the number of citizens (i. e. people), while representation shall be calculated only according to the number of voters. The tendency of such an amendment of the Constitution (this is the form the proposition takes) would be to make it to the interest of all the States to give political rights to all men within their borders, regardless of color.

In other matters, one of the most significant manifestations of the public sentiment, extreme perhaps in expression, is the resolution proposed in the Senate by Mr. Chandler, of Michigan, referring to Great Britain, as follows:

THE LATE ELIJAH F. PURDY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY LEWIS.

A RAINY NIGHT IN THE CITY—IN FRONT OF THE THEATRE.

"Whereas, The British Government has refused indemnity for the damage done to American commerce by her subjects; therefore,

"Resolved, That the President be requested to withdraw our ministers to the Court of St. James, and to declare national non-intercourse between the two nations."

These resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 23 to 12. It was probably not the expectation of Mr. Chandler to secure their passage at this time, but to bring the matter to which they refer in a tangible form before the public mind. Lord Clarendon has declined to continue the discussion with Mr. Adams, in which, unless he meditated reparation, he was right. The days of reparation were long ago exhausted on our side, and the expedients of evasion on the other. We have made our demands with all the circumlocution and dumnery of middle-age diplomacy, and Mr. Adams has had his tilt with foils with the British so-called statesmen. His countrymen had had enough of it to watch Hamlet on more than occasion "A la palsgrafe" and the Earl Russell backers have several times flattered themselves that Mr. Adams got a full Roland for his Oliver. The whole business has been what not best to be expected.

Mr. Seward has not been in earnest. The English Government discovered it early, and the sum total is several cords of utterly unimportant correspondence. And the leaving of a question in abeyance that ought to have been settled long ago, and which, while unsettled, will be a source of irritation and danger.

We should have had a war with English and French account the moment the war was ended, before a ship had been put out of commission, or a regiment disbanded. We lost our opportunity, and are likely into war; and all because we will diplomatise—because we will adhere to stupid traditions of action, instead of fairly and firmly conforming to the sense and exigences of the time.

Let Congress pass Mr. Chandler's resolutions; let the Government act up boldly to their letter and spirit; and how long does any one suppose it will be before England would pay our demands to the uttermost farthing! Probably not even "sixty days."

OUR PUBLICATIONS.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY—PRICE 10 CENTS, OR $4 A YEAR.

The most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has been the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, forming a perfect pictorial contemporary history of the world. It contains every new and important Invention, Portraits of Celebrities in all Countries, Sketches of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of the Day, New Buildings, Paintings, Sculptures, &c. Its Literary department is continued Story by some distinguished Novelist, Original Tales, Sketches, Criticisms, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	12 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion—Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine.

With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Engraving, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll, with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored Lithograph of Painting entitled "The First Baby"—and a doll model in her walking costume, the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the February and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, $3 50; four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the amount.

Subscriptions to be sent to

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and is the great satirical paper of America.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cts a number, or $1 50 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 50.

Illustrated Almanacs for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—60 Eng...	50 cents with 4 Lithographic Pictures.
Frank Leslie's Lady's Almanac—70 Eng	50 cents with Colored Fashion Plates.
Frank Leslie's Comic Almanac—80 Eng	15 cents

A copy of any of the above Illustrated Almanacs sent gratis to every person forwarding a year's subscription to either of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, Chimney Corner or Lady's Magazine.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 3, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

POSTPONEMENT.

The magnificent PRESENTATION PLATE for all Subscribers to FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER, will be ready for delivery to every Purchaser of No. 39 of that great family newspaper. No. 39 will be issued on the 13th of February.

Trial by Jury.

TRIAL by jury, or the right of trial by a jury of one's peers, is considered among the highest prerogatives and most sacred rights of civilized man. In countries in the dark ages when power was irresponsible and despotic, and to secure it was then worth all the struggle and effort that it cost. But while the principle and the right of trial by jury are still equally true and vital, yet the very safeguards that in past years and under other circumstances were deemed essential to give it practical security and effect, now embarass and defeat its original and proper purpose. It was not the intent of those who gave the boon of jury trial to mankind to pervert justice and open an avenue of escape to criminals. When they gave the privilege to the accused to challenge peremptorily or for cause any juror who might be called on to act in that capacity, they did so to protect the alleged criminal from suffering through the prejudices or foregone conclusions of those who were to decide on his guilt or innocence. The object was to secure perfect impartiality on the part of the jury.

Now, in the early days, when trial by jury was first conceded to the people, before printing presses and telegraphs were invented or became general, it was easy to find men who had not "formed an opinion" in any given case. Unless in very rare and special instances, the circumstances of crime were known only to a few, and men really depended on the decisions of jurors for their opinions as to the guilt of persons accused of crime. But now, when no important offence can be committed without an almost immediate publication of all the facts and circumstances connected with it, exaggerated, perhaps, but necessarily essentially true, it is impossible for reading men—and here who are not?—to avoid arriving at an opinion really fixed as to the innocence of the alleged criminal? It does not follow that the formation of such an opinion implies hostility or prejudice, or prevents men from deciding, if called on to act, according to law and the evidence." It only implies that human intelligence has performed its legitimate functions.

No hostile animus is to be inferred because a juror, being really a conscientious and true man, tells us that he believes, from what he has read, that the man on trial is guilty. And it is only to guard against such animus that the preemptory challenge of the right of challenge is given to the accused.

A man, in these days, who has not formed an opinion in cases like those of Ketchum or Gordon, must be either grossly ignorant—which, whose best title to both designations is patent, from the fact of not taking the newspapers; for, if taking them, he must read the news—or the average of intelligence, and thoroughly unfit to sit in judgment, in not having arrived at a conclusion, or "formed an opinion."

As the right of challenge is now generally construed it is in effect a right for the ignorant or unscrupulous can act as jurors in what are called "celebrated cases," or of such notoriety or interest as to arrest public attention. In the case of Jefferson Davis, charged with the murder of the Cuban Otero, hundreds of men were examined as to their opinion, formed on public report, or the facts presented (rightly or wrongly) in the newspapers, of the guilt of the prisoner. Nine-tenths were set aside because they said they believed him guilty—not because they were prejudiced, in a hostile sense, against him, or incapable of giving a sound and just verdict, but because of a technicality or reservation, made under different circumstances, inapplicable now, and only operating to delay and defeat the ends of justice.

ADVICES from Germany state that the demand for American Government securities is greater than for those of any other nation, and that purchases are constantly in progress, evincing in their partiality, that "all advertisements for Turkish or other loans, or shares in any company, prove unsuccessful." The assumption is a significant and important fact that the emigration from Germany to the United States last year was in excess of that of 1864, leading to the inference that henceforward we shall draw our principal accession of foreign citizens from the Teutonic stock—the best, all, in the world. Napoleon's "Latin race" in America does not seem to be proportionally reinforced.

THE rinderpest, or plague among cattle, which, during the past summer, spread from the Continent to the British islands, has been very fatal there. During the year, more than 50,000 animals have died of it, and the mortality is on the increase. Farmers no longer care to breed cattle, and, as a consequence, beef is very necessary for their support. The disease is reported to be a kind of eruptive fever, similar to the smallpox. It is feared that, in common with the cholera, it may cross the Atlantic during the coming season. Should these prognostications prove correct, we may anticipate a serious shock to our prosperity.

THE Cornhill (London) Magazine, in an article on American humor, does not exactly ask "Who reads an American book?" as did the Edinburgh Review, a generation ago, but affects to disparage a literature which it cannot ignore, in this wise:

"For the present, however, there are no indications that a school of humor, like those amongst the intellectual leaders of the world in science, philosophy, or literature, under Bacon, Descartes, Hawthorne, Longfellow, and several other names of various merit might be established in the United States of Utility, none of them can be said to have passed out of the second rank. And the reason is plain enough. In other countries, if they have been imitators rather than leaders; they have had, at whom to imitate—persons, embodying an insufficient mastery of their subjects—it almost seems as if, from a young country, every up-rising genius must mimic—and their efforts remain as rather of extremely clever essays by undergraduates, than of the thorough and finished work of well-trained thinkers."

THE New York Citizen says about the same thing:

"Unpleasant as the admission may be to our self-complacency, there is no living American novelist equal to the half-dozen who may be named as modern from the third to fourth rank of English romance writers. We have good writers in no small number, but none that are great in the field of fiction."

A LEADING weekly newspaper, of London, in its resume of the year, pays the following tribute to the United States:

"To the Englishman, and they are the vast majority, who have the heart and the sense to take pride and pleasure in the well-doing of a free and a kindred race the moderation thus far shown by the Northern Americans in the hour of victory, their good humour, their power of absorbing a vast military force into civil purposes, and their anxiety to maintain the name of unspotted probity towards their creditors, even under the strongest pressure of a war debt and a massive system of protection, are causes of the most sincere satisfaction. . . . Probably no event in our time has ever brought to a close, in the history of the world, where the victors showed such moderation in the sanguinary vengeance on defeated political opponents."

THE funeral of the late King of Belgium, the miser king, was conducted with a pomp rather proportioned to his personal wealth than to the grandeur of his position, as sovereign of that little but busy State. Among other things, a London correspondent tells us they painted and enamelled the face of the poor corpse for exhibition, while lying in state, which ghastly mockery reminds us of Pope's fine lady—

"And—Betty, give this cheek a little red,
One needn't, sure, look hideous when one's dead!"

We have never heard, seen, or felt "spirits," and have nothing to say pro or con about spirit rappings and tippings; but we cannot resist copying from Barnum's book on "Humbugs" (what a humbug!) the following story:

"An old gentleman, apparently from the country, one day entered the room of this medium and expressed a desire to hold communication with his dead son. He took a seat at the table, and to write the names of his departed relatives. The medium, with much effort, incorrectly pronounced the term 'deceased' the name of 'diseased'—meaning by the d-i-s-e. And a practical man carefully adjusted his 'specks' and did what was never done before—a most palpable falsehood has been selected from those written, the investigator was detected in exposing what they term 'the trick of the trade.' 'Wal, I declare they do!' said he. 'But I say, Mister, I guess I'll come again to do write to a spirit communication.' 'You will am'ricy,' replied the medium, with a bow, 'we are happy to accommodate all reasonable communications' which read somewhat as follows: 'My Beast Father, Mister Jones, I am in the Spirit Land now you through this channel. Keep on investigating, and you will soon be convinced of the great fact of immortality.' The countryman hopped in my spirit-home, patiently awaiting the time when you could speak out 'Dad, it's Your Amy.' 'Oh, good gracious! But my child was a woman when she died, and she knew me.' 'Did you not tell me to write the names of the deceased?' 'Did I not tell you to write the names of the old man.' 'Wal, she ain't anything else, for she's had the rumatiz great as the mountain.'"

THE tendency to the establishment of an oligarchy in the South has been broken up by the emancipation of the slaves. In what way is well explained by Judge Fleming of Louisiana, in a recent charge to the Grand Jury of that city:

"The plantation system is for ever stamped, because labor is necessary to that system. That system was adopted simply to this: we made cotton to buy negroes, and we bought negroes to make cotton. The consideration that was to add to our acres and the number of slaves. This is a marked distinction between the planter and the farmer. The aim of the farmer is not to add to his acres, but to the fertility of those he has. The aim is not to wish to add to his laborers, for, however rich his lands, he will require no more laborers to work them than if they were poor."

SOME notion of the extent of travel on the city or horse railways of New York may be gathered from the fact that the aggregate of fares received on those lines in the six months ending December 31st, was $1,887,625.

THE rapidity of growth in some kinds of fishes, at certain periods and under favorable circumstances, is something wonderful. Thus a young salmon, which, at first, weighed only one ounce, increased in May, 1855, from the artificial breedingbeds at Stormontfield, England, after having the dead set of the sea taken by the salmon, when first on its return from the sea, having grown 10 old inches in length, 10 inches odd in girth, and in weight five pounds seven ounces and a half. Another fish had grown from about an ounce to nine pounds.

THE New York correspondent of the London Spectator, commenting on the fact that a lady, "in all other respects modest and retiring," was compelled to leave an Italian Opera because she wore a dress "exceptionally low in the neck," maintains that such an occurrence could never happen here, because custom has made our taste and taste to go to theatres in what is rather strangely called "full dress." He adds, too, that the same decorum is preserved at hotels, and proceeds to tell the following story, which fashionable people will remember as being something more than "founded on fact:"

"A lady, whom I knew, had rather an unpleasant experience in an attempt, some years ago, to disregard the tacit understanding among the rich in regard to dinner dress at hotels. She belonged to an unfashionable set, and having married a French Canadian planter, soon adopted what we call plantation manners, and affected to wear dresses on simple occasions, of which New England fell. She was at Newport, our great seaside watering place, and, having just returned from Europe, took great skin upon herself. One evening, at the table-d'hôte, a gentleman sat down near her, and the butler-plate before him happening to have no buttermarks by it on the serviette, he, instead of calling the waiter and waiting for one to be brought, used his own perfectly fresh handkerchief for the purpose. He in this was a man of culture and social standing, but a Yankee, and therefore democratic. Immediately she saw him she seized the opportunity, and calling a waiter, said, in a loud voice, 'Remove that napkin, sir, and bring a fresh butter; that gentleman has had his knife in it.' She sat down to the remark, which was heard all over upon him, and upon the lady; but, by and by, she discovered that the gentleman had quietly removed the chipped dried beef, which stood between her and her vis-à-vis. This was too much, enough, at least, to disturb at once, and calling a waiter, said, only as if to have asking for another dish, 'Remove that napkin; this lady has had her fingers in it.' In this emergency, the lady, as I have since thought to have done, left it, and she did not forgive her friend. So a few days after, when I met the latter, I was careful to express in slightest possible acquaintance between them. They being at dinner, she, conspicuous in the full dress she had adopted since her tour to Europe, and which was so very "full" that it would have suited the ball-room under any circumstances, took one from a dish of fresh figs before her, and putting it on a plate, handed it to him, with an expression of complaisance, but nothing in a tone of unmistakable significance, which could be heard all around her: 'A fig for you, sir.' He accepted it graciously, and taking it in his turn, a few fine specimens of the dish, offered it to her, with, 'A figment of your imagination, madam.' The lady, I am told, until her intended victim left the hotel. It was gone rally agreed that he had done what a gentleman would shrink from doing; but the provocation was such that he was held guiltless of offence, and applauded for his wit, and nobody, except perhaps a few of her slave-holding friends, pitied her. This is the last instance that I know of, of a lady's appearance in full dress at a public table. But I am told that within the last three or four years it was the mode in fashion among the "fastest" sets, at the height of the season, at Saratoga still one or two others of the gayest watering-places.

It is not improbable that the death of King Leopold may exercise a great influence on the future destiny of Mexico. Very indifferent to grandeur, the late king was not indifferent to money, and in 24 years he accumulated a fortune estimated at $16,000,000. One-third of this he has left to his successor, another to his second son, the Comte de Flandre, and the third to his daughter Charlotte, so-called Empress of Mexico. One of the reasons which induced an Austrian Archduke to accept his old position as a satrap of Juarez was pecuniary embarrassment, which this immense legacy will finally remove. Miramar with a great income may seem a much pleasanter residence than Mexico, without French troops or American recognition.

A MR. WATTS PHILLIPS, writing to the London Athenæum from Paris, claims that the play entitled "Lost in London," now being acted at Wallack's Theatre, is not only his production, written some years ago for Mr. Webster of the Haymarket Theatre, London, but that it was first stolen by "a person in his employ, who learned to America." The fact that some one thought the piece sufficiently valuable to steal it, is about the only compliment that has ever been paid it. The theatrical public here will not be sorry to learn that it has been returned to its owner.

THE population of Paris is now slightly above half-a-million of Londoners—about 1,607,351, and has an near as possible doubled since 1832—that in 33 years—when London had exactly the population which Paris has now. It seems probable that the two great capitals are increasing at an equal rate, but Paris, if anything, the faster—as London recently exceeds 3,000,00 yet, even allowing for the increase since 1861.

M. SAYERS, of Paris, has found that a brilliant light, possessing very high actinic power, is produced by the combustion of a mixture of 24 parts of finely-pulverized nitrate of strontia, and seven parts of flowers of sulphur and six of the red sulphide of arsenic. This mixture can be sold at six cents a pound, and its light is therefore much cheaper than that of magnesium, and as to it is said to be only very slightly inferior in actinic energy.

TOWN GOSSIP.

FIRST snow, then rain, then slush, then freeze, then thaw, then mud, and then—everything but fine, dry weather. One day another comes on ice, and all New York goes skating mad. The next day the vestige of ice is to be seen, and the weather is summery enough to be classed in June and July. Another fortyfour hours elapses, and sleighs are swinging through the streets, and New York is in hilarious for a few moments over giggling bells; when, presto! another change, and the streets are clear, and the people are stepping about in mud-ankle deep.

We have a theory that there will be no more weather in New York as in the olden time. Do we not all remember how, 30 years ago, it was understood that no snow had four feet deep in the streets and all travel stopped for a day or two until it could be packed and shovelled, and piled and carted? That was the millennium for boys, and the days of terror for housekeepers. Then there was nothing unusual in the fact of a general sleighing in the city, and people of moderate means could enjoy a cutter ride.

But, all this is altered, and New York no longer knows anything that looks like a respectable snow-storm. We said we had a theory about it, and it is this: that New York is a warmer city by at least 10 degrees than it was 30 years ago, and that however great the weather may be that sweeps over us, it does not affect us then. The same with regard to snow and ice, it has not been so much, but may be brought about even by this latest heat, merits prematurely. This arises from the fact that we consume more fuel than ever before. The universal use of coal must have set the earth in brick walls, and even upon the earth itself, while the great consumption of gas and the heated pipes of our lamps, certainly has an influence on the atmosphere. In this view we believe that there is a continual exhalation of caloric going on that warms the entire city, and assists in preventing ice or melts snow in the flake before it reaches the earth.

That point being settled, we will fly from freezing on shore to freezing at sea, and and revert to a topic we discussed last week. The difficulty appears to be this:

Steamers leave the ship of that name, by the neglect of those in authority. We predicted then that the authorities would do nothing, and we are sorry to say that we were right. They have called for no inquiry into the disabling the doctor, who had her in charge, to last April, 60, and that, of course, is the last we shall hear of the case. It serves the woman right. She had no business to be poor—and an emigrant—and to have ten sick, and young, and handsome, as she ought to have been, and to have had a husband and children to be taken care of by the cabin.

Ships, and steamships, and emigration, brings us to the sailing of Mr. Barker's colony of women for Washington Territory. The steamship Constitution was the vessel, and she carried away about 150 of the softer sex, to the terror of brokers, bummers, and fashionable dry-goods merchants. There will be about five months on the passage. Only think of it! the fact of 150 women at sea for five months. Think of the small talk, the scandal, the gossip, and the stories, the romances, the flirtations on board ship. Think of the quarrels to be made up, and the reconciliations to be effected, and the heart-burnings to be endured. Should not all men be glad that they are not on the high seas to go to Washington Territory?

As we are talking of women, let us make mention of one other subject connected with them that needs reform. In the city of New York alone, there are some thousands of women, good and industrious, whose sole resource is to earn a living by dressmaking and millinery. They will venture to say, that not one in a hundred of these can afford to give one dollar out of their income for any purposes whatever, and yet upon them the fashionable Revenue Law presses more than upon any other class. It says:

"Dressmakers, making articles to order, as garments, and not for sale generally, shall, to the amount of $1,000, be exempt from duty; and for any excess beyond a thousand, six per cent."

That is, if the dress is worth $900, the dressmaker shall pay a tax on it of $15. In many cases she does not receive more than this for the making of the dress, and cannot get more from Mrs. Shoddy, who, while appreciating the beauty of a well-made dress, does not like the discourtesy of paying the workwoman for making it. The law consequently works this way: It makes the middle and lower classes make their own dresses, and throw only the expensive ones upon the hands of the dressmaker, and she, feeling that she cannot put this tax upon her customers, consequently defrauds the revenue, or cuts down the wages of her sewing girls.

This is one of the cases of previous Congresses aboud nobice.

There has been little of theatrical sensation this week, excepting the opening of Wood's new theatre on Broadway, opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Mr. Wood has made a neat little house, light and airy, and well-fitted for comfort, and seems to have the qualifications will permit. His company are new to New York, but an individual exception must be made in favor enough in them—if they choose to devote themselves to it—to fill their theatre. Mrs. Hoey, who opened the house opened with a new melange by De Walden, not up to show off the capabilities and beauties of certain performances and stage effects. The principal of the first was the Hamlet Brothers, who seem to have a talent in the physical line rather disturbing to our ideas of the stuff that the acting profession is made of. They are, without doubt, the greatest gymnasts in the world, and if there was nothing else in the performance, (which the name of the piece—they would be attraction enough.

The Philadelphia Sketch Club has had a very fervent annual reception at the Fine Art Galleries, No. 625 Broadway, on Thursday evening last—fervent in the sense of being crowded, and the show of pictures decidedly fine. The rooms remain open for the week, and will be the lounging place for all the dilettanti and beauty of New York for some time to come.

BOOK NOTICES.

PHOTOGRAPHY has been so simplified as to become a source of equal entertainment and utility to persons non-professional. The process is not such to record permanently the scenes that please them most, or the places and objects which most interest them. How many thousands are annually spent every year in the matter during their winter rambles, are heart to ejaculate, "Oh, if I were only a painter!" Well, it is a pretensible what has delighted them, and are sad to think that the joy for them is not a "joy for ever."

Photography comes in the place of painting, and it now within the reach of most people of ordinary leisure and their intelligence. The apparatus is a very simple and edge of chemistry is not needed. Competent men have fitted the formulas of the whole to that completely necessary that the amateur photographer, or for that matter, the ordinary professional, should understand all the "whys and wherefores." For the benefit of that large class which now may be practicing photography without a guide, we set to call attention to a neat, convenient and valuable book, "The Photographic Primer," published by M. Carey Lea and Edward L. Wilson, and published by Benerman & Wilson, Philadelphia. It gives in plain, intelligible language, the best and latest practical hints for the manipulation of photography, and is equally useful to the beginner and the proficient. Especially valuable portions of the book are "The New Beginner," by Mr. Solars. Why he should commit the phenomen of "Why" we are not observant, but we forgive him the sin, in view of the simple and useful directions which follow the confession. Equally valuable are the hints relative to the beautiful and useful art of photography.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A Hartford paper publishes the following: Some time last fall I sent you an account of a woman who came to Hartford, from Bridgeport, Connecticut, and who, in four months, besides doing the house-hold work, had made 365 pairs of shoes, all the pegging, earned $180 in bottoming their baldcobbler's shoes, and had also taken care of a sick child. After that time, during the winter, she made shoemaking a kind of secondary business, and by the first of April, when she commenced on a six months' contract, had earned $300. She has since been constantly at work; and I find by examining the books of her employers, that in the past nine months, by "odd jobs," she has earned in six months in bottoming their baldcobbler's shoes, $300, and in three months more has done well, but I think she exceeds them all. If any woman can make out a better record, I will be glad to know where to find her.

—The way of Washington Senators is hard. A newly Judge Field, of California, received by express, a small box which, as surprise has not been excited, was opened very carefully, after being soaked in a tub of water to remove the sawdust in which the precious cartridges with heavy ball and fulminating powder, were packed. The Judge was not disappointed, for the box would have exploded. There was a single line written on the lid of the box, which, he believes, "Mr. Chamberlayne has decided the Pueblo case." Senator Sumner received a similar communication, and the Judge somewhat startled, with the following note: "You can imagine my surprise at the receipt of the package, and if that bill of yours passes, I will have a piece of you."

—Richmond papers report the arrest of the rebel Col. Mosby at Warrenton, Va., on a charge of being a Federal soldier in the valley, during the war. The Richmond Examiner thinks his arrest "a piece of rank impudent mendacity," as he was a regularly commissioned officer of the C. S. A., and "has the papers from the proper awarded to other officers of Lee's army."

—The Legislature of the State of South Carolina, Washington county, N. Y., had a singular encounter with a panther, the other night, while hunting for squirrels. His dog began barking at the mouth of a hollow tree, and came out of the hollow, as if having had a tussle with some animal. His dog came out, and re-entered the hollow, and Mr. Chamberlayne, also, and re-entered the cave. For it felt he had to crawl. He found the dog in the stump of a tree, and a panther. Further, when he saw the eyes of an animal glaring at him. He fired his gun, and the animal made a rush, but a blow with the breech of the gun knocked him down. This was to get him out. Dragging was practicable until he got to the mouth of the hollow tree, when he left the dog, and it required fire or six to pull the captor out. Mr. Chamberlayne has since received the appointment of Mr. Hill, to be a panther six feet long. The hollow tree is a much rather fight rebels than undertake another such a job.

—An incident occurred at St. Louis, illustrative the fact that many of the wild beasts, captured and sold at four-legged animals, but they sometimes do things on their own account. Not long since, a car load of the these herpetended beasts were brought to the Illinois depot, from the west by rail, and it was concluded that the best way to get them across was to start them on the ice and let them walk over. As soon as they reached the ice, instinct taught them that they had embarked on a dangerous journey, and instantly the oldest male in the drove—one, too, that had never been at a circus and had no education—took the lead, and one at a time the whole 300 "fell in" and followed their leader in single file, with the utmost decorum. When the last straggling themselves into a long line, they crossed the river. In the circumstance of the animals, there is a moral reason, who were impressed with this wonderful illustration of mute sagacity.

—The citizens of Columbia, Pa., were greatly excited, one day last week, by seeing a locomotive run through the town at the rate of 50 miles an hour, with no one on it. The engineer who was coming it, having opened the throttle-valve, the engine started, but he became frightened and jumped off. After a short run the engine came into collision with a train, and both were badly damaged. Fortunately no lives were lost, though several were injured.

—The Hartford, Conn., Press says: "A ragged little fellow was noticing on one of our ponds lately with his shoes or stockings, his shoes being strapped upon his arms. He had on a pair of skates and that his feet were warm enough if he kept on skating."

—The Rev. Dr. Bellows has a fine joke on the Christmas morning, and after a long search found one in a sock from which a present had been taken. He presented to him by his parishioners, and ornamented it with a label, on which was written the following:

—Mrs. President Johnson has received from Sir Moses Montefiore a most elegant and costly present in the form of a Christian prayer book, of exquisite device, filled with Parisian bon-bons.

—Ex-Governor Wright, politician on the Kennebec, remarked to a lady that eloquence was abundant to keep the ball rolling in a "row." And the young lady, who had been an attentive listener, "took some time to consider the remark, and then said, "I guess I know nothing about." The bachelor turned pale, and thanks himself a widower.

—Secretary McCulloch has addressed a circular to the Treasury Agents, requesting them to submit at once all matching foreign bodies coin shinnels that had died of the cholera, with a view to preventing them or ailment all attrites of hides to the Department at Washington.

—Arthur Savoy, who was sent to prison for killing John F. Hayward, in a duel, a few days after the murder wards, is reported to have only fidgeted death, and to have made up his mind to make the best of his time and to his friends. His brother, however, says that he was "waked" and "shaved" in the city.

—The savage weekly receipts of the messengers added to the Bank of the Commonwealth, in Detroit, Mich., is about $6. The opera in that city gave them a benefit on Saturday.

—A pickpocket with a watch in his hand, which he had just taken from the pocket of a gentleman who was in the Boston Common, was seen by a boy waiting for a return to cash his coupons, was pounced upon by a policeman, and found to be the pickpocket's own watch in his own pocket.

—The wheat yield of Minnesota is said to be unprecedented, it averaging 27 bushels to the acre, and the total yield of the State estimated at 21,000,000 bushels, which is 48 bushels to each inhabitant—man, woman, and child. The wheat crop of Minnesota is the principal agricultural production of Minnesota, the immense crops of corn, barley, oats, and potatoes are also grown.

—The Hartford Courant says that the present year, enters upon the 102d year of its uninterrupted publication.

—A mercantile agency in New York reports the number of failures in the United States for the month over $17,500,000, which is about twice as much as those for 1865 or 1864, and three times those of the years before 1857. The general condition of trade is called healthy.

—Capt. George W. Cutler died recently in Washington. He was the author of some celebrated poems, among which are "Independence Bell," "Bunker Hill," and "Song of Lightning." "I Pluribus Unum," "Ferry, Jersey," and "Ode to Liberty." He was also a man of the most sensitive organization, of culture, and refinement, and, in the early settlement of the State of Kentucky, was a captain in one of the regiments of that State in the battle of the Thames, under Gen. Harrison, Duena Vista, receiving from the hands of Col. Clay, who fell in that engagement, the sword which, on his return, he gave to his bereaved father, Henry Clay, at Ashland, retaining for himself the pistols which were in his kindest regards. Capt. Cutler was for some years in the Treasury Department, and afterwards in Cincinnati engaged in the practice of the law in Cincinnati.

—The Boston Journal says the destruction of steamers, ferry-boats, wharf-boats, canal-boats, barges, ferry chains, etc., in Boston harbor since the first movement of ice, is $500,000. The insurance will probably not be paid half that amount. The ice is still running, but navigation is partly resumed.

—A Freedmen's Savings' Bank has just been opened in Memphis. The first day's deposits amounted to $50, averaging $5 each.

—The Rev. John A. J. Creswell, Senator from Maryland, has been appointed by President Johnson to fill the vacancy upon the late Hon. Henry Winter Davis, who died in Baltimore on the 11th of December inst.

Foreign.—The Leeds (England) Mercury of the 27th ult., says: "At Leeds Police Court on Tuesday morning, as a young man was going down the steps of the Central Railway Station, Wellington Bridge, he was startled by the appearance of a ghost with white as it was said, coming out of the adjoining graveyard. Whether it was a 'creation of the imagination,' or whether it was a reality, and not a public-house, or a veritable reality, he could not tell. The ghost, however, came up to him and struck the dreadful object, which he discovered to be a young man. The ghost then made off, and disappeared. Feeling on being awoke, screamed on finding herself in the street. She ran to a house near and was received with clothing, and then accompanied home. She had been sleeping with her sister, and the latter had got out of bed in a dream, unlocked the door, and started on a journey naked. Without knowing it she passed by any of the family.

—Lord Derby Londoner established a free school in that city, some time ago, and directed that the day after Christmas should be a holiday, and that the evening among the young unmarried women, educated there, the most handsome should be distributed most must be members of the Episcopal Church. 22 young women, the relatives and friends of the scholars, and employers with whom they have lived since leaving school, were present to witness the distribution of the prizes. A large number participated in the drawing last Christmas Eve, the distribution of which being an exceedingly pretty, rosy-cheeked damsel, whom nobody would have supposed had any difficulty in securing a husband—Query or no dowry.

—A new "crime" which is creating some terror in the fashionable circles of Paris is that of "hair-cutting." A hairdresser in the Quartier Montmartre, has been brought before the correctional tribunal with a series of accusations. With the assistance of an accomplice, who appears to be a sort of valet-de-chambre, he contrived, as he has been in the habit of entering into his shop poor unfortunate girls who had been betrayed by their lovers, driving them by violence of their locks, not unfrequently inflicting severe injuries on the unfortunate victims. The shop numerous letters from his victims, upbraiding him with his cruelty, and threatening to bring an action age to denounce the ruffian to the police, undeterred by these letters, he continued his practice to the very hour of the city; thence by arteries it is distributed in every direction. There are also numerous Arteries with in the city and its suburbs. By boring an average depth of 80 feet the water rises several feet above the surface of the earth, and flows in a very bold stream. In many instances the water rises to a level of all buildings. It is fresh and sweet as that brought from the mountains.

—Madame Lamartine, the wife of the celebrated poet, child, her place in the lands of Lamartine the letters that passed between her and Byron, with notes of her

A CAUTION.

WE cut the annexed paragraph from the New York daily Times of the 17th, firstly as a caution to the unsuspecting against the swindlers mentioned; secondly, to mark a designation between the parties and the house of B. T. Hayward, No. 202 Broadway, who have advertised extensively in this paper, and who seems a pity that there should not be some criminal law to reach this swarming of names belonging to respectable business men:

VICTIMIZING A COUNTRYMAN.—B. Hayward, of the firm of Hayward, Hall & Co., doing business at 202 Broadway, was brought before Mayor Hoffman on a charge of swindling perpetrated by Rev. Uriah Conklet, of Salisbury, Conn. The latter obtained from the firm of Hayward a check for $56 to Hayward & Co., in payment for certificates, which he represented to be advertisements, were to be cast to the holders to gold watches, diamond rings, and a number of other valuable articles. The check was arrested and taken before the Mayor, where he acknowledged having received the articles mentioned, and then opened before it came into his hands, and the money refunded. The complaint was withdrawn at Conklet's statement, and ordered him to refund the money, which was done.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THAT was a beautiful idea in the mind of a little girl, who, observing a rainbow after one of the topmost stem, the oldest rose was fading, while below and around it the younger blossoms were in their prime, unfolding their charms, at once and artlessly exclaimed to her mother, "Oh, mother, see! Willie Gaines is getting awakened in time to kiss their mother before she dies!"

A LAWYER addressed the Court as "gentlemen of the jury," instead of "may it please the Court," and concluded, a brother of the bar reminded him of his error. He immediately begged to apologize. "May it please the Court, in the best of the debate I called your honors gentlemen of the jury, and I ask pardon for it."

In a shipyard, one day, a tar from a man of war was observed watching two men dragging a seven foot chest along the ground by a rope. The saw was dull, the log very tough, and these they went, seesaw, saw, seesaw, for hours. At last he strolled the matter over a while, and he came to the conclusion that they were a pair of fools. He went up the way, and as one was an immense big chap, while the other was a little fellow, he said to the latter, "Say, you, give the big one a blow under the ear that capsized him, he jerked the saw away from him, and went to the small one, he sang out, "Now, run, you beggar!"

A SERENADE.—BY A LOVER WITH A COLD IN HIS HEAD.

Oh, set be dot to blow by hess,
By charting one by word;
The fairest flower I ever bell,
It dover can be dode!
Oh, dwin dose eyes, dwin scales,
Or dwell in godder star;
Dey're dwice as bright as dose, by dot, etc.

The wild that blows across the hess,
Had it a dose to blow,
With such a cold I've got,
Ah, would it blow it! Dot!
But see to be poor-natured Arab
Are gleeting on the dew!
I have a handkerchief
By baddon fail—AT HICKORY.

THERE is a very amusing anecdote of Southern pride. A Tennessee man was in Washington, interceding for a pardon for his rebel husband. Her husband was with President Johnson, and she, distracted her with great consideration and kindness. In the course of the interview, the lady of the house, who only remarked that the President was very cordial and polite, asked the wife of the rebel whether she had a family, and invited her to stay at the White House while her husband was in prison. "No," said her friend, "you accepted the President's hospitality?" "No," answered the lady, "I am not a subject of charity."

IF Brigham Young's 100 wives favor their tired with curtain lectures, and owing to the nature of Young a Night thoughts? asks the Philadelphia Press.

A GOOD-NATURED fellow who was nearly eaten out of house and home by the constant visits of his friends, was one day complaining bitterly of his numerous visitors.

"Shure and I'll tell ye how to get rid of 'em," said his friend Pat.

"How, how?"

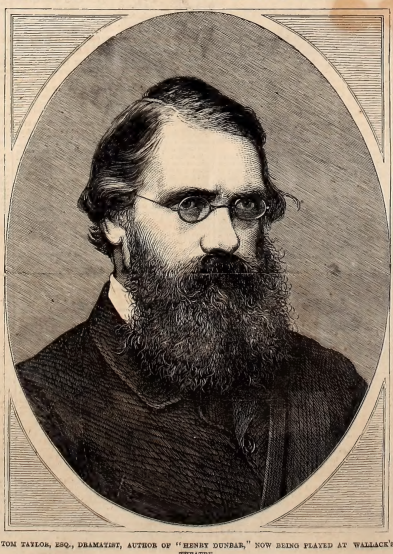
"Lend money to the poor ones, and borrow money of the rich ones, and nather sort will ever trouble ye again."

BURNING OF THE BELLEFONTAINE AND INDIANAPOLIS ENGINE-HOUSE, AT GALION, OHIO, JAN. 5.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. J. RIDLEY.

BURNING OF THE BELLEFONTAINE AND INDIANAPOLIS ENGINE HOUSE.

On Friday morning, the 5th of January, the inhabitants of Galion, Ohio, were thrown into a state of consternation by the burning of the above engine house, one of the finest in the whole country. The fire originated in the oil room. It was an excessively cold night, and some of the workmen had built a large fire to keep the oil from chilling. During their absence from the room for a few minutes, in some way the oil about took fire, and before any efficient measures could be brought to bear, a large quantity of carbon oil exploded, throwing the flames in every direction, at once putting a stop to all hope of saving the building, which, in less than 20 minutes, was a total wreck, destroying 13 fine locomotives, and other valuable property to the amount of £100,000.

The fire is a great detriment to the travelling public and a serious loss to the company, not only financially, but on account of the difficulty in replacing the burnt engines.



MR. TOM TAYLOR.

PERHAPS the most prolific and most successful dramatist of the present day—both as author and adapter—is Mr. Tom Taylor, whose portrait this week illustrates our pages. The bills of one or other of our theatres almost continually contain the announcement of a piece of some sort or other by Mr. Taylor. His productions have been so numerous that we cannot afford space to mention them all; but among his greatest successes may be enumerated the comedies of "Still Waters Run Deep," "Victims," "An Unequal Match," "The Contested Election," "The Overland Route," "Our American Cousin," and the very successful drama of the "Ticket-of-Leave Man." His last production, "Henry Dunbar," is now being played at Wallack's Theatre with wonderful success, and likely to have a run of months.

Mr. Taylor was born at Sunderland, England, in 1817, and educated at the Grange School, one of high repute. He afterwards went through two sessions at Glasgow University, in the course of which he received three gold medals and several other prizes. From Glasgow he proceeded, in 1837, to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a degree as a junior optime, and in the first class of the classical tripos; and was subsequently elected a Fellow of Trinity.

Mr. Taylor next held, for two years, the Professorship of English Language and Literature at University College, London. He was called to the bar of the Inner Temple, in November, 1845, and went the Northern Circuit until his appointment to the assistant secretaryship of the Board of Health, in March, 1850. In 1854, upon the reconstruction of that board, Mr. Taylor was appointed secretary, with a salary of £5,000 per annum. Besides his single-handed dramatic works, Mr. Taylor, in conjunction with Mr. Charles Reade, has written some elegant comedies, and has contributed to Punch several articles in prose and verse, remarkable for their classic verve.

He also compiled and edited the "Autobiography of B. R. Haydon," from the journals of that painter, published in 1853; the "Autobiography and Correspondence of the late C. R. Leslie, R. A.," published in 1860. In 1860 he published the "Life and Times of Sir Joshua Reynolds," left incomplete by the late Mr. Leslie, R.A. Mrs. Tom Taylor is known, under her maiden name of Miss Laura Barker, as a musical composer of marked originality and power.

TOM TAYLOR, ESQ., DRAMATIST, AUTHOR OF "HENRY DUNBAR," NOW BEING PLAYED AT WALLACK'S THEATRE.

DRILLING THE NEW POLICEMEN.

How little will all the million of people, eating, drinking, sleeping and living, within the few miles that comprise the great city of New York and her attendant satellites, such as Brooklyn, etc., think of the cordon of safety and surveillance that is so invisibly, yet so surely drawn about them, by the agency of the Police Department!

By an act passed April, 1860, the Metropolitan Police District of the State of New York, comprises the Counties of New York, Kings, Westchester, and Richmond, and the towns of Flushing, Newtown, and Jamaica, in the County of Queens. To properly care for this extended territory, an army of 3,000 men are necessary, under the strictest discipline, and made by continual drill and teaching effective both in a legal and a military sense, the last never appearing until the moral suasion is utterly useless. To attain this point with a body of men, each of whom is on isolated duty, and each of whom is obliged to depend on his own judgment for a monitor of action, is one of the most difficult of all the phases of human control, and is as far above the discipline of the mere soldier as the imagination can conceive.

To attain this point the policeman, who is, as a general thing, taken from a class of men supposed to be above the average intellectual standard, must from the very day of his appointment be treated as a child on police matters. He is received from among our citizens, perhaps, never having seen the inside of a station-house or conceived the first idea as to the duties of a policeman. The absurdity of putting this man in uniform, giving him his shield and baton, and throwing him into the streets to act as protector and adjudicator over the very ones he has just come from, is apparent. To obviate this great difficulty he goes to school, and for the period of 30 days is on probation. The schoolmaster is Captain James Leonard, and with all the authority, and more than the benignity and patience of a pedagogue the captain sits at his desk, with his class before him, generally consisting of about 50, and teaches, examines, corrects, and reads the aspirants for Metropolitan honors.

For instance, Mr. John Smith—we mention that gentleman's name because he is an old acquaintance, and we can take liberties with him—is appointed and turned over to Captain Leonard. He is required to make his appearance promptly at 10 a. m., at the schoolroom in the Headquarters, 300 Mulberry street, not one minute later. Having arrived, he takes his seat, opens his book (said book being entitled, "Manual for the Government of the Police Force,") and listens to the teachings and questions of the captain, who sits at a desk in front. The captain may possibly call him up—if not him, perhaps Brown, Jones, or Robinson—and standing in front of his desk, the talk will be something like this:

Captain.—"What is expected of a policeman in reference to time devoted to duty?"

Smith.—(If properly posted, answers from section 1st of the Manual.) "Each member of the police force shall devote the whole time and attention to the business of the Department, and he is expressly prohibited from following any other calling, or being employed in any other business. Although certain hours are allotted to the respective members for the performance of duty on ordinary occasions, yet, at all times, they must be prepared to act, immediately on notice that their services are required."

C.—"What is the duty of a policeman in civil cases?"

S.—(From sec. 23.) "Members of the Department must not render any assistance in civil cases, except to prevent an immediate breach of the peace, or to quell a disturbance actually commenced.

SCENE AT POLICE HEADQUARTERS—CAPT. JAMES LEONARD INSTRUCTING NEWLY-APPOINTED POLICEMEN.

Q.—"What is your duty towards a prisoner?"

S.—(Sec. 32.)—"Any officer, roundsman, or policeman, who shall wilfully maltreat, or use unnecessary violence towards a prisoner or citizen, shall, on complaint being made, and the fact established by competent testimony, be immediately dismissed from office."

And so on through 175 sections does Capt. Leonard teach and examine his pupil, renewing the schooling from day to day, until, at the end of 30 days, Smith is supposed to be fit for final examination, and is brought up for that purpose and put through his paces. If he answers even in the spirit of the Manual, he goes upon duty, but if not, he is turned back to the school for further instruction.

While this is going on, the recruit every day is passing through the hands of Mr. W. H. Simonds, who is supposed to be the physical instructor, as Capt. Leonard is the mental teacher.

Mr. Simonds puts in the hands of the recruit the baton, and in doing so, teaches him how to use it. In this part of his schooling, Smith is put through all the movements of self-defence and attack, the same as a recruit will be taught the use of the musket, bayonet, or sword, if he enters the army. It was this tuition that made the police force so valuable during the riots of 1863, and will always make them equal to twenty times their number in a street battle.

To the public all that we have been telling should be especially interesting, not only from the elements within itself, but from the fact that it exerts an influence over their daily life, and teaches them that they can sleep with safety in their beds, and walk with safety in the streets.

HON. ELIJAH F. PURDY.

WE regret to announce the death of Hon. Elijah F. Purdy, which occurred at his residence in Ludlow street, at 13 o'clock, on the night of the 8th of January. His disease was pneumonia, with which he has been confined to his house for some time, though it is only within the last two or three days that serious fears have been entertained in regard to his recovery.

Mr. Purdy was born in Westchester county, N. Y., about 70 years ago. He came to New York in the year 1810, and commenced business as a cartman, but shortly quit that business for the grocery trade, in which also he was successful. He took an active part in politics, and first became conspicuous in the support of Andrew Jackson for the Presidency. Shortly after this election he was elected Alderman from the Ward of his residence, and has been very frequently elected to office since, having held, among other important public trusts those of Supervisor, Surveyor of the Port of New York, and Commissioner of Emigration.

From the beginning of his political career he has been a member of the National Democratic party, and in city politics he has been one of the chief pillars of Tammany Hall. During the late war his services in filling the quota of the city were given heartily, and without the expectation of adequate reward, and were of very great value to the city and to the general Government. He held throughout the war, and up to the time of his death, the office of Supervisor.

In private life Mr. Purdy was a most amiable and genial man. His personal and official integrity has never been questioned. His death will be regretted deeply by his numerous personal friends, and will be felt as a loss by the Democracy of the State, and particularly of the city, to whose success he had so often and so greatly contributed. He was married early in life, and leaves surviving him a widow and six children—three sons and three daughters.

A RAINY NIGHT IN FRONT OF THE THEATRES.

NEW YORK in a rain storm or a snow storm changes its entire character. In the first case, the entire people fall into the blues; in the second, they rise almost to frantic hilarity. The city, on a rainy day, almost suspends business, but on a rainy night it does not suspend its amusement. We remember the time when a rainy night killed a benefit at the theatre, but the temper of the people has changed within a few years; and now, unless it rains emphatically cats and dogs, the inside of the dramatic temple shows little difference. This may be attributed to various causes. Perhaps, to the belief of many people, that upon such a night they will have more room; perhaps to their insatiate appetite, which will let nothing stand in the way of their pleasures; and perhaps that omnibus and car communication to every part of the city is so easy that it is about as dry travelling as staying at home. Sufficient to say that if the audience is not as brilliantly dressed upon a rainy night, it is as numerous.

Our illustration is at the front of the house after the performance. Then and there comes the crash of war, or something worse. The din of clashing omnibuses and the eager cry of the drivers: "Broadway—up—Twenty-third street—Madison square—Here you are!—South Ferry—Ninth avenue—Hurry up!" And through this confusion the artillery of the policeman, slamming the bus doors with a loud "Move on!" and "This way, madam!" gives, for about five minutes the nearest approach to Pandemonium that we know of. Umbrellas are at a premium, and the smartest man is he who is active, and, by having eyes all over him, and popping about like a pea on a hot shovel, gets his ladies snugly omnibussed in the least time, and gives them the smallest amount of fluidity on their precious persons.

In connection with this matter we have often thought that it would be a brilliant idea for our theatres to have an awning reaching well over the sidewalk, which could be put up when wanted, and act as a protection to the fairer part of the audience from the front of the house to the curb. A few such attentions to their patrons, after they have left the theatre, would be more telling than all they could offer before they entered it.

SCENE AT POLICE HEADQUARTERS—MR. W. H. SIMONDS INSTRUCTING POLICEMEN IN THE BATON EXERCISE.

IN THE PRISON PEN.

BY J. B. SWETT.

How they languished away, in the prison together,
For months, dreadful months, with the death phantom nigh,
Exposed to the hot sun, and wild tempest weather,
To faint from starvation—grow frenzied, and die!
O, God! can the tongue of man utter the tale!
Can pencil e'er sketch that wild picture of woe!
Both may attempt it, and signally fail,
For nothing can tell all a mortal may know.

Down on the sands, in the filth there, to wallow,
From night until morn, and from morning till night—
Skeleton forms—eyes sunken—cheeks hollow—
O, merciful God—what a horrible sight!
Raising their bony hands upward and praying,
Some to their Maker, and many for bread—
Some, idiotic, unconsciously straying,
Some blindly staggering over the dead!

That time has gone by for the dead, and the living;
The dead, in their low graves, to suffer no more,
The living to shudder when meagerly giving
The story of wrong never equalled before.
Not all unto man is the judging power given,
Nor power, with success, for free pardon to sue;
Those deeds are all kept in the day-book of heaven,
And every oppressor must meet with his due.

Housekeeping Experience.

AUNT BAB'S "HELP."

BY ANNA B. COOKE.

Miss Barbara Fenwick, or, as we generally called her, "Aunt Bab," is a maiden lady somewhat over sixty, and a half sister of my step-father's. She was never looked upon in the family, which is rather an extensive one, as having been born for a housekeeper, or to act as the mistress of an establishment; indeed, on the contrary, we have always regarded her assumption of that position as a rash violation of the manifest designs of Providence, and the difficulties she has had to encounter in supporting it, sufficiently bear out the truth of our opinion. But neither, on the other hand, have we any reason to suspect her of having, herself, originated so ambitious an idea; she is not given to originating ideas of any kind, and the events of almost any day of her life will furnish abundant proof of her innocence of such a charge.

Her mother was Mrs. John Fenwick, No. 1, of whom, or of whose immediate successor, Mrs. John Fenwick, No. 2, there is little known except that, between them, they left the family name numerously represented. But the gap that was made in the domestic circle by the abrupt departure of the second lady, was filled with more promptness that would be thought possible by one inexperienced in the unfailing truth of the declaration, that "to him that hath more shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly;" for, finding himself, by this time, largely provided with worldly goods, Mr. John Fenwick found himself also surrounded by zealous friends, keenly alive to his grief and his necessities.

Widowed aunts and elderly cousins, to the most remote generations, at once came to offer their services to the bereaved household; quietly settling themselves to duty, some "to look after the poor, motherless children"—some to look after them—but none, of course, presuming to think, for an instant, of reducing the ranks of nurses and servants upon whose shoulders the labors of the family interests were supposed to rest naturally.

Thus an extensive ministry of the interior had been firmly, as it was supposed, established, when affairs were suddenly thrown into disorder by an announcement of the coming advent of Mrs. John Fenwick, No. 3, and as soon as the parties concerned had sufficiently recovered from the shock to be capable of calm deliberation, a council was called to discuss the subject. But there was little discussion necessary; it was evident to all that the matter allowed but one alternative—to reduce the enemy to terms or themselves abdicate, and they determined upon the former. But open warfare soon proved fruitless; the pretender was too strongly intrenched behind gentle firmness of character and a quiet dignity of manner, to be easily dislodged, and they resolved to have recourse to strategy, and turn against her the battery of her own virtues. With this design they conceived the idea of putting forward Aunt Bab as a rival claimant for the domestic sceptre—a sort of reine fainéante, whom, as they fondly imagined, they could permit to hold the reins, while they themselves did the driving. Accordingly, Aunt Bab, hitherto "only a school-girl," was informed of her, until now, unsuspected rights as the eldest daughter, and instructed how to assist them—by gentle means if she could—by sighs, tears and the airs of wronged innocence; but if these should fail, by an open and resolute display of authority, in which they would support her. But to their astonishment this strategem, too, failed, and they were finally obliged to lay down their arms and beat a retreat, leaving Aunt Bab in the hands of the victorious party.

Her ambition, however, deprived of the strong stimulants by which it had been kept up, soon subsided, and under the effects of the reaction, she not only gave up any farther resistance, but played the artless juvenile to a stepmother not quite two years her senior. But the effects of the poison still remained, and she lost no opportunity of proving, not only to the unfortunate Mrs. John Fenwick, No. 3, herself, but to that excellent lady's luckless contributions to the family name, that she had never forgotten nor forgiven her defeat.

But "every dog," we are told, "must have his day;" and Aunt Bab's came too. Borne forward on that tide that is said to occur in the lives of human kind in general, individually and collectively, she reached the turn at last. Mrs. John, No. 3, also, after the example of her predecessors, "shuffled off this mortal coil," leaving the domestic throne vacant, and Aunt Bab mounted it. But she had grown too old in her juvenility; though the kingdom had dwindled down almost to extinction, so that emigrants from foreign lands had to be admitted to the rights and privileges of citizenship, that there might be subjects to rule, the burden of Government pressed very heavily upon her shoulders, and the crown proved to be one of thorns.

Aunt Bab had inherited from her maternal ancestors an instinctive faith that the saving of one penny was equivalent to the earning of two, as well as much less laborious, and hence no small part of her trouble arose from a sudden influx of light upon the amount of expense incident to housekeeping. Everybody about her seemed blessed with most portentous appetites—while the butcher would not furnish even a beefsteak for less than full market value, nor Biddy cook it without an ad libitum supply of coal and butter. Then, too, the grocer positively declined giving her good articles for less than he could get for them from others, and she dared not venture upon the experiment of cheaper ones; for the wealth of Mr. John Fenwick, sen., having mysteriously disappeared from the world before he himself did, Mr. John Fenwick, jun., who had succeeded him as the family banker, was extremely peculiar in his ideas of economy, and could never be brought to appreciate her ideas of finance.

Under circumstances like these, it took but a short period of power to reduce poor Aunt Bab to a skeletonized condition; but even then, as she was yet to learn, the cup of bitter experience was by no means full. If Biddy did insist upon coals and butter, she knew how to cook the beefsteak when she got them, which was an unspeakable comfort; for, if she had deemed it expedient to put it into the pot with the "potatoes" instead of the gridiron, Aunt Bab would never have dreamed of questioning the propriety of the proceeding; so great was the confidence in the instinctive knowledge of the cook-maids, and so completely had her life-long juvenility blinded her to the observation of the things going on daily around her. It was an unutterable consolation to her in her difficulties that if she didn't know, Biddy did, and as prime-minister and privy-counseller, Biddy literally "ruled the roast." Strong in her, Aunt Bab looked forward, not only without fear, but with absolute complacency to the probable succession of summer visitors at "The Dales"—to which rural spot the hot weather had, as usual, occasioned the transfer of the seat of government; and spare rooms were prepared and other necessary arrangements made for the exercise of her hospitality, and the display of her domestic accomplishments.

But it is an unfortunate truth that—

"The best laid schemes of mice and men, Gang aft awry."

And those of women are not excepted. Aunt Bab had but just seated herself, one bright morning, at her work-table, when Biddy rushed in, with her bare arms lathered with soap-suds, and the tears rolling down her plump cheeks, to announce the necessity she was under of giving up her place, and going, without loss of time, to the assistance of her brother.

"Indade then, mem," sobbed poor Biddy, in reply to Aunt Bab's look and cry of consternation; "it's mesel' would be sorry to lave yees widout nobody; but me brother Pat is just after writin' me a letter"—and she produced the document—"and he says the heart of him is broke—for the wife—that's Katie—is after dyin', and there's a babby left behind, an' nobody but himsel' to look to it. Indade, I must go, Miss Bab, dear, but I'll send yees me sister Margery to do the work."

It was of no use, as Aunt Bab had already learned, to resist the inevitable; if there was "a babby left behind" its mother, obviously it must be taken care of, and just as obviously, poor Pat was not the proper person to do it, so bending to the decrees of fate, she and Biddy at once resolved themselves into a committee of ways and means.

It was determined that Biddy, before leaving, should boil a ham and a round of corned beef, the village baker be instructed to leave a daily supply of bread until further notice, and upon these delicacies, together with such a supply of eggs as the hens of the establishment—rather an unreliable community, however, it must be confessed—might see fit to furnish, and the produce of aunt Bab's one household accomplishment, the manufacture of soft gingerbread, the household, biped and quadruped, be supported until Margery should make her appearance. Aunt Bab thought she could make the tea, one of the naturalized foreigners undertook the coffee, and Biddy departed with a lightened heart.

But with one less in the family, aunt Bab's thrift would not, of course understand the necessity of so large a daily allowance of the two last named articles, and Biddy's share was accordingly deducted. It was rather thought, however, among the parties less deeply concerned, that Biddy had been credited with too large a consumption of both; and therefore it was with no little satisfaction that they hailed the pleasant, though rather pale face that, exactly one week from the day of her departure, presented itself at the back-door, with the announcement:

"I'm Margery Mulroony, mem, the gurrel as yees was expectin'."

Without further preface Margery doffed bonnet and mantilla, and proceeded to business. She seemed to know perfectly what was expected of her, and showed herself admirably competent to the discharge of her duties, as well as willing and good-tempered; and though, with the do-as-you-like habits of an unsuperintended New York kitchen, she was even more lavish than poor Biddy had been in the matters of coal and butter. Aunt Bab resolutely closed eyes and lips, with the fear of being again left cookless too sternly impressed upon her visual organs to venture upon offending her new minister.

But, alas! for that pale face. It was the necessity of stopping sometimes and putting her hand upon her painful side, together with a strong conviction that she was not quite as strong and active as she had been, that had so powerfully backed Biddy's arguments in favor of "the breath of fresh air for the season." But fresh as the air was, and pure, it did not quite produce the hoped-for results; so one morning, about a fortnight after her arrival, Margery interrupted the process of gingerbread making, by dropping into a chair, and gasping out:

"Miss Bab, dear—I'll have—to leave yees all—an' go—to my brother—Pat's; for the pain's—a killin' me—an'—I can't—braithe—no how!"

That poor Margery was very ill was too evident, even to Aunt Bab's unwilling eyes, to be disputed, and the doctor was sent for in all haste. But he did but confirm her own decision, and recommended, with a decision that sounded amazingly like an order, that she should be sent at once to her brother's, lest delay might make her removal imprudent, if not impossible. There was no possibility of her boiling a ham before she went, but she offered to take it with her, and get Biddy to do so; and left, besides, a little drop of comfort in Aunt Bab's bitter cup, by the promise of sending for "her first cousin, Katie Donegan," to come and fill the vacancy.

"She's a dacent gurrel, Miss Bab, dear," was Margery's explanation and consolation; "an' she's handy, too. She's prenticed this four year to a grand dressmaker, and she's tired out wid the nadle and the fussin', toilin' and sewin' day an' night, an' losin' her rest along of the gentry an' their finery. Her mother 'll be glad to have her come awhile wid yees."

And Margery was right. Katie's mother was only too glad to have her daughter relieved from the perpetual drudgery of the "nadle," with all its supposed gentility, and sent for a few months into the light service of a family that she knew all about; for were not the orphan "Mulrooneys her own sister's childer?" And Katie and her young brother John were all that were left to her of a large family, and Johnnie was already beginning to look paler than was desirable, the dread of that fatal disease, that had carried off the rest, was always upon her, and she would save Katie even from its shadow. Both had inherited from an intelligent, though hard-working father, minds and ideas decidedly above the ordinary stamp of their class. Johnnie's clear and quick intellect had attracted the attention of the venerable priest, who had so unweariedly soothed his father's last hours, and he had been placed in one of the establishments of their church, to be himself trained for its services, but he was too close and conscientious a student, and was beginning to show the results of his constant toil. Katie, the pretty, bright faced Katie, instructed by her brother, and thrown, by the circumstances of her occupation, into constant, though distant intercourse with the wealthy and elegant of her own sex, had insensibly picked up an amount of refinement in her manners and style of dress that made her appear like any one but the "first cousin" of Biddy and Margery Mulrooney, and it was impossible not to treat her with a difference that would have made them open their eyes in amazement, but which she took as a matter of course.

Even Mr. John Fenwick, jun., bachelor and beauty-slighter, as he was, touched his hat to Katie when he passed her, and occasionally inquired kindly after her brother, who had won his heart by the respectful manliness with which he had once come to ask him to take to his sister a letter for which the next mail would be too late.

But once the inquiry made Katie's lip quiver. Johnnie's cough was assuming a dangereus aspect, and he seemed paler and weaker than before it attacked him. But Mr. John's heart was kind and generous, and Katie's tears were turned to grateful smiles as he remarked:

"Perhaps a change of air might do him good. You had better send for him to come out and spend a few weeks with you, Katie."

Johnnie came, and for a time was evidently the better for it, while Katie was as happy as a bird. But Aunt Bab's troubles were not over yet.

The afternoon mail of a fair, bright day brought a letter, announcing a visit from a party of two or three ladies, coming to spend a week. "Now you know," said the writer, "that we are all old friends, so don't put yourself out for us. We want to take it just as you have it, and are coming only to enjoy your company and see how nicely you get along with housekeeping. We have not yet decided whether to come up in the morning or afternoon train, but you will see us when we get there."

"Oh, how thankful I am that I've got Katie!" was Aunt Bab's exclamation, and she rushed off to the kitchen, and made arrangements for the morrow's dinner, "in case they should come in the morning train," which would bring them there by nine or ten o'clock. If they did not, she concluded, of course, that she would not see them before five, for the mid-day expresses were too hot and dusty for a pleasure trip. In the latter case she felt quite safe, for there were preserves and cake both in the store-room.

This settled to her satisfaction, a general inspection was made of the spare-rooms, and a few matters there put in order, by which time the bell rang for tea. But scarcely had Aunt Bab taken her seat at the table, with her subjects, native and foreign, about her, when a wild cry arose from the lawn behind the house, and everybody rushed out to learn the cause. Poor Katie was hanging in an agony over her brother, whom a fit of coughing had stretched, pale and motionless, upon the grass, with a tiny red stream oozing from between his lips.

It was fortunate for them both that help did not depend upon Aunt Bab's presence of mind, for she was hurrying from closet to door, and from store-room to milk-room, without any very definite consciousness of what she meant or ought to do, while a calm, quiet voice dispatched one of the boys for the doctor, made the gardener and the coachman lift the boy and lay him on his bed, and then was just proceeding to give the relief of occupation to Katie's mind, by directing her how to prepare the proper styptic, when Aunt Bab awoke to a sense of the interference, and exerted her right of rule.

The intruder at once retired, and, by a sign, completed, to Katie's inquiring eyes, the directions it would no longer do to utter; so, while Aunt Bab talked and manifested loudly her indignation at "people's taking so much upon themselves," the dose was prepared and given, and the doctor found Johnnie decidedly better—a result for which Aunt Bab took to herself great credit, though she didn't say why.

But it was highly important Johnnie should be taken back to his home as soon as possible, and the doctor promised to come very early the next morning, and see if it would do to remove him. So he did, and finding the patient even stronger than he had hoped, in spite of Aunt Bab's covert remarks, desired to have the carriage prepared for him immediately. Himself superintended the arrangement of pillows and cushions, and leaving his own horse and gig in the vacated stable, accompanied the sick lad to the city, Katie's attendance, too, being absolutely necessary as nurse. By nine o'clock Aunt Bab seated herself at the breakfast-table once more, without a cook, and company coming.

It was a silent meal; there was more thinking done than talking, but by the time it was over, Aunt Bab had come to her conclusions, and calling the aid of one of her subjects, dispatched her in desperation to town, by the next train, to try their luck at the Intelligence Office. A committee of the whole was called, the merits of all known establishments of that sort discussed pro and con, and the messenger finally deputized to make application to one of which the owner notified the public through the religious journals, that he received none but those sérvants whose moral character as well as domestic accomplishments had been fully tested.

She was to return at as early an hour as was feasible, and meanwhile the home forces would combine their efforts, and make such preparations as they could in case the threatened guests should come before dinner, while Aunt Bab, in her inmost heart, prayed fervently that they might not.

But her star was in the ascendant; as the hands of the clock pointed to eleven, the messenger returned, bringing with her a neat, tidy, pleasant-looking woman, who had arrived "just in time," as Aunt Bab herself declared, "to prevent her having a fit;" for not only had all the company she expected made their appearance by the earliest opportunity, but Mr. John Fenwick, Jr., too, had seen good, on that day of all others, to bring out a party of his gentlemen friends; for whom the picked-up dinner would by no means do, whatever might be the case with the ladies.

Aunt Bab's eyes fairly danced at the sight of her new maiden, and never had she so much enjoyed the honors of the table as she did that day; for, short as had been the notice, Betty had served up an entertainment fit for a prince. Even Mr. John Jr. revelled in the delights of gratified hospitality; and his last words to Aunt Bab, ere he stepped into the carriage that was to convey himself and his friends to the return train, were an injunction to her—now that she had a cook that was really a cook, to keep her, and not, to save the price of a little extra coal or butter, offend and drive her from the house.

It had proved, notwithstanding its portentous commencement, a day of entire satisfaction, and Aunt Bab laid her head upon her pillow that night, without a fear for the morrow. But truly none can say what the morrow may bring forth. The first sound that saluted the ears of the luckless housekeeper was a juvenile voice demanding:

"Miss Bab, what 'll we do about the breakfast, ma'am? for Betty's down with the sick headache."

"Headache!" exclaimed Aunt Bab, starting out of bed, and remembering the fine health and spirits in which Betty had seemed the evening before, to be entertaining the coachman and his wife, who, with the young bachelor gardener had come in to welcome her. "What has given her a headache?"

"She says, ma'am, that she fretted the night for the lonesomeness of the place, an' the cryin' guv it to her. The fire's made, Miss Bab, an the kittle's on; but I was thinkin' perhaps I'd better be afther tellin' Mike to send in Ellen to cook the breakfast."

It was a very fortunate thing for the household that little Mary had done the thinking, for it was quite beyond Aunt Bab's powers under such circumstances; and Mike, at her bidding, left the stable and sent his wife to lend a helping hand in this time of need.

As Aunt Bab, wrapped in her morning-gown, hurried down to the kitchen, she was met at the foot of the stairs by quiet, composed Ellen, with a laugh upon her face, and the inquiry:

"Miss Bab, where did Miss Kate get that woman yesterday?"

"From the office of the Domestic Help Society," replied Aunt Bab, with breathless eagerness. "But why? They recommended her most highly! They said they had never had such an one before!"

"I don't believe they have," answered Ellen, quietly. "Go down and look at her, Miss Bab."

Aunt Bab went, and rolled into a heap in one corner of the kitchen, laid the queen of cooks, the wonder-working Betty—as sick as woman well could be, and redolent of whiskey. Horrified and disgusted, Mike and Tom were called in to carry her to her bed, while Ellen, with little Mary's help, prepared the breakfast for "the ladies," as well as her husband's—for the Lodge was but a few rods off.

Betty was decidedly here-de-combat until the latter part of the afternoon, when she staggered out, broke two plates, and went back to bed again, leaving Aunt Bab firmly resolved to send her back to town the next morning by the first train. This, however, proved to be a thing more easily said than done, for the next morning found her in the same helpless condition, evidently the result of a fresh angle of, the "attack," and the question now arose, "where did she get it?"

The servants, male and female, indignantly resented the insinuation that they had brought it on it, and the nearest place from which she could obtain it herself was fully two miles off—while it was well known that she had not left the house for days since she came into it, not having been in a condition so, to do, and Aunt Bab herself had seen every door locked and taken out every key at night. It was a mystery, yet none the less a fact, however, that she did get ill—for, for a whole week, every morning found her on the kitchen floor, to which she had fallen in the vain attempt to go to work.

But not it was Aunt Bab's turn to have a sick headache, and fearing to disturb the rest of the family, she stole noiselessly by the moonlight to the medicine chest in the store-room in search of her usual remedy. But as she passed the open window at the head of the stairs, the click of the gate-latch caught her ears, and she paused cautiously out. The mystery was unravelled. There stood Betty, with a black bottle under each arm and one protruding from her pocket, besides being unmistakably freighted inwardly already. Looking from window to window to make sure that there were no eyes upon her movements, she staggered in, closed the gate without latching it, and made her way to the window of her bedroom on the ground floor which she had left open, apparently, for convenience. Leaning in she first deposited her cargo, piece by piece, on the table so she could more easily making what is technically called "a long step," squeezed herself through the narrow space, which she afterwards closed, inch by inch, and at intervals, that the sound might not attract the attention of any listening ear.

Morning found her again in the old place, with a face the color of mahogany, and now, not only Aunt Bab, but less excitable lookers-on, began to be afraid that she might die in a fit upon their hands.

A sentinel was stationed on the road to stop the doctor on his way to visit a patient in the neighborhood, and Aunt Bab waited the door demanding of imaginary advisers:

"What shall I do? What shall I do?"

At last, to the relief of all parties, the doctor came, and was at once led down to see his patient. With a calm smile, but without a word, he walked out to the kitchen yard, took from Mary's hand a pail of fresh, cold water, just drawn from the well, and then walking back again, deliberately gave Betty the contents upon her head and body.

The whiskey was washed away, and Betty's tongue unchained. Starting up, she poured out upon the doctor's devoted head the most voluminous and wrath that might have occasioned a less composed individual no small alarm; for the breaking of his name and the turning of the house over his head, were the most insignificant of its items; and she finally wound up with the declaration that "she would go back to one of the ladies o' the Sixty an tell em what a black-hearted set they had sent her among."

The morning gave her time enough to return to the "ladies," though after, if they took her again, they had been duly notified what they were taking. Hearing observing Aunt Bab's disconcerted dread that some part of Betty's rem,arks might fall upon her, he took upon himself the responsibility of the latter, ordered Mike to take her to the depot, to keep hold of her there until the next train came down, and then put her into the hands of the conductor, together with a note which he would have ready for him; and then smiled to Aunt Bab the necessity of sending immediately to the latter of the "Domestic Help Society" a notification of the woman's character and conduct, that she might not again compromise them.

"Miss Kate" was accordingly once more dispatched, and found "the ladies" very anxious to hear what she had to tell them, but by no means surprised.

"They were aware," as the lady in attendance admitted, "that such was the woman's fault; but hoping that, so far removed from the temptation, she would have no opportunity of indulging, and therefore might eventually outlive the habit, they had not thought it worth while to prejudice strangers against her by saying anything about it."

It was Aunt Bab's first and last trial of the "moral" prodigies of the "Domestic Help Society;" how she fared in other quarters must be told at another time.

THE "HOLY PLACES."—Our readers will be as much surprised to hear as we were to, upon going to the terraced housetop early after our arrival, that things are at great gap in the open space around building, which they naturally considered the most sacred of any. We asked for an explanation, and were told in reply that France wished to repair it; Russia and Austria say it is England, and, of course, indifferent; but the Sultan was anxious to have a finger in the pie, and the Christian Powers were unwilling that the fellow should participate, and thus have a finger in the sacred edifice; or between the three, it was allowed to fall into a state of dilapidation, which, if it occurred to a public building in England, would call forth the interference of that despotic power, the police, under Sir Rushing Ash.

THE LADY AND THE PIRATES.

IN the month of October, 1854, Miss Fanny Loviot, a young French lady, took passage on board a Chilian brig at Hong-Kong, bound for San Francisco, whither she was proceeding to join a sister established in that city. Adventurous and enterprising by nature, Miss Loviot had joined with a fellow-countrywoman in some commercial speculations, which had taken her to China, and detained her there some time, and her experiences in that country are described by her in a narrative of considerable interest.

The vessel in which she embarked was a fine brig of eight hundred tons burden, commanded by Captain Hoong, a Portuguese. Her crew, fellow-travellers were a good-natured Chinese merchant, named Than-Sing, and an American supercargo. Nothing occurred during their passage they were overtaken by the typhoon, that wind so dangerous to vessels in the Indian Ocean and China seas. In which moment the mizzen and mainmast were snapped asunder, while the vessel labored until the following day in imminent danger of foundering. Then the storm at last subsided, it was succeeded by a dead calm, which rendered the ship almost entirely helpless. With the utility the captain commenced cutting away the boisted to the foremast, and in that position they waited for a return of the wind.

It was not cut by equipments of terror of ship-wreck, Miss Loviot now retired to her berth. "I was so fatigued," she says, "that I could have slept upon the planks, or even from her on a sack of down, and my sleeping-place appeared to me the most delightful in the world. I hoped to enjoy for at least ten hours the calm sleep of the night, but I had no sooner lain down than I dropped into a deep slumber."

Some time afterwards she was awakened by a strange outcry, and found the little cabin filled with a singular reddish light. Convinced that the ship was on fire, she sprang from her couch, and rushed towards the door. The captain and the American were standing on the threshold, apparently unable as yet to comprehend the situation. Meanwhile the outcry which had disturbed her increased, while fragments of stone and iron were falling through the skylight, and a strong reflection of light were reflected through the gloom. Clinging frantically to the captain, Miss Loviot exclaimed:

"The ship is on fire! Captain, do you not hear? What noise is that?"

"I do not know," replied the captain, as, rushing into his cabin, he quickly returned with a loaded revolver in his hand, the only weapon of defence on board.

At this instant the mate of the vessel came, rushing towards them. Too much terrified to hear what he said, Miss Loviot now returned to her cabin, and climbed to the window, which commanded a view of the sea, and there, by the red glare of torches without, she beheld a crowd of human forms. The vessel was surrounded by her in an instant. In their helpless condition they had become surrounded by pirates, those terrible freebooters which then infested the waters, of whose deeds of wanton cruelty are the subject of so many fearful stores. The ship and crew were entirely at their mercy. Without opposition to them, and upwards of one hundred men were now busily engaged in the hold, turning everything in the vessel topsy-turvy. The wretched crew, and the light, which they had taken for fire, was occasioned by the bursting of fireballs, which, according to their custom, the pirates cast on the deck to frighten them.

At the captain, the supercargo, and the mate made a desperate effort to go on board. They opposed them, but they were driven back by the flaming balls, and compelled to retreat and conceal themselves. Through a small window they could now witness the proceedings of their assailants. Seen by the hurried light of the fires, they looked more savage. In addition to their ordinary costume, except that they were red turbans, and round their waists had rood leathern belts, holding pistols and cutlasses. Among these arms, each man carried in his hand a sword.

"At the sight of this," says Miss Loviot, "I thought my last hour was at hand. Crawling on my hands and knees, I hid myself near the door of trance, where I was scarcely able to breathe, a prey to the most horrible anxiety. In which moment I was thrown into a state of almost insensibility, and mainmast were snapped asunder, while the vessel labored until the following day in imminent danger of foundering. Then the storm at last subsided, it was succeeded by a dead calm, which rendered the ship almost entirely helpless. With the utility the captain commenced cutting away the boisted to the foremast, and in that position they waited for a return of the wind.

It was not cut by equipments of terror of ship-wreck, Miss Loviot now retired to her berth. "I was so fatigued," she says, "that I could have slept upon the planks, or even from her on a sack of down, and my sleeping-place appeared to me the most delightful in the world. I hoped to enjoy for at least ten hours the calm sleep of the night, but I had no sooner lain down than I dropped into a deep slumber."

Some time afterwards she was awakened by a strange outcry, and found the little cabin filled with a singular reddish light. Convinced that the ship was on fire, she sprang from her couch, and rushed towards the door. The captain and the American were standing on the threshold, apparently unable as yet to comprehend the situation. Meanwhile the outcry which had disturbed her increased, while fragments of stone and iron were falling through the skylight, and a strong reflection of light were reflected through the gloom. Clinging frantically to the captain, Miss Loviot exclaimed:

"The ship is on fire! Captain, do you not hear? What noise is that?"

"I do not know," replied the captain, as, rushing into his cabin, he quickly returned with a loaded revolver in his hand, the only weapon of defence on board.

At this instant the mate of the vessel came, rushing towards them. Too much terrified to hear what he said, Miss Loviot now returned to her cabin, and climbed to the window, which commanded a view of the sea, and there, by the red glare of torches without, she beheld a crowd of human forms. The vessel was surrounded by her in an instant. In their helpless condition they had become surrounded by pirates, those terrible freebooters which then infested the waters, of whose deeds of wanton cruelty are the subject of so many fearful stores. The ship and crew were entirely at their mercy. Without opposition to them, and upwards of one hundred men were now busily engaged in the hold, turning everything in the vessel topsy-turvy. The wretched crew, and the light, which they had taken for fire, was occasioned by the bursting of fireballs, which, according to their custom, the pirates cast on the deck to frighten them.

At the captain, the supercargo, and the mate made a desperate effort to go on board. They opposed them, but they were driven back by the flaming balls, and compelled to retreat and conceal themselves. Through a small window they could now witness the proceedings of their assailants. Seen by the hurried light of the fires, they looked more savage. In addition to their ordinary costume, except that they were red turbans, and round their waists had rood leathern belts, holding pistols and cutlasses. Among these arms, each man carried in his hand a sword.

"At the sight of this," says Miss Loviot, "I thought my last hour was at hand. Crawling on my hands and knees, I hid myself near the door of trance, where I was scarcely able to breathe, a prey to the most horrible anxiety. In which moment I was thrown into a state of almost insensibility,

Meanwhile, the pirates were ransacking the vessel for plunder. Some of them came up to their unhappy female captive, to bid her by signs to observe the chains with which her companions were loaded. One wretch passed the back of his cold sabre blade along her throat, almost killing her with terror; but while in this state the kindly Than-Sing touched her on the shoulder and whispered:

"Do not be afraid. Their object is only to frighten you, but you should attempt to set your companions at liberty."

The captives were now taken before the pirate chief, who interrogated them as to their names, country, and condition in life. After which the sailors were unchained to work the ship, and the pirate chief ordered them to make for a neighboring bay. Finding from that act the least sign of revolt, which indeed was hopeless, as they were unarmed, all would be slaughtered without mercies. Captain Hoong, the supercargo, and Miss Loviot, being useless in the working of the ship, were left on the upper deck, in the company of the wretched sailor. The weather had now become more misty and colder, and ill-clad as they were, the unfortunate captives suffered severely. Their captors, however, were not wholly indifferent to their miseries, but had sufficient compassion to cover them with a few mats and pieces of canvas. Shortly afterwards, the heard the sound of falling chains, and the anchor was cast again.

Contrary to their expectations of the crew, the pirates offered them no violence, but seemed only intent on stripping the vessel of all that was valuable, and this occupied the whole of the following day. At dawn, the next morning, some of the sailors rushed on deck, crying out:

"The pirates are gone!"

A sudden hope possessed them all, but it was of short duration. The pirates were indeed leaving them, but a new danger was hearing down upon them with all sail set. For a quarter of an hour they were left alone on the wreck of their vessel, during which the following explained to them that the small junks were making off with their booty, lest it should be taken from them by the new comers. It was, therefore, clear that these new enemies were more powerful, and perhaps fiercer, than the others. Miss Loviot improved the captain to give her some disguise, and he kindly furnished her with a shirt, a pair of trousers, and a Chinese jacket; while one of the sailors gave her his cap, under which she hastily gathered up her long, fair locks. Some time afterwards surrounded the vessel, and as the latter lay concealed below, they could hear them on deck and in the hold, ransacking the vessel of what articles still remained. The first junks having conveyed away but a small part of their booty, the pirates of the new fleets found abundance of valuables remaining; and they were, therefore, too busy in plundering the vessel to take heed of the unfortunate concealed aboard. Soon afterwards each of the junks as had obtained a sufficient share of plunder, dropped away, and set sail for their own haunts, in which they were in the habit of lurking. Captain Rooney and his companions now dreaded lest their story of providential escape was entirely removed, and their fears soon appeared to be only too well grounded. A sack of rice, and a small bag of biscuit, were all that remained. They were completely destitute. For more than two days they had scarcely eaten anything, and faint with exhaustion, they threw themselves up in despair.

That night the pirates left the vessel for awhile, but a small junk was still lying alongside. A desperate scheme was formed by the captain and mate to lower the jolly-boat, which was still hanging amidships; to board and capture the junk, and surprise and overpower its crew, and then make an effort to escape to Macao, which in the opinion of Than-Sing, was not more than twelve miles distant. Before any of them proceeded to capturing the junk, they knew that they would in all probability be overtaken during the night by other pirates. The necessary boat they had obtained possession of the pirate vessel, would kill them without mercy. Miss Loviot then proposed that their absence by a desperate attempt of escaping in the jolly-boat, and trusting to their fate to reach the mainland. It was accordingly determined that the attempt should be emptied at daybreak, which it was half-filled, and lowered into the water. The men worked with great activity, and when they had completed the lightening of the boat, when, to their intense disappointment, they discovered that several planks had started in the bottom of the boat, which was then rendered unseaworthy. Discouraged as they were, the sailors persisted in the attempt, and covered them with mats. A moment more, convinced them that the attempt was hopeless. The boat was already half full of water, and the impossibility of making it afloat at sea was being when loaded with sailors became evident to all.

On the following day, no pirates coming aboard, the sailors set to work industriously to repair the jolly-boat, which was their only hope of escape. Their task required at least eight or ten hours of incessant labor, and their only hope was in the non-appearance of the pirates. Fortunately the greater part of the day passed, and no sail was yet visible. Meanwhile all toiled without food or rest. At length the boat, and a paddle were made, a kind of sail made out of the pieces of sail-cloth that lay about the deck. All their rigging had been taken away or cut. They were conferring to make some bamboo canes serve the purpose of ropes. All was at length complete, and they were preparing to lower their boats once more, when two junks suddenly hove in sight, apparently bearing down upon them. Hastily bidding the traces of their preparations, they were now compelled again to take refuge in their cabins and there await what might happen. The pirates, who now came aboard, once more searched the wreck, but without injuring the crew; and, having made an unsuccessful attempt to set fire to it, departed. The boat was now lowered with difficulty, and the captain, crew and passengers, twenty-two in number, including Miss Loviot, put off. From the moment of their starting, two sailors were constantly occupied in baling out the water which made its way through a leak in the bottom of the jolly-boat; the sail proved useless; and rowing, weak and wearied as they were, made no way against the sea. Their sculls, rudely fashioned from the day, were too heavy for their purpose; while the waves, constantly washed over them, threatened to engulf their frail bark. In addition, a fresh wind north wind blew against them, benumbing the fingers of the rowers; and after proceeding about three miles in this manner, they were compelled, from sheer fatigue; and to their great discouragement, drift back towards the wreck, where, after awhile, they were again compelled to take refuge.

Worn out with fatigue and hunger, Miss Loviot once more threw herself down upon the deck of the dismantled vessel, and soon fell asleep. On awakening early on the morning, she found herself in the midst of a group of armed Chinese, who commenced the Europeans to the cabin, where the chief of the party received them, through Than-Sing, that Captain Rooney was to be forwarded to Hong-Kong, there to negotiate for ransoming the male inmates of the vessel, while Miss Loviot in the meantime the lady and Than-Sing must remain as hostages. The latter were accordingly placed in a small boat, with two armed men, and sent off, dispatched on his errand. Day after day Miss Loviot remained in this dismal captivity, hourly expecting her return with the ransom, and an end to her existence. Half starved, and confined in a loathsome part of the hold, amid vermin of every kind, she gradually sank into a state of misery. During this period, the junk attacked another merchantman, and again the same horrible war cries and fearful scenes of bloodshed were heard by the brig. Sometimes the pirates came down to observe her misery, and appeared to take a wanton delight in tormenting her with menaces and insults. At others, with a strange caprice, they allowed her to ascend to the deck with her companion, and gave them to observe the movements of the junks. On one occasion, finding an old book in German characters in the hold, the relic of some former act of piracy, Miss Loviot, in the agony of her night some day fall into the hands of Europeans, took a hair-pin from her hair and scratched in it as well as she could, the following words: "I have been captured by Chinese pirates, and am detained a prisoner by them. I am a French woman, and was a passenger on board the Portugal. This is my seventh day in the junk—Fanny Loviot."

At length deliverance came. The junk was chased by another merchantman, and finally closed over their heads, when Miss Loviot and the faithful companion of her captivity, were transferred on board of their preserver's vessel. Than-Sing listened awhile, and then leaning forward, whispered, "Hush! they are going. There is a boat coming towards them." Soon afterwards the trap was raised by some one from without. It was the ship's cook. "Do not be afraid," he said to them. "There is a steamer bearing down on us. You are saved!" The news proved correct, and in a short time, Miss Loviot and her fellow captives were on board the English vessel. It appeared that on the news of the capture of the Caldera being conveyed to Hong-Kong, Admiral Sir William Hall, the British vessel of war the Sparta, with twenty-four marines on company with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Packet Company's vessel, the Lady Mary Wood, in quest of the pirates. These vessels, however, had returned without finding them; and a second expedition was organized in the Ann, which was the name of the vessel which conveyed the fugitive them. Accident had alone directed the captain to steer in the direction of the mountain under cloister of which the pirates were lurking, when he chanced to anchor. Miss Loviot was soon landed at Hong-Kong; kind friends and sympathizers furnished her with a new outfit, and the means of proceeding to Europe, where she arrived without further accident.

HINTS TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—A writer "On Furnishing," in London Society, gives these hints as to the proper and tasteful furnishing of rooms:

Our theory is that no one thing should catch the eye. Each should be in harmony with the whole. We would recommend that great attention be paid to the color of the walls. If they be chaste, and the paper be one well selected, all other points of detail are like the finishing touches to a picture. The right color, when properly attained, the rest is comparatively easy.

For a room having narrow, light green and pale mauve to work up well, and the less pattern there is in the paper the better; indeed, we prefer that some stamp of paper is desired. If the room faces the south, a cool gray or mauve is useful. And for a north room we have seen a yellowish green answer admirably, imparting to it the warm appearance of sunshine.

As a rule, we have found it best to avoid reds, except a shade like red wood, which is admirable. Blue is a dangerous color to use. It is up to make a room look cold, but if used with judgment it is beautiful when used with pink to give a Pompadour look.

For anyone who loves to make extensive patterns, and generally avoid those which are flowery, as being very hard to match.

As to the arrangement of the furniture it is difficult to say much, and indeed the disposal upon each individual. But we have generally found it desirable to keep the centre of the room free, and the space left is not quite free, and to eschew a round table. If we must have one we recommend that the centre be covered with cretonne—anywhere but in the middle.

We once asked a lady who was conspicuous for the excellent taste displayed in her rooms, to tell us where she got her secret lay, and she said she invariably made it a rule never to employ any one person exclusively. She bought what she wanted wherever she could find it, and certainly the result was perfect. There was a harmony and a variety that was most pleasing.

A COUNTRY PAPER once said: "E. B. Doolittle is in the habit of stealing pigs and robbing hen-roosts. If he does not desist, we will publish his name." This is equal to the minister at a camp meeting, who said: "If the lady with the blue hat, and blue ostrich feather, don't stop talking, she will be pointed out to the congregation."

RECONSTRUCTION—A STORY OF THE TIME.

A STORY OF THE TIME.

A BALLAD.

BY M. ELIZABETH PERRY.

The lace of filmy curtain
Floated over a rose,
Which threw on its snowy neighbors
A shower of opal glows.

And so they kissed and courted,
Wantoning with every breeze
That ruffled the sweet syringas,
Or flouted the jealous trees.

Two voices sang in the garden.
And both were equally lately that she was always quiet and perfectly serious in her manner to him. He had noticed that even when, in unguarded moments, he had let slip a ridiculously high-flown phrase in the form of a compliment or entreaty to be allowed to do some service for her, she never smiled at him—never even smiled at him. Sometimes he longed for her to talk lightly and banteringly, as she had done to Anthony before their engagement; at others he threw all sorts of flattering conclusions, and thrilled with pleasure when he saw her suddenly cease laughing or conversing as he entered the room.

This morning he looked with a troubled face at the calm, grave eyes that turned upon him as he uttered his compliment. It seemed to him that she was studying him; and of all things in the world, Richard Stouth hated being studied.

"I did not congratulate you, Mr. Stouth," answered Clarissa, in a voice as collected as her face, "because, from what papa told me, I thought you must be almost weary of congratulations by this time."

"How can I be weary of anything that may, perhaps, raise me a hair's-breadth nearer—nearer your esteem? But, of course, I know why you are silent. You do not think me worthy of the honor I have received."

"I am not going to take upon myself to judge magistrates, Mr. Sleuth."

Mr. Sleuth sighed, over that remark for some little time. It might mean contempt, or it might mean only a charming humility.

"You, Miss Pompeus, of all people," he said, "should not be hard upon me, considering that my first office against my brother magistrates has been committed for your sake."

She looked at him, gravely questioning.

"Those two rogues of poachers," went on Sleuth, "that whose names the noble Anthony so rejoiced, I have had them set free this morning."

She drooped her face a little. Sleuth saw that its pale color had grown brighter. Then the eyes looked up at him again.

"Have you indeed done this, Mr. Sleuth?"

He laughed—a little, happily, he fancied.

"You will not doubt, Miss Pompeus, soon, when you hear the whole county crying shame on me for it."

"I thought you told my father you considered they richly deserved punishment."

"And did I?"

"Why, then, have you let them go?"

"Can you ask? Did I not see your face when we were told, about those poor, starving wretches' families? Did I not almost envy them at that instant? Fore vetches as they are, would I not willingly have changed places with them for the instant to feel that that sigh—that tear of pity was for me?"

"I see nothing in the world to pity you for, Mr. Sleuth, but," holding out her hand, "accept my most sincere thanks, which I really owe you, if this charitable deed was done on my account; though, to tell you the truth, I believe it is only your modesty makes you say so, and that you may really attribute it to your own kindness of heart."

"You are very pleased, then, by what I have done?"

"I am, indeed."

"Well!" with a deep sigh, "that is something. And now," another deeper sigh, "I suppose I must go back!"

As he spoke of important business, I will not try to detain you," said Clarissa.

"Good-bye, then. I am glad to have pleased you—very glad."

"Good morning, Mr. Sleuth."

When he had gone a dozen yards or so he turned, and took a look at her, as she was looking down the river, and her face was tender and pensive. Was she thinking of him—of what he had done for her sake?

Oh no, Richard Sleuth; only of a little dairy, that would be withered and grimy by now—a little rustic bridge, under which she has passed and gone down with the tide to seek him, and which has about as much chance of reaching him as the tender thought that made her throw it on the barge.

At the gates of Eddington Lodge Mr. Sleuth met the postman, who gave him a letter. He opened it as he rode slowly up the carriage drive, and read as follows:

Dunwold, Cumberland, 10th April.

Dearest Richard,—A chance, at last, is given me to journey to London, and I am sure that happiness at the thoughts of seeing you, I cannot attempt to write anything like a letter. In great haste, good-night.

Ever fondly yours,

Belinda Courthorne.

P.S.—I shall come to your house when I suppose I shall easily find. Don't be apprehensive—I shall come veiled, and merely announce myself as a lady wishing to see you on business. About two in the afternoon of Friday expect me.

CHAPTER LVII.—A VISITOR TO THE NEW HOUSE.

Mr. Sleuth sat in the study of his new house, which is so happily placed for observation that it is almost impossible for any person to approach without the master's being able to see them, should he happen to be looking out. Again and again, in adapting Anthony's plans to his own notion of things, Sleuth had puzzled the architect by his continued fussiness about the situation of this room, and more than one alteration had taken place in consequence. The architect explained the fact as being owing to his notion of the rigor the new owner meant to introduce into his domestic administration.

And even now, while Mr. Sleuth is busy writing letters, going through accounts, and doing both as if time were an object to him, he exhibits a habit, evidently common with him. It is that of rising from his work, perhaps with his papers in his hand, going to the window, looking across the park-like distance, with eyes open to one, considering he is not twenty miles from London—and then going back, as if he had had no object whatever in the movement, but that it was a mere habit.

Usually he even writes close to the window, and he has a small table placed there ready for occasional use, but at other times his great table in the centre is too useful—with its accommodation in size for documents, and its drawers for stowing away—for him to leave it.

This morning, however, when the deep sounds of the clock in the tower strike eleven, he does look out of the window, as he expects of some one; but, strange to say, with less of that hungry inquisitiveness of face which was visible before the time for the appointment had come. It is that the thought of the murder still haunts the successful man? Is he ever unconsciously looking for the traces of blood, and therefore finds all known facts as to visitors involve some sort of relief?

"There he is! Punctual as the clock!" Sleuth exclaims, as he sees a carriage—one of his own which he had sent, to direct the expected visitor, the gardener's boy put on his hat, and drive round to the front door. Then he rises, and strolls out into the hall to meet him, and there waits.

And this is now the home of the chemist's assistant! He stands in a hall that literally gleams, wherever you look, with gold. The tall bronze candelabra are gorgeous, and so are those with gold. The massive banisters that wind up the grand staircase, and reach, by successive flights, to the top, and end in a gorgeous skylight, full of painted glass—this also carries the eye from spot to spot of burnished, massive gold. The Persian coat of arms, for which Sleuth has paid heavily to have all due researches made, and absolute correctness ensured, with "supporters" on either side of the shield—who, when a boy, hardly knew how to point to a single decently respectable relative—have all the noble appearance of rich, dead gold, which come out finely in the subdued light of the place. Lastly, a screen divides the principal hall from a lesser vestibule outside; and this screen—of the very richest workmanship in details of form, tying, indeed, with the screens of old cathedrals—is of the most rich material—dead bronze, brightened into gold at particular and salient parts.

It has been a particular pleasure to Sleuth that, while he found himself unable to improve, in an architectural point of view, upon Anthony's designs, he could improve in point of sheer expenditure; and thus the modest house on which Anthony had intended to expend not more than £2,000, has cost nearly £10,000.

"I can afford it," says Sleuth; as he looks round on what had only been very lately thinnish. "I can afford it, and it is worth it to give no position in the eyes of the world. I'd rather they'd think of my house than of me, yet awhile. Ha! Rollings, very glad to see you!"

Mr. Rollings, who has entered, with a green bag in his hand, bowing very low and frequently, was the lawyer who had succeed ed Mr. Stamp in the position of legal adviser to the owner of the alderman's property. Sleuth's instinct had told him, not only at the time of the discovery of the codicil, but on closer acquaintance, that he was no favorite with Mr. Stamp, and that Anthony was. Hence the change.

Sleuth led the way into the study, and threw himself into an imposing-looking chair—a new one he has just had home to do honor to the magnificence of his new house. Mr. Rollings, who will often sit there to hear private cases.

"Well, Rollings, the dead really?"

"Yes, sir," with a deep bow, in a frightened manner—his usual one—owing, apparently, to a nervous affliction of some kind.

Mr. Rollings, who, as a rule, did not impress one favorably. He was so very slavish, that the Sleuth of to-day rather disgusted in his own mind with the obsequious Sleuth of three years ago, not knowing, perhaps, that it was he who had changed most, and as we have seen, for the better. But as this change had made Sleuth less timid, more exacting, more loud-voiced and imperious, it naturally made Mr. Rollings—who desired, of all things, to keep his most valuable client—less able to esteem his soul as his own in his client's presence, and in his client's gorgeous house.

Sleuth took the deed from the lawyer, glanced rapidly over it, and said:

"Any alterations since the rough copy?"

"No, sir, no. Just as you left it."

"I see you didn't fill in any sum."

"No, sir. I—I—really you hesitated a little whether it should be fifty or a hundred a year, we'd fill it in now!"

"What do you think, Rollings?"

"Fifty pounds a year—that's a good deal of money, Mr. Sleuth, to give away, without a valuable consideration in return. I think you said that was so?"

"Can't you listen when one speaks? Didn't I tell you, sir, plainly enough, that the only consideration, as you call it, is this: I did, in a sort of idle way, talk to her before I knew I should be the alderman's heir; and one thing, with a pretty girl, you know, leads to another; and so, between ourselves, I must own, marriage, even, was talked of."

"But no engagement in writing?"

"Not only no engagement, but I took care not to give her in black and white even a single letter that could be made to mean more at the worst than a love business."

"And no witness to testify anything?"

"Confound you, Rollings! What an idiot you are! Is it likely I'd keep off letters, and then go and fetch half-a-dozen people to be witnesses whenever I had anything to say to her?"

"No, no! I was wrong! Pardon me. It was a very foolish thought."

"What I asked you was, would you recommend fifty pounds or a hundred pounds for the annuity?"

"Yes, sir, yes; I understand. Let me see; fifty pounds! Why that, at the present price of consols, will cost between three and four thousand pounds! Why there isn't a jury in the kingdom, I should think, that would give her more, even if she pursued you by action at law and succeeded."

"Don't know about that, Rollings. Unluckily, everybody knows that I am worth. If she were really able to establish a claim, I'm afraid they'd give her a big slice out of my hundred and seventy thousand pounds. But your idea is a good one. I'll use it. She can't prove anything; so it's not by any means a bad thought to suggest. I'll give her almost as much as she could probably get, even if she were able to prove a good deal. I shall put in the fifty pounds."

"Quite enough! Quite enough, in all conscience, sir. Besides——"

"D—n it, Rollings, how can I write while you keep chattering in this way? Don't you think, after all, as I can afford it, I'd better make it a hundred once for all? That, you see, is not a great deal more than half of eight thousand pounds."

"If you please, sir."

"Please! as if I didn't know that! I want your advice, Mr. Rollings, and you tell me I may do as I please. How good of you!"

"Well, sir, if I must speak—" and Mr. Rollings evidently began to have the dignity of the profession must be stood up for at some time or other, and that perhaps, that unpleasant and dangerous time had come—"I think, sir, that speak on so delicate a subject, then I say that, if from no other motive——"

"Motive! What do you mean by that? What motive could I have?"

Sleuth spoke in a low and rapid tone, and the lawyer could not for the life of him tell what was the matter; unless, indeed, Sleuth had deceived him about Phillis, and that the desertion of her was not the only injury she had to demand redress for at his hands. But the lawyer thought to himself that clients like Sleuth don't usually stand on delicacy in such things when they are obliged to take counsel of the profession; so he didn't know what to make of the unquestionable agitation his very harmless question had produced. He finally settled the matter by saying, in the accent of—"He's in an awful temper about something; and, I suppose, that's all."

To his surprise, Sleuth did put in a hundred, and not fifty; and then, when Sleuth saw that surprise, he reflected a little again, and took an ivory crossing knife from his desk—one of those long-handled instruments with an immovable blade at the end, sharpened to a point—and scratched out the £50, and finally put in £100.

They were interrupted by a loud ringing of the bell.

"Good-bye, Rollings. Go into the dining-room. Don't stand on ceremony. Call for what you like; but excuse my saying don't be long, for this is an awkward moment. I expect it is time."

"Not the young person herself?"

"She."

"Really! I'll take a hurried snack, and be off."

Sleuth began to erect himself, and collect his thoughts; and so powerful is habit, or so strong still was the fear of Phillis, that he looked hastily at his clothes and general appearance, as he might have done in the old love-making days, and he wished, even amid all his perplexity, if she were more or less good-looking than she was.

A lady, in dark, rich silk, with her face concealed by a long black veil, was introduced, in accordance with special instructions, by a servant, who, strange to say, was in plain black, and not in the usual garb of menial glory, which shone out very strongly indeed in Mr. Sleuth's mansion.

Mr. Sleuth, under a kind assurance, for on the winding up to-day of a popular neighboring fair, he has given, unasked, leave to the whole of his domestics to go to it, with the exception of his confidential butler, and an old woman, who had come up from the lodge where her son resides. Sleuth advanced with his great, kind hand, which does not answer that bow, but thrusts back the veil, and cries in a low, but glad and earnest, and very sweet voice:

"Richard!"

What can he do but kiss her in welcome? It is awkward—very—considering that he has got to do, but he has thought all that out, and has decided it would be inhuman, and not at all proper, to attempt to act a part.

And then, as they stood there—she looking his hand within her own trembling figures, and gazing so inquiringly, lovingly, trustingly in his face—he sees she is really much better looking than when she went away. Indeed, she is beautiful—she is very beautiful. Her beauty, indeed, is one of which Sleuth can perfectly appreciate—almost scarce him from his purpose.

She is, moreover, ready, to be looked up to, as Phillis now looks up at him, though he, as if in modesty, says:

"You don't take any notice of my new house."

"Richard, I know it is very splendid, but I haven't seen anything yet but you, and could think of nothing since I crossed the threshold but you, and wonder if you would be angry with me for coming upon you so unexpectedly."

Well, Sleuth looked, during just one roll aside

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "BROTHER'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LVI.—AFTER THREE YEARS.

It was April, very fair, bright weather, and Clarissa sat in the garden of Petersham, looking over the river wall, and watching the barges go by, floating with the tide.

Before her, on the river wall, was spread a newspaper, turned at a display of a long paragraphheaded, "Richard Sleuth, Esq., of Eddington Hall." It was an account of that gentleman taking his seat for the first time as magistrate. Her father had left it there for her to read, and, indeed, her slim fingers had taken hold of the edge, and her face was bent over it, but her eyes were watching the barges with a dreamy, idle wonder as to whither they were going. Who knew but what he might be watching them, some long way down the river, and might be thinking of this very wall, under which they passed so close?

As the sun went by she kissed the little dairy that she held, and dropped it on the great black barge, smiling a tearful, sad smile at her folly. But she watched it till a curve in the river hid it from her, and then bent down over the paper, for she thought she heard the doctor coming.

"May I ask why Miss Pompeus tries her beautiful eyes by reading what must be so very uninteresting to her?" said a voice close at her shoulder.

"Good morning, Mr. Sleuth," answered Clarissa, quietly, and keeping her eyes on the paper.

The visitor sat down on the low chair the doctor had left vacant, and, leaning his elbow on the wall, began to study, tenderly and reverentially, the fair face before him.

Certainly the last three years had wrought wonders in Richard Sleuth, Esquire, of Eddington Hall. His courageous and persevering efforts to make himself a gentleman had been crowned with some success. His private tutor had managed to instil with his educational lessons something of the mental attributes of the gentleman. His dancing lessons had made him a little less awkward in his walk and carriage; his taste in dress was quieter; his manners, when he wished to please (which he always did), were a little less gushingly demonstrative.

His ride this morning through the Eddington lanes had given him a color; his eyes were bright and of a little more intense blue than usual, and the tender, sad, imploring smile he had assumed either became him.

"What!" he murmured, presently, in a low, pleading voice (he could be very happy in his low tones than in his high ones); "not one word? and I have left I don't know how much important business for the hope of getting one?"

Clarissa laid the paper down, and lifted her eyes slowly and gravely to his face.

Sleuth had perceived more lately that she was

Dunwold, Cumberland, 10th April.

Dearest Richard,—A chance, at last, is given me to journey to London, and I am sure that happiness at the thoughts of seeing you, I cannot attempt to write anything like a letter. In great haste, good-night.

Ever fondly yours,

Belinda Courthorne.

P.S.—I shall come to your house when I suppose I shall easily find. Don't be apprehensive—I shall come veiled, and merely announce myself as a lady wishing to see you on business. About two in the afternoon of Friday expect me.

CHAPTER LVII.—A VISITOR TO THE NEW HOUSE.

Mr. Sleuth sat in the study of his new house, which is so happily placed for observation that it is almost impossible for any person to approach without the master's being able to see them, should he happen to be looking out. Again and again, in adapting Anthony's plans to his own notion of things, Sleuth had puzzled the architect by his continued fussiness about the situation of this room, and more than one alteration had taken place in consequence. The architect explained the fact as being owing to his notion of the rigor the new owner meant to introduce into his domestic administration.

And even now, while Mr. Sleuth is busy writing letters, going through accounts, and doing both as if time were an object to him, he exhibits a habit, evidently common with him. It is that of rising from his work, perhaps with his papers in his hand, going to the window, looking across the park-like distance, with eyes open to one, considering he is not twenty miles from London—and then going back, as if he had had no object whatever in the movement, but that it was a mere habit.

Usually he even writes close to the window, and he has a small table placed there ready for occasional use, but at other times his great table in the centre is too useful—with its accommodation in size for documents, and its drawers for stowing away—for him to leave it.

This morning, however, when the deep sounds of the clock in the tower strike eleven, he does look out of the window, as he expects of some one; but, strange to say, with less of that hungry inquisitiveness of face which was visible before the time for the appointment had come. Is it that the thought of the murder still haunts the successful man? Is he ever unconsciously looking for the traces of blood, and therefore finds all known facts as to visitors involve some sort of relief?

"There he is! Punctual as the clock!" Sleuth exclaims, as he sees a carriage—one of his own which he had sent, to direct the expected visitor, the gardener's boy put on his hat, and drive round to the front door. Then he rises, and strolls out into the hall to meet him, and there waits.

And this is now the home of the chemist's assistant! He stands in a hall that literally gleams, wherever you look, with gold. The tall bronze candelabra are gorgeous, and so are those with gold. The massive banisters that wind up the grand staircase, and reach, by successive flights, to the top, and end in a gorgeous skylight, full of painted glass—this also carries the eye from spot to spot of burnished, massive gold. The Persian coat of arms, for which Sleuth has paid heavily to have all due researches made, and absolute correctness ensured, with "supporters" on either side of the shield—who, when a boy, hardly knew how to point to a single decently respectable relative—have all the noble appearance of rich, dead gold, which come out finely in the subdued light of the place. Lastly, a screen divides the principal hall from a lesser vestibule outside; and this screen—of the very richest workmanship in details of form, tying, indeed, with the screens of old cathedrals—is of the most rich material—dead bronze, brightened into gold at particular and salient parts.

It has been a particular pleasure to Sleuth that, while he found himself unable to improve, in an architectural point of view, upon Anthony's designs, he could improve in point of sheer expenditure; and thus the modest house on which Anthony had intended to expend not more than £2,000, has cost nearly £10,000.

"I can afford it," says Sleuth; as he looks round on what had only been very lately thinnish. "I can afford it, and it is worth it to give no position in the eyes of the world. I'd rather they'd think of my house than of me, yet awhile. Ha! Rollings, very glad to see you!"

Mr. Rollings, who has entered, with a green bag in his hand, bowing very low and frequently, was the lawyer who had succeed ed Mr. Stamp in the position of legal adviser to the owner of the alderman's property. Sleuth's instinct had told him, not only at the time of the discovery of the codicil, but on closer acquaintance, that he was no favorite with Mr. Stamp, and that Anthony was. Hence the change.

Sleuth led the way into the study, and threw himself into an imposing-looking chair—a new one he has just had home to do honor to the magnificence of his new house. Mr. Rollings, who will often sit there to hear private cases.

"Well, Rollings, the dead really?"

"Yes, sir," with a deep bow, in a frightened manner—his usual one—owing, apparently, to a nervous affliction of some kind.

Mr. Rollings, who, as a rule, did not impress one favorably. He was so very slavish, that the Sleuth of to-day rather disgusted in his own mind with the obsequious Sleuth of three years ago, not knowing, perhaps, that it was he who had changed most, and as we have seen, for the better. But as this change had made Sleuth less timid, more exacting, more loud-voiced and imperious, it naturally made Mr. Rollings—who desired, of all things, to keep his most valuable client—less able to esteem his soul as his own in his client's presence, and in his client's gorgeous house.

Sleuth took the deed from the lawyer, glanced rapidly over it, and said:

"Any alterations since the rough copy?"

"No, sir, no. Just as you left it."

"I see you didn't fill in any sum."

"No, sir. I—I—really you hesitated a little whether it should be fifty or a hundred a year, we'd fill it in now!"

"What do you think, Rollings?"

"Fifty pounds a year—that's a good deal of money, Mr. Sleuth, to give away, without a valuable consideration in return. I think you said that was so?"

"Can't you listen when one speaks? Didn't I tell you, sir, plainly enough, that the only consideration, as you call it, is this: I did, in a sort of idle way, talk to her before I knew I should be the alderman's heir; and one thing, with a pretty girl, you know, leads to another; and so, between ourselves, I must own, marriage, even, was talked of."

"But no engagement in writing?"

"Not only no engagement, but I took care not to give her in black and white even a single letter that could be made to mean more at the worst than a love business."

"And no witness to testify anything?"

"Confound you, Rollings! What an idiot you are! Is it likely I'd keep off letters, and then go and fetch half-a-dozen people to be witnesses whenever I had anything to say to her?"

"No, no! I was wrong! Pardon me. It was a very foolish thought."

"What I asked you was, would you recommend fifty pounds or a hundred pounds for the annuity?"

"Yes, sir, yes; I understand. Let me see; fifty pounds! Why that, at the present price of consols, will cost between three and four thousand pounds! Why there isn't a jury in the kingdom, I should think, that would give her more, even if she pursued you by action at law and succeeded."

"Don't know about that, Rollings. Unluckily, everybody knows that I am worth. If she were really able to establish a claim, I'm afraid they'd give her a big slice out of my hundred and seventy thousand pounds. But your idea is a good one. I'll use it. She can't prove anything; so it's not by any means a bad thought to suggest. I'll give her almost as much as she could probably get, even if she were able to prove a good deal. I shall put in the fifty pounds."

"Quite enough! Quite enough, in all conscience, sir. Besides——"

"D—n it, Rollings, how can I write while you keep chattering in this way? Don't you think, after all, as I can afford it, I'd better make it a hundred once for all? That, you see, is not a great deal more than half of eight thousand pounds."

"If you please, sir."

"Please! as if I didn't know that! I want your advice, Mr. Rollings, and you tell me I may do as I please. How good of you!"

"Well, sir, if I must speak—" and Mr. Rollings evidently began to have the dignity of the profession must be stood up for at some time or other, and that perhaps, that unpleasant and dangerous time had come—"I think, sir, that speak on so delicate a subject, then I say that, if from no other motive——"

"Motive! What do you mean by that? What motive could I have?"

Sleuth spoke in a low and rapid tone, and the lawyer could not for the life of him tell what was the matter; unless, indeed, Sleuth had deceived him about Phillis, and that the desertion of her was not the only injury she had to demand redress for at his hands. But the lawyer thought to himself that clients like Sleuth don't usually stand on delicacy in such things when they are obliged to take counsel of the profession; so he didn't know what to make of the unquestionable agitation his very harmless question had produced. He finally settled the matter by saying, in the accent of—"He's in an awful temper about something; and, I suppose, that's all."

To his surprise, Sleuth did put in a hundred, and not fifty; and then, when Sleuth saw that surprise, he reflected a little again, and took an ivory crossing knife from his desk—one of those long-handled instruments with an immovable blade at the end, sharpened to a point—and scratched out the £50, and finally put in £100.

They were interrupted by a loud ringing of the bell.

"Good-bye, Rollings. Go into the dining-room. Don't stand on ceremony. Call for what you like; but excuse my saying don't be long, for this is an awkward moment. I expect it is time."

"Not the young person herself?"

"She."

"Really! I'll take a hurried snack, and be off."

Sleuth began to erect himself, and collect his thoughts; and so powerful is habit, or so strong still was the fear of Phillis, that he looked hastily at his clothes and general appearance, as he might have done in the old love-making days, and he wished, even amid all his perplexity, if she were more or less good-looking than she was.

A lady, in dark, rich silk, with her face concealed by a long black veil, was introduced, in accordance with special instructions, by a servant, who, strange to say, was in plain black, and not in the usual garb of menial glory, which shone out very strongly indeed in Mr. Sleuth's mansion.

Mr. Sleuth, under a kind assurance, for on the winding up to-day of a popular neighboring fair, he has given, unasked, leave to the whole of his domestics to go to it, with the exception of his confidential butler, and an old woman, who had come up from the lodge where her son resides.

Sleuth advanced with his great, kind hand, which does not answer that bow, but thrusts back the veil, and cries in a low, but glad and earnest, and very sweet voice:

"Richard!"

What can he do but kiss her in welcome? It is awkward—very—considering that he has got to do, but he has thought all that out, and has decided it would be inhuman, and not at all proper, to attempt to act a part.

And then, as they stood there—she looking his hand within her own trembling figures, and gazing so inquiringly, lovingly, trustingly in his face—he sees she is really much better looking than when she went away. Indeed, she is beautiful—she is very beautiful. Her beauty, indeed, is one of which Sleuth can perfectly appreciate—almost scarce him from his purpose.

She is, moreover, ready, to be looked up to, as Phillis now looks up at him, though he, as if in modesty, says:

"You don't take any notice of my new house."

"Richard, I know it is very splendid, but I haven't seen anything yet but you, and could think of nothing since I crossed the threshold but you, and wonder if you would be angry with me for coming upon you so unexpectedly."

Well, Sleuth looked, during just one roll aside

of the eyes, as if that theme might be worth pursuing; but he rejected it, and said:

"No, Phillis, I—I, in fact, am glad you're here. I wanted to see you."

"Did you, Richard? Oh, did you do that? Don't say any more to me just yet."

And Phillis dropped upon a chair, her breast heaving with the tumult of repressed passion; and then she burst out into a fit of hysterical laughter, that drove him almost to frenzy.

He ran about the room to hunt things out from cupboards, he slapped her hands, he wetted her face with water, and was quite out of to see if the old woman was mistress of a smelling-bottle, when she sighed, drew a long breath, and said feebly to him:

"Better, Richard—better."

Sleuth had got ready, obviously for this particular visit, a clean shirt-collar, and a great bunch of hothouse grapes. These he fetched on a silver tray from a cupboard, as if placed there by his own prior refreshment, and put it before Phillis, and made her eat and drink, saying little things the while to comfort her; for he saw, if he did not thus restore her before he began, he would never get successfully through his job, which loomed upon him larger and darker every moment.

He wished now that he had left the hundred a year in the dead, and begun to fear his generosity might need the amount of exaggeration to be taken for generosity.

Phillis, under this treatment, brightened very amazingly—so much so, that she said presently:

"I didn't meet a single servant except the one that brought me here."

"No; there's always a way at a fair."

"Indeed! Well, then, Richard, if you would like me to see the house, now—"

Richard would have very much liked her not to see the house, but he said, promptly:

"To be sure. I'll go over it with you."

And then he went out into the hall, and Phillis looked at that, and seemed to grow nervous as she did so.

"Isn't it too splendid?" she murmured to Sleuth.

He didn't appear to hear the question, but took her into the dining-room, where Phillis, after inspecting the rich morocco of the chairs, and glancing at herself in the mirror on the superb sideboard, and sniffing the opulent drops of the chandelier's shake, and then shaking her own pretty shoulders, and heading with an arch look upward, at a loss to thought her temerity was about to bring down all the noisy, glittering, beautiful things on her head, she went to examine the amber silk curtains, so rich in texture, and that evidently gave her more pleasure than all the rest.

"What room is that beyond?" asked Phillis, looking at a pair of folding doors.

"Oh; it's part of this room. I had it a deal too big for comfort at first, so I ran up a partition, that's all."

"May I look in?' said Phillis, with a kind of playful pretense of believing he had some mystery there.

"Yes, if you like," he said, turning away.

She looked in, and saw what startled her—a portrait of his late partner, one of large size, and showing by the inscription it had been presented to Sleuth by some public body of which the alderman was, in his lifetime, had been a most valuable member.

Phillis wondered again about that division in the room, and this time aroused so ingeniously to keep the alderman in a place of honor, and yet out of sight; and, as the incident recalled many unpleasant things, she regretted her curiosity, and returned to Sleuth, who had waited for her.

She saw, at the first glance of his face, he was annoyed, and that made her still more regret the incident.

But he took her next to the drawing-room. Phillis had seen the small drawing-room before, belonging to grandhouses, but thought she had never seen anything so beautiful as this, with its many windows, all with lace curtains, infinitely more beautiful, so she now thought, than the silk of the dining-room, for they were of the finest conceivable lace, like most charming cobwebs, and more costly than Phillis dared venture even to guess. There was a conservatory at one end, and in it there was a fountain of water at great strength and perennial flow, rising like a rod of silver into the air, only to fall in a graceful shower into the basin on the floor below, from which was full of water lilies. There were small alcoves in the wall, where a pair of lovers might sit, and hear the soft drapery of the little curtains so close as to be all but invisible. The walls seemed to Phillis created out of light and gold, so delicate and luminous they made their surroundments. Couches of the most luxurious shapes were everywhere, and yet seemed to take up no room, so large was the place.

It was with a cry of pleasure Phillis gave her first glance down the length of this beautiful room, which ended in the conservatory; but, somehow, Sleuth did not care to encourage her raptures, and never, apparently, felt so little inclined, as now, to value his house.

But while he was turning over in resolution to the work to be done, he found it seemingly put farther off, by a new and altogether unexpected incident.

"Do you like music, Richard?"

"Yes, very much indeed," he replied, glad to remember Phillis was unable to play.

To his astonishment, she went to the piano, drew out the stool, threw back the fall, and, after a few touches, to enable her to know the instrument, began a piece of music that Sleuth—who had some ear and some taste, though not much of either—thought he had never heard any lady of his acquaintance play with so much spirit.

He was annoyed, yet fascinated.

"Shall I play another piece?" she said.

"Eh?—yes, do," he replied, starting from an absent mood.

The first piece had been one of some refinement and poetic scope. The next was a lively dance tune, to which Sleuth's legs almost itched to caper, and which she gave with such increasing spirit, that, when it suddenly ceased, she burst out into a loud laugh, and catching his hand, made him go through a few steps of the dance. But the mother he thought the whole business was more irritating, mischievous, or piquant; for he couldn't help noticing that Phillis had learned to dance very differently from her old country-dance fashion, and now, amid all the abandon of the reel she had taken with her, had shown a particularly graceful kind of movement.

"Does she guess what's in my brain, I wonder?" he said to himself, as Phillis left the piano and took Phillis's; and the mere question seemed to give a more metallic lustre to his eye, a more fixed accurate cast to his face.

"Do you sing, Richard?"

"No, not I."

"Only a little. You won't laugh at me if I try?"

"Certainly not," said Sleuth, comforting himself with the thought that, after all, it was her affair, not his, all this awkwardness before the great business would have to be done.

And Phillis sang a simple, touching and plaintive voice, that exhibited little musical training, but a good deal of natural taste, "The Last Rose of Summer," which had then just become popular.

When the last faint notes were dying out, Sleuth was saying to himself:

"This will do. She's out-manœuvring me. I must act, or she'll bewitch me out of my own plans."

"Well, Richard," she said, after a significant pause, "I wish I could show you any better use of my time, that's all. I thought I would try to play like Lucy, as you wished her to, although, Richard, I'm not so silly as not to know a lady means more than this, still, there are things one can learn when one is a lady, and things that one can't without showing one's a real lady; and that's what I fancied, Richard, you didn't want me to seem."

"I'll very clear, no doubt, but confoundedly unpleasant, just when Sleuth had got to hand her that deed, and explain how he proposed to wish her a friendly good-by and leave her forever.

It was terribly inconvenient, this stupid exhibition of hers; and, for that matter, her coming altogether. She had wrapped herself up in all things when he had found some months pass without a letter from her. She might have got a good deal from somebody else, and have got into a mess, and compromised her reputation—a God-send indeed to him, as the irreverent gentleman said to himself, not really intending to be so profane.

From the drawing-room they went up the grand staircase, and looked into the bedrooms—all—at each of the superb bedrooms, and so up to the tower, where a narrow, little winding stair led to the roof. The roof, as we have said, was a charming gaze a most extensive panoramic view of the country for nearly thirty miles round, rising and falling in gentle undulations, and high hills of considerable height, and well wooded, and having in the middle ground picturesque scattered villages, with their church towers. Phillis was womanly jealousy, of her own visit being the cause.

"Headache—sitting so long in the courts. Won't you go down now?" he feels slightly cross.

Waiting for no answer, he left the room of the tower and preceded her down the staircase, and to the great hall. Phillis followed him, as though she had no will of her own.

As he was in a certain corridor, and some few yards in advance, she noticed him pull to, in passing, a certain door, which he thought was open. This had been done quickly, as if Sleuth had been thinking she would not notice the gesture—the curious being, for Phillis guessed she did not understand, rather dark, as if some of its lights were temporarily closed. This corridor struck her as the most beautiful passage she had yet been through. What was it for?

Moved by some impulse she did not stop to question, she turned back to look at the door that Sleuth had pulled to. It was dark within—the shutters being closed; but the faint gleams of light revealed some little place like a lady's boudoir, that, in the rich, mysterious gloom, and the faint gleaming of the gold beadings and gilt brackets, and the panelled walls, struck her as a something beyond all she had yet seen.

"Richard!" she called to him, going back to the door for that purpose.

"This way!" he called, and went on in the way he had been going.

"Richard, come to him!" was Phillis's first thought. Her second thought was different, and much more painful and alarming.—"Am I in a delusion all this while?"

She hurried after him, and, with a faint smile, said:

"I feel quite tired."

"You don't seem at all well. What is it? Tell me."

As no person appeared to interrupt them, they talked thus on their way to the study, where still lay the deed on the table, and the knife, covered by the deed, that had been used to erase the first figures Sleuth had put in.

They sat down. Phillis had, on first coming into the house, thrown off her cloak in the hall, but otherwise had not changed her out-door dress. She now sat by the side of the great round table—bonnet on—just as though she were but a casual visitor, and Sleuth did not apparently wish her to put aside her bonnet, or change in any way the strangeness and uncomfortableness of her position.

He sighed deeply and audibly, and seemed lost in thought. Phillis sighed too, but so faintly and flutteringly, that the sigh was quite unheard beyond her own heart. Then she said:

"What is it oppresses you, Richard?"

"Well, I'll tell you, Phillis, though it isn't a subject to be much talked about. Two friends of mine—acquaintances, Phillis—got married a few months ago, and I and everybody and they just would be happy people! But why? Because they didn't, as everybody thought, they loved one another. And so it seemed, just for a bit. But there was one of the two had a secret, and tried to get it kept from the other. Now I tell you the secret was want of love, you won't be long in guessing the other seen found that out. Such secrets don't long be hid, I should say. Yes, he found it out—"

"Oh, he found it out, did he?" said Phillis, with significance unbounded.

But Sleuth went bravely on. He hadn't got to think of her feelings now, but of his own interests. Now, as of yore, everything became so clear at the critical moment when he reminded himself of that.

"Yes, he found it out, poor fellow!"

"You pity him?"

"Yes, I do, Phillis. Don't you?"

"Pray, what is the use of pity? Your friend's story is particularly interesting to me."

"Well, as I was saying, he found it out, and then a scheme—a plot—he had got pressed her to speak, that she had felt, when about to marry, as one then ought not to feel—she had respected him, she had liked him, but she confessed she had not loved him."

"She confessed all that?"

"Yes, she did, poor soul, I gather from the talk of the parties, for they both, by turns, appealed to me."

And then Sleuth reached his hand over to the deed, and drew it towards him, thus exposing the knife.

"Go on, Richard."

"Where was I? Oh, I know. When she confessed that, he reproached her bitterly. It was, I think myself, a hard case. As he said to her, with a terrible sneer, 'Why didn't you tell me before marriage? I forgive you all but that.' Yes, Phillis, those were just his words—'I forgive you all but that.'"

Phillis began to laugh—not hysterically, as before, though there was something about it Sleuth didn't like.

He noticed now that she was sitting so near the little knife, that if he were to stretch out his hand as it seemed to do, he could not help seeing it, while cursing his stupidity for leaving it there, he saw she would be able instantly to possess herself of it; and although he felt he didn't yet know her next one, he could not help fancying that such a gesture on his part might have a sort of fascinating influence upon her, and lead her to seize it.

"Richard, I'm going to ask you an odd question: thinking of it makes me laugh. If, now, I were to tell you that I have a child—a little at this, though feeling qualmish—much more qualmish than he had expected to feel about the whole business.

"I don't know what you mean, Phillis, by talking to me in that way, and looking at me so strangely, and I have no means to know. And what's more, I won't stand it—in my own house, too! If you didn't want to know what I was troubled about, why did you ask me to tell you? If you did want to know, well, then, now you do—and what of it?"

Phillis started to her feet, her face crimson, her eyes darting furious gleams of light, while the tears were at the same time oozing slowly from her eyes. At last she said:

"Now, Phillis, don't be angry. If you hadn't spoken so bitterly, I shouldn't have said what I did. I'm very sorry, indeed, for I want to talk to you a bit. People can't help their inward feelings, can they? But they can act as I want to do—as a gentleman to a lady, as a friend to Phillis, dear, now don't be foolish. Don't turn against your best friend. You don't know how much I have to say to you before I go on and your good. You see this paper? Well, it's for you. Stop a bit; let me speak. No; I will speak. I'll stop your mouth with kisses, I will, indeed, even though you look at me in that way, if you're not still. Well, now, if you are quiet, listen. This is a regular deed for you, for which you have between three and four thousand pounds. Stop, Phillis; don't be in a hurry. I'll hear you presently; but, indeed, I must first speak myself.

"Keep your hands from me, Richard Sleuth. Let me say that!" interjected Phillis.

"Very well, then, I'll not meddle, and listen. This bit of parchment gives you fifty pounds a year. All your own. Single or married."

"Or married," Richard Sleuth—did you say that?"

"Y—yes. It would be unkind, if you could deny it, to take it now, and not at all events, Richard Sleuth isn't the man to do it."

Phillis smiled a wondrously significant smile. If Sleuth had not been fast sunk in his own eloquence, he would have said less and done more. As it was, he went on egotistically, blind and deaf to the warnings of fate:

"Now, then, Phillis, what I want to say to you is this: I don't offer you that deed in a sordid spirit. I don't believe—no, upon my soul I don't believe—that you will think it a real compensation."

"How good of you!" said Phillis, curtseying very low—quite, indeed, to the ground—and rising with a wild ringing laugh, that did begin to waken the dreamer.

"No; I say this to you, which I would say, if it were necessary, to all the world; this lady is one I honor so much, that I would entreat—implore her to marry me to-morrow, did I not know, alas! what a wretch of a husband I should be, with such a secret preying forever upon my heart."

"It was you, then, Richard, you talked so prettily about?"

"Yes, Phillis; it is a real case, the one I told you of. But now, now, Phillis, was it not wise of me, when I heard of it, to investigate rigorously the state of my own affections before I sacrificed the peace and honor of a most exemplary and beautiful, and highly accomplished woman?"

"Peace and honor, then, are both still with me, you think, only you let me alone?"

"I hope so."

"Hyperion!"

"Phillis!"

"Liar!"

"I say, Phillis, this is—"

"Murderer! for I belie——"

His hand on her mouth stops her voice. But Phillis has hands too. She now, vividly seen, even though her head be averted, the deadly glimmer of that small bit of steel, which, for some time, has been before her eyes. She sees it still, as she saw it then. She knows where it is without any more looking for. She glides her left hand rapidly and instinctively along the table—she grasps it, brings it to the other hand; a moment passes, and there is a cry of horror from Sleuth, a cry of triumph from her, and the red blood is pouring from his side.

The cries are heard by the confidential butler, who guesses there is mischief, and runs fast to the study.

As he enters, Sleuth, ghastly pale and sick, is trying to keep himself in an upright position in a chair by the aid of his two arms on the table, but his brain swims, and he would fall but for Phillis's arms as a stay, whose wild face startles him.

"She's mad!" Sleuth feebly whispered to him. "Have her removed-into custody. She's mad!"

Phillis caught the word, and rang it out in repetition with an energy and a piercing shrillness and unearthliness of tone that told that the poor creature was ready to justify the fatal imputation cast on her from her indeed reeling, and life henceforward a mere chaos.

And from that time she sat there, silent, motionless, stiffening as into a statue of stone.

ABOUT DOGS.

Few persons are aware of the value and variety of dogs, varying, as they do, in weight from 180 pounds to half a pound, and in price ranging from about $300 to less than nothing. A description of the different varieties may not be uninteresting. The Siberian bloodhound weighs about 100 pounds, and measures 40 inches in girth, and is worth nearly $300. The St. Bernard dog, which is of a buff or lightish color, is very large and valuable. The Newfoundland dog, when pure, is entirely black, and its pups are worth from $10 to $50. The shepherd dog, or Scotch collie, is essential for its patience, fidelity and bravery. It is worth from $10 to $100. The English mastiff, a good watch dog, is worth from $10 to $25. Of terriers, the black and tan are the best. The Skye terrier, of which the largest scarcely attains to 25 pounds, and increases in value as it decreases in weight. A number of the Skye terrier has one which weighs less than a pound, and is the smallest we have ever seen. It was brought to Paris. The Irish terriers are often crossed with the Italian greyhound, producing a very handsome, but expensive animal. The Scotch terrier is the hardiest of dogs, is very courageous, and is worth from $10 to $25. The Italian greyhound is the rarest and most valuable of hunting dogs. They are worth $100 each. The Spanish pointer is remarkable for docility of England. They are worth $100 each. The Irish setter is a cross of the hound and, of course, partakes of the nature of both. The best sort of rabbit dogs are worth from $25 to $100 each. The Italian greyhound is worth from $50 to $100. The pure breed is rare and valuable, a fine one being worth $150.

There is a great variety of pointers, setters and spaniels. The Prince Charles variety is the most valuable of the spaniels, and is supposed to have come from Spain, where a similar breed exists. He has a round head, short, silky ears, large full eyes, long silky coats and tan color, and never weighs over ten pounds. They have been sold in England at auction, and have brought as high as $2,000 each. The coach dog is from Dalmatia, and is worth from $10 to $50 each. Cuban dogs and Esquimaux dogs were brought here by Dr. Kane, and are worth from $10 to $50 each. The Bedlam Hospital, at West Philadelphia. They are fox-like in shape, and remarkable for sagacity and docility. They are worth more in fortune than any other dog. Most of the dogs about our streets are spurious, and are not even half breeds.

CONFESSIONS OF A SUICIDE.

An old man, who committed suicide by strangulation, in Paris, lately, left the following document among his papers, headed: The Mysteries of My Existence, addressed to the public:

"I belong to a very good family; I was well brought up. Fatally for myself, I adopted as my device the English maxim—Do not trust to-morrow. I know not that, on the contrary, no man should leave to-morrow what he can do to-day. For my part, I believe that, before doing anything, it was necessary to deliberate long and maturely on the subject. I reasoned, and I took part in turned out unsuccessful. By this system of reasoning I have had a laborious existence. I married unfortunately. I forfeited an important situation, and, in consequence, I became the laughing stock of my friends, because I never could return a visit in proper time; I was full of excuses, promises, apologies, engagement; and I was always an hour too late. I had cowardice to tell my wife that I never was fully decided, and was never ready to be served. I thought myself extremely clever, and I always found myself in a late or a difficult position. After long and profound reflection, I am now convinced that my life was entirely forfeiting off everything was but a prelude that my real character was one of selfishness and sloth; and that I sought to hide, or to cover, that double vice with a brilliant virtue. I was deprived by the fear of failure, by very disgust to bodily and mental exertions, by the intolerance of continuous and lethargic repose. Such is the true cause of the vexations which I have constantly experienced. I believe the judgment I now pass upon myself to be correct. At my age I am on the brink of the grave. The thought of self-murder has never ceased me, and as for once in my life I mean to take an energetic resolution, and not to postpone it, I bring myself

CORN GRINDING IN AFRICA.

DR. LIVINGSTONE, in his late African explorations, tells many interesting incidents in the domestic life of the natives, and in his Notes of Travel, lately published in England, illustrates some of them in a way to add to the interest. One of these, the grinding of corn, we extract. He says:

"As we were sleeping one night outside a hut, but near enough to hear what was going on within, an anxious mother began to grind her corn about two o'clock in the morning. 'Ma,' inquired a little girl, 'why grind in the dark?' Mamma advised sleep, and administered material for a sweet dream to her darling, by saying, 'I grind meal to buy cloth from the strangers, which will make you look a little lady.' An observer of these primitive races is struck continually with such little trivial touches of genuine human nature.

"The mill consists of a block of granite, syenite, or even mica schist, fifteen or eighteen inches square and five or six thick, with a piece of quartz or other hard rock about the size of a half brick, one side of which has a convex surface, and fits into a concave hollow in the larger and stationary stone. The workwoman, kneeling, grasps this upper millstone with both hands, and works it backwards and forwards in the hollow of the lower millstone, in the same way that a baker works his dough, when pressing it and pushing from him. The weight of the person is brought to bear on the moveable stone, and while it is pressed and pushed forwards and backwards, one hand supplies every now and then a little grain, to be thus at first bruised and then ground on the lower stone, which is placed on the slope, so that the meal, when ground, falls on to a skin or mat, spread for the purpose. This is, perhaps, the most primitive form of mill, and anterior to that in oriental countries, where two women grind at one mill, and may have been that used by Sarah of old, when she entertained the angels."

WOMAN OF TETTA, AFRICA, GRINDING CORN.

MR. ROBERT B. MINTURN.

MR. ROBERT B. MINTURN, an eminent merchant, whose name is familiar all over the world, and the head of the house of Grinnell, Minturn & Co., died of paralysis on the 9th inst., at his home in this city, in the 61st year of his age.

THE LATE ROBERT B. MINTURN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

There was hardly a man among us better known, certainly no one more beloved for his private virtues, or more respected for his high-toned character, his unbending integrity, his sound judgment, and his conscientious discharge of every public and private duty. His motives were probably never impeached in any act of his life, and it has fallen to the lot of few men to wield so wide an influence among his fellows in a purely private position. His wealth and influence were due to his own exertions and ability. Holding wealth as a trust, to the poor his hand was always open with a liberality which had become proverbial, while so modest and unassuming were his efforts to seek out and relieve cases of obscure suffering, that the amount of good he did was rather guessed at than known. Patriotism with him was a passion, and so devoted was he to the cause of the Union that, old as he was, and feeble in health, he had serious thoughts of taking his sword or his musket and serving in the field. At the outset of the war he invested a large portion of his wealth in Government securities, and the Administration never turned to the country for pecuniary help that it had not the immediate aid of his clear head, his generous hand, and his wide influence. No man more clearly apprehended the cause of the rebellion, and no one rejoiced with a more heartfelt joy at the destruction of both. When to be opposed to slavery was to hold an unpopular opinion, Mr. Minturn never shrank from his avowal, and one of the last acts of his life was to give aid to an association on behalf of the freedmen. At home and abroad—where he went reluctantly, a year or two ago, for his health—his time, his means and his efforts were devoted to supplying the Government with men and money, to giving comfort to the soldiers in the field, to ameliorating the condition of the blacks, and fitting them for the freedom which the war was about to bestow upon them. His last thought and his last word were an anxious expression of sympathy for the poor about us, to whom the sudden cold had brought unusual suffering.

Mr. Minturn never held a public office, unless the Presidency of the Union League Club can be called so. He was the first to fill that office, and he did much for the organization of an association in which he hoped to concentrate—and succeeded in doing so—the loyalty of his class. We had among us no better embodiment of the Christian gentleman, no better representative of the Republican citizen, than he.

AFRICAN CORN MILL.

A LUNATIC'S ESCAPE FROM BLACKWELL'S ISLAND—THE CHASE—TAKING TO THE WATER.

THE FIRST STEAMBOAT ON THE THAMES.

ENGLAND has fought hard upon paper to show that she was the original inventor and pioneer in steam navigation. She repudiates Fulton, though his boat, the Clermont, was brought to a practical test, on the Hudson, in 1807, seven years before the Majestic was built by Mr. George Dodd, at Fort Glasgow, in Scotland, and navigated to Dublin, and thence round the Land's End to the port of London. She was the first steamboat seen in the Thames, and, as a matter of course, created great excitement. Her builder devoted himself to the cause of steam navigation, and by his exertions, within a few years, six boats were plying on the Thames, two between London and Richmond, two between London and Gravesend, and two between London and Margate. A large number of serious accidents by fire and the bursting of the boilers of the high pressure engines then in use, led to a Parliamentary inquiry in 1817 but in spite of adverse witnesses, and the organized opposition of the Thames watermen, the cause of steam navigation rapidly gained ground, and the committee asserted in their report the following memorable words:

"Your committee entered on the task assigned them with a strong feeling of the inexpediency of legislative interference with the management of private concerns or property, farther than the public safety should demand, and more especially with the exertions of that mechanical skill and ingenuity, in which the artists of this country are so pre-eminent, by which the labor of man has been greatly abridged, the manufactures of the country carried to an unrivalled perfection, and its commerce extended over the whole world.

"Among these, it is impossible for a moment to overlook the introduction of steam as a most powerful agent, of almost universal application, and of such utility, that, but for its assistance, a very large portion of the workmen employed in an extensive mineral district of this kingdom would be deprived of their subsistence.

"A reference to the evidence taken, will also show with what advantage this power has lately been applied, in Great Britain, to propel vessels both of burthen and passage; how much more extensively it has been used in America, and of what farther application it is certainly capable, if it may not be said to be even now anticipated in prospect."

ATTEMPTED ESCAPE OF A LUNATIC

From the Asylum on Blackwell's Island.

We illustrate an incident of comparatively rare

A LUNATIC'S ESCAPE—THE CAPTURE BY THE KEEPERS—MARCH THROUGH THE SNOW.

THE RETURN TO THE MADHOUSE.

occurrence, and yet one not so unfrequent as is desired.

Occasionally, after long intervals, a patient in the Blackwell's Island Lunatic Asylum will succeed in eluding all the watchfulness of his attendants, and devise some desperate method of escape from imprisonment. At times these foolhardy attempts result in death, and the unfortunate madman becomes, in the eye of the world, a suicide.

Such a case would the one presented undoubtedly have been, had the attempt not been discovered in time.

On the cold morning of January 1st of this year, a man was found missing in one of the halls of the lodge or madhouse. His keeper at once instituted a search for him. At the expiration of an hour he was seen, destitute of clothing (save a linen shirt and drawers), preparing to plunge into the cold waters of the East river. He was shouted at, but his sole response was a dive into the icy wave, and by the time his pursuers reached the spot where he had stood, he was full 15 feet from shore, struggling with the swift current.

A boat pushed out after him from a boat-house some little distance below; and he was or brought to come back by the attendants in pursuit; told that death was certain, the cold current sweeping him before he attained half the distance to the opposite or Manhattan shore. His energy failing him, or rather, seeing in the approaching boat a certainty of capture, he turned his efforts towards his starting place, and was speedily fished out by a boat-hook.

The second illustration represents his shivering march through the snow to the "lodge" from which he made his escape. Not knowing where he would be found, the attendants had not, of course, come provided with clothing for him, so that he was obliged to stumble through the snow with the frosty air stiffening every moment his soaked slight covering. Such, however, was his frenzied eagerness to flee from the Asylum, that he attempted, as he drew nearer to it, to again rush to the water side.

Arrived at last at the lodge, the third illustration presents him urged by his keepers into a cell, where, his garments being removed, he was to be thoroughly rubbed, preparatory to assuming warm and dry habiliments.

It is pitiable to contemplate such sufferings, which cannot be alleviated; to behold an innocent for no crime imprisoned, and yet justly. The wretched maniac deserves double commiseration when he is not completely distraught, but preserves sanity enough to feel all the horrors of a loss of freedom.

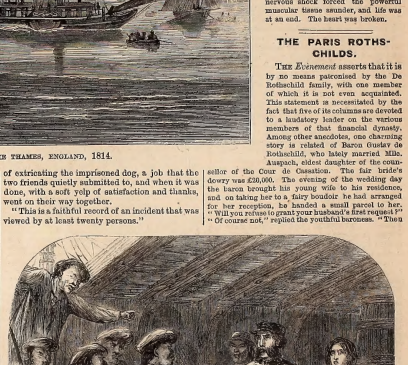
THE TWO DOGS.

THERE are two parties in animal opinions; the one argues for instinct only in the brute creation, the other pleads for reasoning faculty. The first party is occasionally staggered by some record of animal doings, which, if it does not argue reasoning faculty, shows wondrous accident.

One of this class we illustrate in the misfortune and charity of two dogs, an incident that is recorded by a western correspondent. He says:

"A tin can attracted the attention, gastronomically, of a hungry cur, connected with a travelling circus, from its outside drippings and some remnant of the good things it had held, stood by the door of my house. Mr. Dog regaled himself, at first, by licking away all the savory matter from the outside, and smelling at the in, but at last the temptation was too strong, and in went the head. For awhile all was silence and enjoyment, but soon the lunch was devoured, and the devourer wished to take his leave. This was easier thought than done, and the animal found the tin pot so firmly set that he could not withdraw his head. Here was trouble of the first water, blindness and a closeness of atmosphere. A few low, half-suppressed howls of despair came out of the prison, a few will butts at vacancy, and away flew the poor cur down the street, frantically rushing at everything that lay in his path.

"In the midst of the excitement, another gentleman—he showed himself such—canine came upon the scene. At a glance he saw the condition of things, and with a vigor of intellect only to be found in true greatness, set himself to work to reform them. To the astonishment of the spectators, after throwing himself before the blinded animal, and stopping its career, he seized the handle of the tin pot in his mouth, and—this part we do not vouch for—whispering something in the ear of his new-found friend to quiet his nerves, led him gently down the street.



"At the distance of a few blocks the tap, tap of a hammer on metal was heard from a small shop. There was no sign up for Mr. Dog to read—supposing he could read—or indication of a tinman's, as it was, but the sound of the hammer, and to this spot the benevolent bow-wow led his afflicted friend, tabering him into the presence of the workman with an expression that said as plainly as a dog can speak, 'Be kind enough to attend to this little job, and some day when I get rich your bill shall be settled.'

"Is it any wonder that the tinsmith, under such an appeal, dropped his work and took up the job of extricating the imprisoned dog, a job that the two friends quietly submitted to, and when it was done, with a soft yelp of satisfaction and thanks, went on their way together.

"This is a faithful record of an incident that was viewed by at least twenty persons."

THE FIRST STEAMBOAT ON THE THAMES, ENGLAND, 1814.

MISS LOVIOT AND THE PIRATES.

THE TWO DOGS.

THE STORY OF A TRULY BROKEN HEART.

THE following interesting case of a literally broken heart was related by a late distinguished medical professor in Philadelphia to his class, while lecturing upon disease of the heart. It will be seen on perusing it that the expression "broken-hearted" is not merely figurative. In the early part of his career Dr. Mitchell accompanied as surgeon a packet that sailed between Liverpool and one of our Southern ports. On the return voyage, soon after leaving Liverpool, while the doctor and the captain of the vessel, a weather-beaten son of Neptune, but possessed of uncommonly fine feelings and strong impulses, were conversing in the latter's stateroom, the captain opened a large chest and carefully took out a number of articles of various descriptions, which he arranged upon a table.

Dr. M., surprised at the display of costly jewels, ornaments, dresses, and all the varied paraphernalia of which ladies are naturally fond, inquired of the captain his object in having made so many valuable purchases.

The sailor, in reply, said that for seven or eight years he had been devotedly attached to a lady, to whom he had several times made proposals of marriage, but was as often rejected; that her refusal to wed him, however, had only stimulated his love to greater exertion; and that, finally, upon renewing his offer, declaring in the ardency of his passion that without her society life was not worth living for, she consented to become his bride upon his return from his next voyage.

He was so overjoyed at the prospect of a marriage from which, in the warmth of his feelings, he probably anticipated more happiness than is usually allotted to mortals, that he spent all his ready money while in London for bridal gifts. After gazing at them fondly for some time, and remarking on them in turn, "I think this will please Annie," and "I am sure she will like that," he replaced them with the utmost care.

This ceremony he repeated every day during the voyage, and the doctor observed a tear glisten in his eye as he spoke of the pleasure he would have in presenting them to his affianced bride. On reaching Bidestination the captain arrayed himself with more than usual precision, and disembarked as soon as possible to hasten to his love.

As he was about to step into the carriage awaiting for him he was called aside by two gentlemen, who desired to make a communication, the purport of which was that the lady had proved unfaithful to the trust reposed in her, and married another, with whom she had decamped shortly before.

Instantly the captain was observed to put his hand to his breast, and fall heavily upon the ground. He was taken up and conveyed to his room on the vessel. Dr. M. was immediately summoned, but before he reached the poor captain he was dead.

A post-mortem examination revealed the cause of his unfortunate decease. His heart was found literally torn in twain! The tremendous propulsion of blood consequent upon such a violent nervous shock forced the powerful muscular tissue asunder, and life was at an end. The heart was broken.

THE PARIS ROTHSCHILDS.

THE Evénement asserts that it is by no means paiconised by the De Rothschild family, with one member of which it is not even acquainted. This statement is necessitated by the fact that five of its columns are devoted to a laudatory leader on the various members of that financial dynasty. Among other anecdotes, one charming story is related of Baron Gustav de Rothschild, who lately married Mlle. Anapach, eldest daughter of the counsellor of the Cour de Cassation. The fair bride's dowry was £30,000. The evening of the wedding day the baron brought his young wife to his residence, and on taking her to a fairy boudoir he had arranged for her reception, he handed a small parcel to her. "Will you refuse to grant your husband's first request?" "Of course not," replied the youthful baroness. "Then add the £30,000 which this envelope contains to your little sister's marriage portion." The Evénement further informs us that Baron James Rothschild rises at seven, and while he is being shaved and dressed by his valet, Felix M. Boudeville, professor of elocution, reads the morning papers to him. It is to be hoped he gives the correct intonation to the market reports, &c. At eight o'clock the baron proceeds to his office, where he works till six, whence he goes to play his rubber of whist at the club. The family dine at eight, after which they meet in the salons of the Baroness James, who receives Thiers and all the notabilities of the day. Once, however, the baron sometimes escapes to criticise the actions of the pupils of his teacher, M. Scudevile, at the Theatre de la Tour d'Auvergne.

A WEALTHY Englishman had the misfortune to be robbed of his portemonnaie the other day, containing a large sum, with a ticket for a box at the theatre, which he had purchased in the morning, and a carte-de-visite. He went to the Commissioner of Police, but could give no clue, and there was no hope. The commissioner, however, took his address, and turning the matter over in his mind, he thought it just possible that the thief might have the impudence and audacity to make use of the ticket, or sell it to some who would give a clue to the appearance of the pickpocket. Accordingly an officer was posted in waiting at the theatre, duly concealed from observation, and awaiting the possibility of the arrival of the thief, and to his great joy, a gentleman appeared shortly after the doors were open, accompanied by two ladies, presented the ticket and was admitted into the box. As soon as they were seated, the delicate policeman, tapped, beckoned monsieur quietly out, so as not to make a disturbance, closed the door, and gave orders that the ladies were not to leave. Then taking the gentleman by the arm, he said: "This way, monsieur, you are my prisoner!" "For what?" was the surprised and indignant question of the proprietor of the box ticket. "That is what you will learn—this way," said he as he drew a side staircase to a distant room, where he found himself in company with two other sergens de ville, to whom the order was given to search. "Ah, as I thought," said the officer, "here is the very portemonnaie and the carte-de-visite; where is the money?" The gentleman now seemed rather amused than surprised and indignant, and after a good deal of explanation, it turned out and was satisfactorily proved, that this was the identical Englishman, who had lost the money, but to whom the thief had in the after part of the day politely returned the portemonnaie, ticket for the theatre and carte-de-visite, but retained the money (as he wrote) as a reward for his honesty.

The New American Novel.

THE DEAD LETTER.

CHAPTER I.—THE LETTER.

I PAUSED suddenly in my work. Over a year's experience in the Dead Letter office had given a mechanical rapidity to my movements in opening, noting and endorsing the contents of the bundles before me; and, so far from there being anything exciting to the curiosity, or interesting to the mind, in the employment, it was of the most monotonous character.

The letter which I held in my paralyzed fingers when they so abruptly ceased their dexterous movements, was contained in a cheap, coarse envelope, yellowed by time, and directed in a peculiar handto "John Owen, Peckskill, New York," and the date on the stamp was "October 10th, 1857"—making the letter two years old. I knew not what magnetism passed from it, putting me, as the saying is, en rapport with its writer. I had not yet cut the lapper; and the only thing I could fix upon as the cause of my attraction was, that at the date written on the envelope, I had been a resident of Blankville, twenty miles from Peckskill—and something aboût that date!

Yet, that was no excuse for my agitation; I was not of an inquisitive disposition; nor did "John Owen" belong to the circle of my acquaintance. I sat there with such a strange expression upon my face, that one of my fellows, remarking my mood, exclaimed, jestingly:

"What is it, Harry? A check for a hundred thousand?

"I'm sure I don't know; I haven't opened it." I answered, at random; and with this I cut the wrapper, impelled by some strongly-defined, irresistible influence to read the time-stained sheet inclosed. It was dated:

"DEAR SIR—It's too bad to disappoint you. Could not execute your order, as everybody concerned was drunk. Wine a charming city—good for tasting a picture. That old friend I introduced you to won't kick, and you had not better bother yourself to visit him. The next time you have a picture in hand to sell, don't forget to left hand pocket for the broken tooth-pick which I lent him. He is welcome to it. If you're at the place of business, I shan't be there, and have fulfilled the order, and having given up my emigration project, I remain, as my will so, yours to yourself accordingly. Sorry your prospects are so poor, and hoping, as I am, with the greatest possible esteem, your disappointed

"BENJUTTON."

To explain why this brief epistle, neither read nor interesting in itself, should effect me as it did, I must go back to the time at which it was written.

CHAPTER II.—EVENTS OF A NIGHT.

IT WAS late in the afternoon of a cloudy, windy autumn day, that I left the office of John Argyll, Esq., in his absence, to take tea and spend the evening in his family. I was a law-student in the office, and was favored with more than common kindness by reason of a friendship which had existed between him and my deceased father. Although I did not board at his house, I was almost like a member of the family; there was always a place for me at his table, with liberty to come and go as I pleased. This being Saturday, I was expected to go home with him, and stay over Sunday if I liked.

We quickened our steps as a few large drops were sprinkled over us out of the darkening clouds.

"It will be a rainy night," said Mr. Argyll.

"It may blow over yet," I said, looking towards a rift in the west, through which the declining sun was pouring a crimson stream. He shook his head doubtfully; and we hurried up the steps into the house, to escape the threatened drenching.

Entering the parlors, we found no one but James, a boy of Mr. Argyll, a young man of about my own age, lounging upon a sofa.

"Where are the girls?"

"They have descended from the heavenly regions yet, uncle."

"Dressing themselves to death, I expect—It's Saturday evening, I remember," smiled the indulgent father, looking on me for the library.

I sat down by the west window, and looked out at the coming storm. I did not like James Argyll much, nor he me; for as that, as much as we had thrown together, our intercourse continued constrained. On this occasion, however, he seemed in excellent spirits, persisting in talking on all kinds of topics, and laughing despite of my cold replies. I was wondering when Eleanor would make her appearance.

At last she came. I heard her silk dress rustle down the stairs, and my eyes were upon her when she entered the room. She was dressed with unusual care, and her face wore a brilliant, expectant color. She stole a look for neither of us. Perhaps James thought of it; I am sure I did. But since there was such a change rung upon it I was ashamed of, and fought inwardly to conquer.

Presently she came to the window, and as she stood by my side, a burst of glory streamed through the blackening clouds, enveloping her in a golden atmosphere, lasting her head hair with purple, flushing her clear cheeks and the pearls about her throat. The fragrance of the rose she wore on her breast mingled with the light; for a moment I was thrilled and overpowered; but the dark hour came, and I looking on me—they were regarding the weather.

"How provoking that it should rain to-night," she said, and that the slight cloud of vexation swept over her face, the blackness of night closed over the gleam of unrest, so suddenly that we could hardly discern each other.

"The rain will not keep Moreland away," I answered.

"Of course not—but I don't want him to get wet walking up from the depot; and Ray has put up the carriage in view of the storm."

At that moment a wild gust of wind smote the house so that it shook, and the rain came down with a roar that was deafening. Eleanor rung for lights.

"We need not have troubled ourselves to wear our new dresses," pouted Mary, the younger sister, who had followed Eleanor down stairs; "there will be nobody here to-night."

Both James and myself objected to being dubbed nobody. The wilful young beauty said all the pretty things we could imagine, and she certainly should not have worn her blue silk, nor puffed her hair for—

"Nor for Henry Moreland either—he never notices what the girls wear, and I suppose people are so stupid. I wish he and Eleanor would make an end of it. If I'm ever going to be a bridesmaid, I mean to be—"

"And a dear fellow afterwards, Miss Molly," jestingly broke in Cousin Ray, who now joined us for tea.

"You couldn't hear it if I did. The rain is playing a polka this evening, and the wind is dancing to it."

He hurried loudly—more loudly than the idle fancy warranted.

I am sure we see cannot make more noise than the storm," he said, going to the piano and thumping out the most tumultuous thing he could recall. I was not a musician, but it seemed to me that he executed a wonderful piece. The storm-notes allowed; and Mary put her hands over her ears, and ran away to the other end of the room.

I had the window-seat, and looked down in wide sheets, flapping against the windows, as the wind blew the rain. For the first time I continued at the piano, and Eleanor moved restlessly about, now standing at the window, now at the fire.

All at once there occurred one of those pauses which precede the fresh outbreaking of a storm, as if startled by the sudden lull, the wind had paused in his playing. Just then, the shrill whistle of the locomotive was heard, coming nearer than usual, and, as the evening train swept by, the house shook. Only a gust now and then, a mile away, and rushed on into the depot, in the direction of Eleanor.

There is something unearthly in the scream of the steam-engine, especially when heard at night. He seems like a human being, with a will of his own, unbending and irresistible, and his voice is terrible. Such a night as this, it rolled upon the storm prolonged and doleful. I know not how it came about, but during that pause whose imagination was already wrought upon by the tempest and by the presence of the woman I hopelessly loved, there was a fearful foreboning in the whistling: it filled the air, even the perfumed, lighted room seemed to shake with it. Then it ceased—I know not when. It warned against some unknown danger, and never did a shrieking demon less cry, so full of mortal anguish, that I involuntarily put my fingers to my ears. Perhaps James heard it, perhaps he did not; certain it is that from the piano-seat, walked twice or three across the room, then threw himself upon a sofa, and for a long time sat with his eyes shaded, apparently in deep meditation.

Eleanor, with maiden artifice, took up a book, and composed herself to pretend to read; she would not look at me. I felt sure of that. I had been in restless while awaiting his coming. Only for a moment, however, I suffered my thoughts into the sweets of things, the music, the flowers, whatever lulled me in the pauses of the storm in the intervals.

I have said that I loved Eleanor. I did, secretly, in silence and regret, against my judgment and will, and because I could not help it. I was quite aware that she was not the girl I should have sought for him; sympathy was taught me by my own sufferings, long ago, and I was not attracted toward his character. He seemed to me to be rather a dissipated man. I knew that Henry Moreland, Eleanor's betrothed husband, was not; again, I reproached myself for uncharitableness; it might have been his circumstances which rendered him so. He was a man of business, not a student and bookworm like myself, and his unhappiness which made him appear so.

I loved, without a particle of hope. Eleanor was to marry a man who was in every way worthy of her, of fine demeanor, high social position, and unblemished moral character. As much as her many suitors had admired and loved Henry Moreland, they could not dislike him. To see the young couple together, one felt that they would be one of those "matches made in heaven"—in love, discreet, worldly wisdom, in family and cultivation, there was a rare correspondence.

Mr. Moreland was engaged with his father in a banking business in the city of New York. He owned a summer villa in Blankville, and it had been through the influence of Eleanor's father that he had made the acquaintance of Eleanor Argyll.

At this season of the year his business kept him in the city, and he was only able to spend out every Saturday afternoon and spending the Sabbath at the house of Mr. Argyll, the marriage bands were to be published three times only two years being now not very far away. On her twenty-first birthday, which was in the spring, Eleanor was to be married.

Another gust of wind swept away, and the expected guest did not arrive. He usually reached the house in fifteen minutes after the arrival of the train; I could see him here in my mind's eye hurrying nervously with her watch-chain, though she kept her face persistently averted from Mr. Argyll.

"Come, let us have tea: I am hungry," said Mr. Argyll, rising from the sofa; "Henry, he must find a long ride after dinner. No use waiting. Eleanor will be sure to send him a hot supper." I recalled a cheek, to express his sympathy for her disappointment—a little shower didn't use to keep beaux away when I was a boy. But I was not in the habit raining down there half the days—the storm seemed to come from all directions, and was so asleep!

"Let us see," cried Mary, pulling away the hand from her cousin's face—"why, James, what is the matter?"

Her question caused us all to look at him; his face was of an ashy paleness; his eyes burning with those of fever.

"Nothing; is the matter? I've been half asleep," he answered, with a forced laugh to his face.

"Molly, shall I have the honor?"—she took his offered arm, and we went to tea. After which we went back to the parlor and passed a merry evening.

A touch of chargrin, a fear that we should suspect how deeply she was disappointed, caused Eleanor to appear in unusually high spirits. She sung whatever I asked of her; she played some of the gayest airs I ever heard; and I, to echo her with humor and laughter reserved for the lonely hours of my own life, was pained in her eyes. It was not an altogether happy excitement; I knew that pride and loneliness were at the bottom of it; but it made her brilliantly beautiful.

James, too, was in an exultant mood.

It was late when we retired. I was in a state of mental activity which kept me awake for hours after. I never heard it rain as it did that night—the water seemed to come down in solid masses, and, occasionally, the wind shook the strong mansion, as if it were a shell. I could not sleep. There was something awful in the storm. If I had had a premonition of approaching evil I should have said that spirits were abroad.

As I was subject to somewhat vivid imagination, but without nervousness, unknowingly bodily fear, I was still affected strangely. I shuddered in my soul when I, the wild music of the locomotive lingered in my ears; something besides rain and thunder seemed to be in the darkness. Ah, my God! I know afterwards what it was. It was a human soul struggling between time and eternity, and the earth most dear to it. The rest of the household slept well, so far as I could judge, by its silence and deep respiration.

Towards morning I fell asleep; when I awoke the sun was shining in the house brightly; the ground was covered with gay autumn leaves blown down by the wind and rain; the sky was promised well. I shook off the impressions of the night unconsciously, for the bustle of the breakfast bell had rung, and descending, joined the family of my host at the table. In the midst of the meal, Eleanor, who had left the room for a moment came in, saying that a man at the door wished to see Mr. Argyll and Mr. Reginald Reid.

"He says it's important, and can't wait, sir."

We arose and went out into the hall, closing the door of the breakfast-room behind us.

The man was a stranger, but had an arm—I hope you won't"—stammered the messenger, a servant with the baize.

"What is it?" demanded Mr. Argyll.

"Mr. Moreland was murdered last night here—Moreland's his name, I believe—was found dead on the road this morning."

"Dead!"

"They want you to come down to the inquest. They've got him over to the coroner's house. They think it's a fit—there's no marks of any thing—"

"Come, Reid, let us go instantly," cried Mr. Argyll, and they were quivering; we both thought of Eleanor.

"What shall I do?"

"I don't know, Mr. Argyll. I haven't had time to think."

"I can not—I can not—"

"Hush, father," said Sarah, tell the young ladies we have gone out a short time on business connected with the unfortunate what you have heard. Don't let any one in until we return—don't allow any one to see Miss Eleanor. Be prudent."

I was frightened, but she did not presume much for her discretion.

Returning to the hotel, already surrounded by many people, we found the distressing message true. There, in a private sitting-room, on the floor of Henry Moreland! The coroner and a couple of physicians had already examined the body, and declared that he had died from natural causes, as there was not the least appearance of violence. He was as calm and pleasant as in slumber; we could hardly believe we looked upon a murdered man. Moreland, about which the thick ringlets of brown hair clung, saturated with rain.

"Wait a little," exclaimed one, as we began to relieve the corpse of its wet garments, for the purpose of a public examination; "here is a wound in the back. Not a drop of blood—only a small triangular hole in the clothes, corresponding exactly, into the body. The investigation soon revealed the nature of the death-wound; it had been given by a sharp dirk, or stiletto. As firm and forcible had been the blow, that it had pierced the heart, and the rib with sufficient force to break the blade of the weapon, about three-quarters of an inch from the point of which was found in the wound. Death must have been instantaneous. The murderer had struck from behind upon his face, bleeding inwardly, which accounted for no blood having been at first perceived; and as he had fallen on his face, the weapon, in the bleeding storm of that miserable night. When found, the body was perfectly cold, after daylight, he was lying on the path, by the side of the street which led to the house of Mr. Argyll, with his travelling-bag by his side, his face to the ground. The bag was not touched, neither the watch and chain, nor on his person. It was evident that robbery was not the object of the murderer.

Who was the guilty one? Some double darkness of night and storm? What enemy had Henry Moreland, to do him to death so foully?

It is useless now to repeat all the varying conjectures rising in our minds, or which continued to be uttered by the excitement of the whole town.

While the inquest was proceeding, Mr. Argyll myself and James were aware of Eleanor's presence of her murdered lover.

"Mr. Argyll, on business, Richard," said the father. "I am so unnerved I can do nothing. Will you undergo it in his presence for me?"

His parents were his own money mystery. I had not thought of them. I wrote out the dreadful message, and Eleanor, as I have said the blow, left pity to carry.

I must say I went out to Eleanor. She must not hear it from strangers; and I can not—Richard—can you tell her? Will you tell her? I will follow you home immediately. As soon as I have made arrangements to have poor Henry brought to our house. Richard, you will do this?"

He wrung my hand, looking at me so beseechingly—but, both at that time, I thought of his fiancé. I felt like one walking with frozen feet as I left the house. The storm was of honor, and a peaceful sunlight, along the very path he had lost his burden, and over the spot where he had fallen and lain all night. The grass was undiscovered, around which a crowd was pressing, disturbed, excited, and I was obliged to make a circuit to avoid them. the rain, so as to be nearly dry; there was nothing to give a clue to the perpetrator of the deed, which he went or whence he came—what impress they must have upon the hard, gravely walk, must have been washed out by the storm. A few persons were searching carefully for the weapon which had been left—a dirk or deadly, and which had been broken in the wound, thinking it might be found and cast away in the confusion.

CHAPTER III.—THE FIGURE BENEATH THE TREES.

As I came near the old Argyll mansion, it seemed to me never to have looked so fair before. The storm was the embodiment of calm prosperity. Stately and spacious it rose from the lawn in the midst of great old oaks whose trunks must have withstood through a century of growth, and whose red leaves, slowly dropping, now flamed in the sunshine, and now fell. At one of those ancient trees, I perceived with my eyes, though hardly with my mind, a figure in a dress of dark color leaning upon the bark. If I thought anything at all about it, I thought it the work of the storm, for numerous branches had been torn from the trees throughout the grove, and the ground was carpeted with fresh-fallen leaves.

Passing up the walk, I caught a glimpse of Eleanor at an upper window, and heard her singing a hymn softly to herself as she moved about her chamber. I stopped, as if struck by a blow. How could I force myself to drop the pall over this glorious morning? Alas! of all the homes in that village, perhaps this was the one on which the shadow had not yet fallen—this, over which it was to settle, to be lifted nevermore.

Of all the hearts as yet unstarted by the tragic event was that most certain to be suffering—that young heart, this moment so full of love and bliss, caroling hymns, out of the fullness of its gratitude. I could not endure the delicious happiness.

Oh, I must—I must! I went in at an open window, from a garden path in the library. James was there, dressed for church, his prayer-book and handkerchief lying on the table, and his looking-glass at the stranger's paper. The sight of him gave me a slight relief; his uncle and myself had been out of the house so early that I thought it was bad enough to have to tell any one such news, but any delay in meeting Eleanor was eagerly welcomed. He looked at me inquiringly; my manner was enough to denote that something had gone wrong.

"What is it, Richard?"

"Horrible—most horrible!"

"For heaven's sake, what is the matter?"

"Moreland was foully murdered!"

"Moreland! What? Where? Whom do they suspect?"

"And her father wishes me to tell Eleanor. You are her cousin, James; will you do it? I will meet you at the door to escort her to the house."

"I?" he said, with a shrinking sensation as one of books beside him. "I! Oh, no—no! If I'd be the last person to tell her! I look well being bad enough, wouldn't it?" and he laid laughed, though trembling from head to foot.

I looked at him in my manner strange, I did not wonder at it, the dreadful nature of the shock had unnerved me so.

"Where is Mary?" I asked. "We had better send her first, as she is not dressed for church visit—"

I had turned toward the door, which opened into the hall, to search for the younger sister, as I spoke. The words died on my lips. Eleanor was standing in it, there. She had been coming in to get a book, and had evidently heard what had passed. She stood as white as the morning dress she wore.

"Where is he?"

Her voice sounded almost unnatural.

"At the Eagle Hotel," I answered, almost without reflecting that she must have also heard such self-command, and, since she did, glad also that the terrible communication was over.

She turned and ran through the hall, down the arrow, leaving me to follow. She had thrown down her hair uncovered, fleet as a vision of the wind, she fled. I sprung after her. It would not do to let her go alone to herself with this sudden, awful sight. As she rushed out upon the street I caught her by the arm.

"Let me go! I must go to him! Don't you see, he will need me?"

She made an effort to break away, looking down the street with strained eyes. Poor child! Could she being dead, as well as him was good! Her stunned heart had as yet gone no further than that. I held her arm. As another thought, I supposed her by his side. She must go to him and comfort him as his calmness. I was glad to have her that thin world, and the things of this world —even she herself—were no more to him.

"Come back, Eleanor; they will bring him to you before long."

I led her in my arms and carry her back to the house.

In the hall we met Mary, who had heard the story from James, and who burst into tears and sobs as she saw her sister.

"They are bringing him away from him," said Eleanor, pitifully, looking at her. I felt her form drain in my arms, and caught it through with; James and I carried her to the sofa, while Mary ran for restoratives. She fainted.

James and myself paced the floor with hasty and forces, waiting to hear tidings of the murdered. After a time the housekeeper came down, informing us that Miss Argyll had come to her senses; Eleanor, who refused to open her eyes or speak about; but she wouldn't speak, and she looked dreadful.

Just then Mr. Argyll came in. After being informed of what had occurred he went up to his daughter's room. With enormous tenderness he gave her the details of the murder, as they were known; in a moment of sympathy, her face was not a drop of moisture softened her fixed, unnatural look.

Friends came in and went out with no notice from her.

"I wish they would all leave me but you, Mary," she said, after a time. Father, you will not leave me?"

"Yes—yes."

He kissed her, and she was left with her sister to a watcher.

Hours passed. Some of us went into the dining-room and drank of the strong tea which the housekeeper had prepared, for we felt weak and unnerved. It was getting dusk, and about the evening train, there being but one train running on Sunday. Mr. Argyll attended several who came home from hour to hour.

It was late in the afternoon before the body could be removed from the hotel where the coroner's inquest was held. I asked James to go with me and help me to receive it, according to Mr. Argyll's. He declined upon the plea of being too much unstrung to do so.

As the sad procession reached the garden in front of the mansion with its burden, I observed in the midst of the crowd a man with a carpet-bag about, a woman, whose face, even in that time of excitement, attracted my attention. I was that of a girl, young and handsome, though now pale and deadly pale, with a veil hook in her black eyes, which were fixed upon the shrouded burden with more than awe and curiosity.

I knew not yet why I remarked her so particularly; why her strange face made such an impression on me. She conducted toward the man, and then shrunk back again. By her dress and general appearance she might have been a shopgirl. I had never seen her before.

"Ha-ha!" said a gentleman to my side, "acts queerly. And, come to think, she was on the train from New York yesterday afternoon. Not the one poor Moreland came in; the one before. I was on board myself, and noticed her particularly, not on account of her beauty, but on account trouble on her mind."

I believe that I heard it, and I never forget here.

"I will trace her out," was my mental resolve.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment does not advertise in the New York Herald, Circus and Drama twice each day, daily Circus on Broadway. Afternoon at 2; Evening at 7½. CIRCUS TROUPE, and thoroughbred Horses. TRICK PONY, WILD BILL. A galaxy of Equestrian Stars in here and flushing like a constellation. Previous to Circus, the Domestic drama of the WHITE FAIRY; or, THE ASSASSIN STEWARD. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer; Two immense Living Giants; Three of the Smallest Dwarfs in the World; the beautiful Miniature Lady, Miss Lizzie Read; two beautiful Circassian Girls; John Little the Living Skeleton, weighs 61lb.; Hannah Battersby, 40in. wide, weighs 701lb.; Bohemian Glass Blowers. A Moral Glass Engine in motion. Albino Boy; Cosmorama, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria, 300 curiosities. Admission, 50 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Resin, Rosing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States. Send for illustrated circular.

PRICES.

GERMAN—Red or Brown, $2 50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE GERMAN—$5, $7, $9, $11, $15.
FRENCH—Blocked and Lined, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $75 to $300.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.

FREDERICK BLUME, 203 Bowery.

PARLOR ORGANS.

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, was awarded us by the late great FAIR of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, for our Melodeons, for the best instruments.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—as to quality of material. The award for the second best Instrument of this class was made to James M. Fulton, public organist, and the Melodeon empire and the third award was given to Mason & Hamlin."—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms."—L. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."—WILLIAM F. BRIDGE.

"The best Instruments of their class."—WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, far in advance of any other instrument I have heard."—CHAS. S. PELLOU.

Illustrated Catalogues sent by mail.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,
No. 97 East 23d Street, N. Y.

328-40

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Price Circular, 600 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Faculty readily yield to these peerless remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare Illustrations. Sent Gratis

CHARLES E. MACKEY,
tf 287 Broadway, New York.

$1,500 PER YEAR! We want active every-where to introduce our new improved LOCK-STITCH Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted five years. Sold for less than one-quarter usual. The only machine sold to United States for less than $40, which we pay $125 for. Address Hoge, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Stockder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars Free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine; or 629 Broadway, New York; No. 295 Canal street, Philadelphia, Pa.; No. 14 Lombard's Block, Chicago, Ill.; No. 140 Main street, Cincinnati, O.; or No. 8 Spaulding's Exchange, Buffalo, N. Y. 334-46

Something New.

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. ELLIS & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK.
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS.

War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.

Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of Rebel generals, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties. tf

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.

Sample and Catalogue sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogues free. Address tf JAS. F. MANCHE, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actresses for 25 cents. Address
5-6-45 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, ranging from $6 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in this city. Ornaments for the parlor, and playing compositions for the leisure.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers
21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Music Boxes repaired. 531-42

$1 144 COMIC VALENTINES
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.
B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 537-40

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
537-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine an invention urgently needed by everybody. Sent to any part of the country by mail for 50 cents. Best terms to Agents. Address, by B. L. WOLCOTT, 119 Chatham Row, N. Y. 536-39

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.
THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until the articles are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you will receive. A single trial will be the best Circular containing full list and particulars, sent free to Agents, with very liberal terms. Address as below.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
328 Broadway, New York.

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. The three greatest articles ever introduced, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 25 cents. Address B. H. MARTIN, Bloodale, N. H. tf

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Sent free for 25 cents.
tf Address, P. O. Box, 5,837, New York.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
tf H. GRAHAM, 83 Nassau st., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!
NEW! BEAUTIFUL!! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!
A beautiful Gift Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs, in metal frames, all UNMOUNTED.
Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CALVIN WELLS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address J. BLACKIE & CO., 718 Broadway, N. Y. tf

The Book of Wonders,

A new Medical Work of thrilling interest to married and single. Hints of great value to all. Price $1; Sealed, $1 25. Address
tf GEO. F. ARLINGTON, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Samples, 25 cents; Dozen, 75 cents; Importer's Catalogue, $1 25 per pack: $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 per pack. A very small margin of Profits. Address tf FORWARDING AGENT, 25 Liberty street, N. Y.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men who are suffering from Nervous Debility, etc., supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By enclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Box 4,586, New York City.

JOB HILLER, JR.
A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,416, New York. tf

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may come to Happiness. Sent free. Confidential and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARLE, M.D., 240 Pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

A Household Necessity exists for the use of

DURNO'S CATARRH SNUFF,

Which, in the first stages of a cold, acts like magic—Headache, Hoarseness, Diphtheria, and Bronchitis, Sore Eyes, Deafness, Bad Taste and Smell, being the result of Catarrh. It will remove and prevent all these, and insure a healthy Head. Its effects are pleasant and safe, and never fail to relieve from Snuffs.

It has the highest professional testimonials. Sold by all Druggists, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S., for 50 cents, per box, or $1 for five boxes. Address
JAS. DURNO, P. O. Box 1223, New York.
Wholesale, by D. BARNES & CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y.
534-45eow

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE Compound Cures

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the use of over 40 years in the New England states, where its merits have become as well known as the sun which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Settling of Blood, and Liver Complaint, effectually generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Diseases. Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidneys and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn how valuable a good and true medicine is. It is pleasant to take and cures. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

Prepared only by H. G. Ingersoll, Boston, Mass. Burnham & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Peter F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

R. R. R.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF

RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

The Cheapest and Best Medicine for Family Use in the World.

One 50 Cent Bottle

WILL CURE MORE COMPLAINTS, AND PREVENT THE SYSTEM AGAINST SUDDEN ATTACKS OF EPIDEMIC AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES THAN ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS SPENT FOR OTHER MEDICINES OR MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

THE MOMENT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF IS APPLIED EXTERNALLY, OR TAKEN INTERNALLY, ACCORDING TO DIRECTIONS, PAIN, FROM WEAKEVER CAUSE, CEASES TO EXIST.

1849. Asiatic Cholera. 1849.

IN 1849 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF CURED OVER 10,000 PERSONS SEIZED WITH ASIATIC CHOLERA IN NEW YORK CITY, AND AS A PREVENTIVE SAVED OVER ONE MILLION OF LIVES.

1856. Yellow Fever. 1856.

IN 1856 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF cured thousands of persons seized with Yellow Fever. As a preventive of this terrible disease, Dr. Frederick B. Page, of Mississippi, urged its use to the Medical Boards of the Southern States, and strongly recommended it as the most certain safeguard in the world.

During the War

More lives were saved by the use of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF than from the best efforts of the medical staff. We have hundreds of testimonials proving this fact. We have the evidence to prove that in cases where men, by exposure and hardships, contracted Fevers, Bowel Complaints, etc., used RADWAY'S READY RELIEF, invariably the attack was broken up, or did not result in Fever with Dysentery, Swamp Fevers, Bilious Fevers, Diarrhœa, Cholera, Rheumatism, etc., and those only who, when thus seized, used the READY RELIEF, entirely recovered.

Its Universal Use.

It cures the worst diseases incidental to all climates. It has been tested in all parts of the globe, South America, Europe, East and West Indies, and cured the worst forms of Cholera, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Yellow Fever, Swamp, Marsh, Ship, and other Fevers—and never failed in protecting persons who used it as a preventive against attacks.

Why Not ?

IT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF possesses such remarkable desiccating, neutralizing, strengthening, aperient, sudorific, anodyne, and other properties, as to cure the worst forms of disease as they exist in the most sickly climates, and when they are the most pernicious malaria is so thick that "you may almost cut it with a knife," and the poisonous vapors are so rife that all sorts of fevers of the milder type in our own climate (Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Chills and Ague, Bilious Fever, Influenza, etc., are but the milder and weaker forms of the more fearful diseases), it cures the worst forms as they exist in the most sickly climates, it will readily cure the less as they prevail amongst us.

Domestic Purposes.

Every family should be provided with a bottle of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. One bottle costs only 50 cents, and this bottle can be used for various purposes. FIFTY MINUTES after its application a thousand good than one hundred dollars expended for other medicines and physician's prescriptions. If suddenly seized with sickness, the use of the Relief will instantly arrest the disease, and afford immediate ease to the patient.

Ten Years' Rheumatism
CURED BY RUBBING THE SPINE WITH
Radway's Ready Relief.

ROBERT ELY, Esq., aged 60, has been afflicted with Rheumatism for 10 years. For 5 years and 11 months he was confined to his room, perfectly helpless. His limbs were distorted, swollen, and perfectly useless. He was cramped, so that he could neither move his fingers nor put one hand to the other. Intolerable pains ran riot all over his body; moving him from his bed involved the most excruciating agony. He was induced to try RADWAY'S READY RELIEF externally, or its administration internally. The patient, after 11 months' BAD COURSE OF HOARSENESS, BILIOUS COLIC, INFLAMMATION OF THE KIDNEYS, ULCERATION OF THE KIDNEYS, FEVER, ACUTE ABSCESS, SORE THROAT, INFLUENZA, DIPTHERIA, CROUP, INFLAMMATION will only excuse and comfort.

IMPORTANT.—TO FARMERS AND OTHERS residing in sparsely settled districts where it is difficult to secure the services of a physician, RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is invaluable. It can be used with positive assurance of doing good in all cases where pain or soreness fort is experienced, or of acute with INFLUENZA, HEADACHE, SORE THROAT, BAD COUGHS, HOARSENESS, BILIOUS COLIC, INFLAMMATION of the KIDNEYS, ULCERATION of the KIDNEYS, FEVER; or with CROUP, QUINSY, FEVER AND AGUE, or with RHEUMATIC PAINS, NEURALGIA, TOOTHACHE, EARACHE, EARACHE, or with LUMBAGO, PAIN IN THE BACK, or BRIGHT'S DISEASE, or with DIARRHŒA, CHOLERA MORBUS, or DYSENTERY, or with BURNS, SCALDS, BRUISES, or with SPRAINS, CHILLS, or with SPASMS. The application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will cure any of these complaints in a few hours.

BILIOUSNESS.—This painful disease has baffled the most skilful physicians and popular remedies. It is the most difficult of diseases to treat—but RADWAY'S READY RELIEF has never failed in affording immediate relief to the sufferer, and in all cases of ACUTE, INflammatory or Nervous Rheumatism, to effect a permanent cure. In Chronic Rheumatism and Gout, RADWAY'S CLEANSING SYRUP, called Resolving Resolvent, should be taken so as to operate with the Ready Relief.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERYWHERE.
Price 50 cents per Bottle.
Dr. JOHN RADWAY & CO., Montreal.
Sole Agents for the United States,
537-42 No. 87 Maiden Lane, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING $5
MACHINE!
THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 15, 1860; improvement patented June 5, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CHEMICUS attachment, a most Wonderful and Elegant, Practical Novelty; in regard to its operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and worse horizontal, sews with PERFECT SPOOL THREAD OF ALL KINDS. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 36 stitches to each revolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Fell, Bind, Stitch, Tuck, Run, Braid&c., in the strongest machine made. Warranted not to get out of order for three years. It has taken the highest premium at New York and other STATE FAIRS and received the FIRST PREMIUM at ALL the principal Fairs held, and of those who have USED THEM. The ONLY LOW Price Machine Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others at the same price are INFRINGEMENTS.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so simply understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions, on receipt of $5. Local Agents wanted. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing full description sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MISS CLARA HARLAND, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of any person, together with the time of marriage. This is no humbug, as testimonials without number can be seen. Send your address, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address

MISS CLARA HARLAND,
516-41 P. O. Drawer 29, Albany, N. Y.

WANTED.

AGENTS WANTED in every town and neighborhood, for "THE GREAT LABOR SAVER," a new article in daily demand, universally sought for, and readily sold and very saleable. Agents, male and female, are making $5 to $10 per day with a capital of $10. Any person having a little spare time, will find it pleasant and profitable. Call or send for circulars and return postage. Address R. WARELL,
Box 4,781, Chicago, Ill.

Matrimony Made Easy;
Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with Amusing Games. Price 13 cents. Send orders to Box 3,419 P. O., N. Y.

Fun! Adams' Jews Harp.

Send Five Cents to Drawer 5,976, Chicago, Ill., and receive by return mail Adams' "Jews Harp," which is something that will please you.

DENTISTS

Gentlemanly furnished samples for practically demonstrating the superiority of my Improved Atmospheric Plate. Patented September 5th. Constitutes the most beautiful, reliable, economical substitute for Gold Plate. H. GILLS LEITHEAD, Dentist, 84 East 23d street. Enclose return postage.

An Important Medical Work,

Containing the full description and treatment of all private diseases that require a private system in Book 10. This work is particularly recommended to the newly-married. It also contains the important knowledge that thousands of young men are in search of—knowledge derived from long and intimate experience. Added to which are numerous testimonials of my valuable prescriptions from persons identified with nervous debility, &c., the prevalent cause and symptoms of which it would not be necessary or proper to state here. Young men, do not delay a moment, but listen to the voice of experience. I will mail this work, carefully sealed, to any address on the receipt of 50 cents.
Address DR. J. S. BEEMAN,
Lock Box 563, New Orleans, La.

LADIES DESIRING A
SMOOTH, CLEAR AND

BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION

Should use GEORGE W. LAIRD'S Bloom o Youth. Has no equal for Preserving and Beautifying the Complexion. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot 74 Fulton street, New York. 539-41

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865.

No. 14895	drew	$100,000
No. 25,249	"	50,000
No. 18589	"	20,000
No. 6,000	"	10,000
No. 16316	"	5,000
No. 3,419	"	1,000

Being the six capital prizes.
Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

Cough'N-More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
534-46

Make Your Own Soap!

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker, warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or compound. Will make in case of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, five pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No time is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 63, 65, 67, 69, 71, 73, and 74 Washington street, N. Y. 528-650

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN, CURLS produced by the use of Prof. DE BEUIN'S FRISER LA CHEVELUE. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ, & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., 239-410 Sole Agents for the United States.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-436 SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

$5 Given Away.—The great $5 secret and other valuable information mailed free. Address STEPHENS & CO., Brooklyn, N. Y. 519-400

SKATES FOR THE MILLION!

DEPOT FOR

Lovatt's Patent Skates,

WITHOUT STRAPS, AND

NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,

WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.

A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates, Depot for the "Latest Rink" and "Patent Post Shells." Wholesale and Retail.

ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway. Skates Ground and Repaired. o

DAVIS' PAIN KILLER.

We have tested this medicine, and know our readers that it not only possesses all the virtues claimed for it, but in many cases surpasses any other remedy we have ever known. It should be in the cabin of every vessel that goes to sea, for the especial purposes of pecuniary profit, but be regarded as one of the standard medicines for the public benefit.—Herald of Gospel Liberty. o

Agents Wanted. A. G. SHAVER, New Haven, Conn. o

False Moustache and Goatees for 50 cents, 75 cents, $1, $1 25, $1 50, and $2. P. DAVIS, Manufacturer and Importer, Box 308, P. O., Brooklyn, N. Y. o

Old Eyes Made New, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Comfort and Cure for the Ruptured.—Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Croup.—How it may be easily Prevented; also Cause and Cure. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Confidential Information for the Married.—Sent free in sealed envelope. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Medical Common Sense.—400 pages—100 illustrations—$1 00. Sent by mail everywhere, postpaid. Contents Table sent free. Address the Author, E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y. sowo

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts THOS. F. different powers for $1. Address

660o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

"CHOICEST OF MAGAZINES!"

From all sides come the most flattering encomiums upon BEADLE'S MONTHLY, which, for variety of matter and brauty of illustration, challenges comparison with any magazine published in America. Readers of current literature are asked to examine it. The February number, now ready, contains:

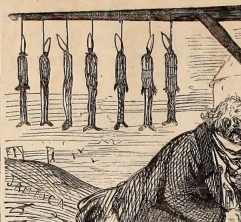
For What. Ballad. Illustrated.
Dead Letters. N. Y. Illustrated.
To Red River and Wood Cross Country. Illustrated.
Assassins and their Work. William of Orange.
Life in Rebel Prisons.
Prairie-Dog at Home. Illustrated.
Ida Grovesby's Lovers.
Tobacco: Its Where, Where, and How. Illustrated.
A Mad Night. Tale.
Christmas in Rome.
Moonlight. Poem.
Camphor and Cologne. Story.
Physiology of Perfumes.
Lecturing to Sharp.
Current Notes on Books, etc.

Sold by all Newsdealers and Booksellers at the good old price of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS PER NUMBER. Three dollars per year.

BEADLE & CO., Publishers,
No. 118 William street, N. Y.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH



SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal,

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting thread Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
537-490 505 Broadway, New York.

PRECEPT AND EXAMPLE.

TOMMY BULL.—"Now, dear Brother Jonathan, be gentle with your rebels—he kind to my friend old Jeff—don't mind what I do, but what I say."

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and surrounded to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. It requires no key, or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be to fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Approved by the Press and all who have seen THEM. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,

4to 204 and 206 Broadway, N.Y.

$10 Per Day.—Active enterprising men wnted everywhere to sell an article required by every person. Useful, staple and quick sales. Business honorable and profitable. Full particulars and a sample and free by mail. Address AMERICAN GOLDEN PEN CO., Hartford, Conn. 537-490

POLLAR & SON Manufacturers of Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted. Send address for Circular. Pipes $6 to $30 each.

6533-45

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harpet's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent all rail-roads, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Shutters charged low rates. 6000

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, LIQUOR, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S EXTRACT BUCHU.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, B. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-470 ITCH! SALT RHEUM! ITCH!

Cured by REDDE'S CHIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 38 cents. Send 41 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and a box by mail. 538-470

DEAFNESS

And Discharges from the Ear Radically Cured,

By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract

OTTINE

Price $1 50 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. WEEKS & POTTER, Druggists, No. 170 Washington st., Wholesale Agents.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, decend Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBBER'S TEOPHANE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-480

UNION ADAMS,

HOSIER, GLOVER,

AND

SHIRT MAKER,

No. 637 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK CITY.

$1,000,000 Worth

OF

WATCHES AND JEWELLERY.

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive.

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches	- each $125 00
200 Silver Watches	- each $20 to 35 00
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Cases	each 2 00 to 8 00
1,000 Elegant Silver Plated Caster Stands each	20 00 to 50 00
1,000 Elegant Silver Plated Fruit and Cake Baskets, each	15 00 to 35 00
2,500 Sets of Silver Plated Tea Spoons,	8 00 to 15 00
2,500 Sets of Silver Plated Forks, each	8 00 to 15 00
2,000 Goblets, Engraved, - -	4 00 to 8 00
2,000 Pairs of Table Spoons - -	8 00 to 8 00
2,000 Pairs of Salt Spoons - -	3 00 to 5 00
4,000 Magnificent Napkin Rings -	4 00 to 9 50
9,000 Pairs of Polished Ear Drops (assorted colors) - - -	5 00 to 8 00
3,300 Sets Ladies' Jewellery, Imitation Ivory - - - - -	5 00 to 10 00
2,500 Gold Lockets, engraved, hacks, each face, perfect imitation - - - - -	10 00
Lady's Waist Combs, rich and unique patterns - - -	5 00 to 25 00
4,400 Belt Buckles, Gold Jet, and Vulcanite - - - - -	5 00 to 15 00
6,000 Latest Style Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 20 00
5,000 Gents' Californian Diamond Pins -	5 00 to 20 00
6,000 Californian Diamond Ear Drops -	5 00 to 15 00
2,000 Miniature and Emerald Revolver Pins - - - - -	5 00 to 10 00

And a large assortment of Jewellery and Silverware of every description. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then in at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 11 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and one hundred for $15.

Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,

o No. 30 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4270, N. Y.

THE GREAT NATIONAL PICTURE,

ENTITLED THE

OUTBREAK OF THE REBELLION

In the United States, 1861.

This Picture is not only valuable as a work of Art, but is interesting to every American citizen; it contains numerous correct portraits of the most prominent men of the period, including A. Lincoln, Scott, Jeff. Davis, Stevens, Buchanan, Floyd and others. The size of this Picture is 24 in. by 30 printed on extra thick paper. No Union Family should be without a copy of this beautiful Picture. It will be sent to any part of the United States, free of expense, on receipt of the price, which is $1 per copy.

KIMMEL & FORSTER,
Engravers, Printers and Publishers,
540-415 204 and 206 Canal street, N. Y. City.

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and forty acre tracts at from $20 to $30 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which this place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Horace Greeley, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, on an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the Superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 537-400

SERPENTS de PHARAON,

OR

SERPENTS' EGGS,

Real Egyptian Mummied Wheat.

"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and retail by OLDEN & SAWYER, 346 Canal street, New York. Sent to any part of the U. S. by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Self-adjusting Reversible White. No. Linen finished, No. Stone Wash Linen finished, No. 3. $1.50 per dozen. $2.50 per dozen. Mailed free. Send price and size. Sold by first class houses

o

Whiskers and Moustaches

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. BERENDS'S RESTAURATEUR. CALIFLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,

239-410 Sole Agents for the United States.

TO VETERAN SOLDIERS.

I wish to employ every Veteran or Wounded Soldier, who is desirous of engaging in a lucrative business; requires but very little capital. Also I will send a Sample Badge, either Gold or Solid Silver, for half price, viz., 75 cents. Send for Descriptive circulars.

B. T. HAYWARD,
o 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Army Corps Badge Pins and Rings, of 16 carat solid gold, manufactured. BEYAN & HELMICH, Manufacturing Jewelers, 12 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,087, P. O., New York. tf

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. off

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be learned in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 5,410, New York. tf

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

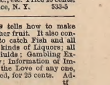
Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Secrets of Fortune Telling; How to Make all Kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; All the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; How to Make all Kinds of Jewelers, Perfumes, Salts, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Whiskers and Moustaches grow; and Fortune Telling; Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 5410, Post Office, N. Y. 536-5

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without spice or any other trash. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game, how to make all kinds of Candies; all kinds of Ointments and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,037 P. O., New York. tf

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH



SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York. o

Whiskers! Whiskers!

My Golden Compound will force the Beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Harmless, free of money refunded. Sent by mail for 30 cents. Address FRANKLIN & JAGGERS, Colburn, Ill.

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the South ern District of New York

No. 541—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00

Unanimity of Juries.

No axiom of our Government is more universal than that "the majority rules." From the adoption of a Constitutional Amendment, through the enactment of new laws in Congress, and down to the proceedings of primary meetings, this is the rule which governs all, the standard to which all conform. The only appeal from this principle is to force; and to force accordingly the Southern States lately appealed—with what success the world will never forget—against the majority, which placed in power a President whose political views were not theirs. This principle, in fact, is only a corollary of government of the people by themselves. Since, by the constitution of human minds, unanimity on any subject is impossible, the only solution of disputed points, the only arbiter of conflicting views, is the will of the greatest number. Is it not, therefore, most strange that, on questions most nearly affecting our social relations, on questions concerning the rights of individuals towards one another and towards society, we should exact from a jury of twelve men an unanimity neither expected nor required from any other deliberative body?

With many other of our judicial forms, this peculiarity of unanimity in the jury has descended from our English ancestors, and, as far as we can see, has nothing but the venera-

MESSRS. THOMPSON, WARREN, AND THE COLORED BOY, LEAPING OUT ON THE ICE.

MR. WARREN SINKING FOR THE LAST TIME.

MR. THOMPSON CRAWLING UPON THE ICE CAKE.

THE COLORED BOY, BARTLETT, PRAYING.

THE VOYAGE DOWN THE RIVER.

THE RESCUE.

A TERRIBLE ICE VOYAGE ON THE NIAGARA RIVER.

tion attaching to ancient forms to be urged in its defense. Even in England, the highest authority has condemned it as far as it relates to civil cases, and a change was strongly recommended by the Commissioners appointed in 1830 to report upon the Courts of Common Law. They said: "It is essential to the validity of verdict that the jury should be unanimous, and, regularly, they are not allowed to be discharged (unless by consent of the parties) until such unanimous verdict has been returned. It is difficult to defend the justice or wisdom of the latter principle. It seems absurd that the rights of a party on questions of a doubtful or complicated nature should depend upon his being able to satisfy twelve persons that one particular state of facts is the true one. * * * And the interests of justice seem manifestly to require a change of law on this subject."

In Scotland, the jury, or assize, in criminal cases, consists of fifteen, and decides by a majority. In France, between 1791—when the the jury system was first introduced there—and 1848, a period of fifty-seven years, the law respecting verdicts by a majority in criminal cases was changed no less than twelve times! At first ten votes were required for a verdict of guilty. Under the Revolutionary tribunals, the number of the jury was reduced to eleven, then to nine, and afterwards to seven, and it was necessary there should be a majority for a verdict either of guilty or not guilty. The directory required the verdict to be unanimous in every case. Other changes took place at different periods, and under the Republic that followed the revolution of February, 1848, the majority was required to be nine. This, however, was found to lead to an alarming number of acquittals, and, finally, the law of the 9th of June, 1850, established the rule of a simple majority for a verdict of guilty, which continues up to the present time.

It is scarcely necessary to point out the practical injustice that results from requiring twelve men to agree upon a disputed fact, under penalty of leaving the fact for ever judicially undecided, or only decided by the enormous expense and waste of time of a new trial, which may again, in its turn, be indecisive. No one who reads the proceedings of our courts, both criminal and civil, can fail to have been struck by the practical denial of justice to the suitors, who, after wearisome delays, and enormous expenses for witnesses, finally obtain a hearing, only to be dismissed from court with permission to begin all over again, because one juryman cannot, or will not, understand the evidence which has carried conviction to the minds of eleven others.

We have shown that in Scotland and in France, a majority of the jury suffices for the purposes of justice, and that in England, such a system has obtained the sanction of the highest judicial minds, although the change has not yet been adopted there. In this country, from the character of our citizens who are called to act as jurors, such a change is still more imperiously demanded. Here, more than in any other country, each man is brought up to rely upon himself rather than on others. Hence comes a certain sturdiness of thought, and strength of opinion, which refuses to be warped by weight of authority or the impressions of external minds. When such characters you add integrity of purpose, and a spice of obstinacy which self-reliance habitually engenders, you have the most admirable elements from which form a jury that will not soon agree. And it is precisely such characters which are found in our juries—men unused to be controlled in the formation or expression of their opinion, but who, from their early habits education, would acquiesce readily in the act of the majority.

In the Courts of Appeal, the decision of the Court is the decision of the majority of the judges. Why should the enforced unanimity of twelve minds, far less accustomed than they to weigh questions of law and evidence, be considered essential to the ends of justice? We are convinced it is not essential, and the sooner this "preposterous relic of barbarism," as it is called by Mr. Hallam, is done away with, the better will it be for the interests of justice.

In Scotland and in France the majority of the jury prevails in criminal cases, but it will be observed that in England it is proposed still to exact uniformity in criminal cases, leaving civil cases only to be decided by a majority of the jury. Is it obvious the question is open to discussion; and it is worthy of considération whether, in questions involving life or death, the fact of a dissenting minority in a verdict of guilty, might not often tend to paralyze the arm of justice, and produce a sort of compromise in the infliction of punishment, which cannot be justified on any ground of principle. We doubt whether it would be possible to hang a prisoner for murder when a jury found him guilty only by a majority. And yet on what principle could a milder punishment be inflicted? If the executive be satisfied that the verdict is right, the law ought to take its course—except so far as mercy may intervene. If it hesitates because the jury differed in opinion, and therefore remits the penalty of death, assuredly it has no right to commute a man to imprisonment for life when it did not dare hang him because it doubted whether he was guilty at all.

OUR PUBLICATIONS.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY—PRICE 10 CENTS, OR $4 A YEAR.

This most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has become the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, forming a pictorial contemporary history of the world. It contains every new and important Invention, Portraits of the Leaders of Society, Sketches of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of the Day, New Buildings, Paintings, Sculptures, &c. Its Literary columns present a weekly feast by many distinguished Novelists, Original Tales, Sketches, Criticisms, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper (With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)	20 00

One copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the complete Lady's Book published) for one year..... 7 00

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA,

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner,

Three magnificent gift plates of unprecedented value and beauty.

First Gift Plate.

The late lamented "President Lincoln receiving the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House."

This was given with No. 1 and 3.

Second Gift Plate.

"His Only Pair," a splendid fac simile of Thomas Faed's celebrated picture.

This picture cannot be purchased for less than thirty dollars at any store; size 28 inches by 34.

Third Gift Plate.

"Grant in Peace," one of the most beautiful and interesting pictures ever issued.

This will be given to all purchasers of No. 39, and will be published on the 15th February.

N. B.—All the above are admirably adapted for framing.

The above three superb pictures will be given to every person subscribing in a few days hereafter, to FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER, or to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

Each Number contains a variety of Short Stories from our best American Writers, Sketches of Fashionable Society, Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Manners and Customs of all Nations, Records of the Olden Times, Heroic Passages in History, Portraits and Biographies of the Self-Made Men of America, Lectures for Young Folks, Gossip for the Ladies, Wit and Humor, Comic Pictures, besides new features of great interest and value constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and the completest Household Journal published. It is also a splendid Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year	20 00

(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)

One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year..... 7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine.

With nearly 150 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Fashion Plate, forming, during a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian Embroidery, and an exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll, with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored Lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Lady"—and a Doll model in her walking costume, the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the February and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, $3 50; four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the amount.

Subscriptions to be sent to

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and is the great satirical paper of America.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cents a number, or $1 50 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 50.

Illustrated Almanacs for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—60 Eng.....50 cents with 4 Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—60 Eng..... with four Lithographic Pictures.

Frank Leslie's Comic Almanac—60 Eng.....15 cents

A copy of any of the above Illustrated Almanacs sent gratis to every person sending a year's subscription to either of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspapers, Chimney Corner or Lady's Magazine.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

POSTPONEMENT.

The magnificent PRESENTATION PLATE for all Subscribers to FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER, will be ready for delivery to every Purchaser of No. 39 of that great family newspaper. No. 39 will be issued on the 15th of February.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DECLINED.—My Particular Friend—In Memoriam—A Hero's Death—The Color Sergeant—A Love Lay—The Dying Year—Grief—Spring—Sonnet—Confession—Country Beloved Guard—The Sea-Cliff—Where First We Met—Cissy Dreams—A Strange Story—What a Prostitute Foot Brought a Pilgrim to Keyl—What is Life—Sonnet—Midnight Thought—Little Frederick—The Nymph of the Silver Lake—The Lost Will—Brotherhood Lodge.

ACCEPTED.—Locust Blossoms—The Lady in the Black Veil—The New Clerk—Bernardo—Then and Now—The Young Hollander—Wondrous Strange.

CENTENARY OF AMERICAN METHODISM.

By Rev. Abel Stevens, LL.D.

THIS year will be memorable for the Centenary celebration of American Methodism. The denomination has appointed the first day of January for the publication of a "Centenary Book," and various "tracts." It observes the first Sunday of the year with preparatory sermons and devotions. It intends to "make a year of it," and the financial results promise to be unprecedented in the Christian liberality in the New World. One of our own citizens has already helped a good deal in the spirit of giving. He himself proposed, in the outset, to raise two millions; it is now generally believed that the maximum will reach five millions. Many of these gifts are to be devoted to education. It is designed to establish a fund of two or more millions, the interest of which shall go to the seminaries and colleges of the church, present and prospective, but the principal be transmitted, unimpaired, to the next century. The overplus will be distribution in 1866.

The story of Methodism in England is 1739, when Wesley, Whitefield, the Countess of Huntingdon and their associates, laid its foundation. Its general Centenary was celebrated in 1839, when the American church raised about half a million dollars for denominational purposes.

But American Methodism has its own memorable epoch. Its origin was singularly humble and singularly illustrious. Wesley, in 1769, had sent preaching into Ireland, in 1758, found, in the county of Limerick, a strange community of Germans, exiles from the Palatinate on the Rhine, who were called "Palatines." As they had no preacher using their own language for 50 years, they had almost lost the use of their mother-tongue; but the Methodist "itinerants" got in among them, and at a subsequent visit Wesley describes them as "thoroughly reformed, and indeed a large Methodist church; there was now "no drunkenness, no bickering, no cursing, no swearing, no oaths;" among them: their "diligence had turned all their land into a garden!" The great Founder affirms that "'tares such these," as these Palatines possessed, "could not be found anywhere else in Ireland or England," and a historian of Methodism declares that, in Philadelphia, years later, pointed to them as a model agricultural community, who had improved the value of real estate in the county.

In 1760 a company of this interesting people emigrated to New York, among them were the Embury, Hecks, Switzers, Dulmadges, and others, whose names are yet familiar among us, through their highly respectable descendants. Embury had been a "local brother" of Methodism in Ireland, but being a mechanic and of undoubting speech, he did not venture to preach in New York. The little Palatine company therefore fell away from their Methodistic discipline. Barbara Heck, however, had her old German Bible, and was faithful to it. On entering, casually, into Embury's house, and seeing the cards, threw them into the fire. Thence she went to Embury's house, and admonished him to begin immediately to preach again to them, warning him that their "blood would be required at his hands." She went out, and soon returned with his first congregation, consisting of five persons. Thus began, in 1760, American Methodism, in the private house of Philip Embury—of which we give a picture—and thence it spread out till it became the predominant form of Protestantism in the New World.

Embury's house was soon crowded. One day a military officer, in full regimentals, appeared in the humble assembly, not without creating a sensation among them; but his devout participation in their worship quickly allayed their anxiety, by proving that he was one of the fraternity, though whence he had come none of them knew. At the close of the service he reported himself as "Captain Thomas Webb, of the royal artillery, and a soldier of the Cross," and a spiritual son of John Wesley." We give a portrait of him; he is a notable character in our history. Webb, Wesley had made him a local preacher; the government had sent him out as barrack-master at Albany; leaving there of these few Methodists in New York, he hastened to the city to see them. He wore a seven years' wound in the face, for he had lost it in fighting under Wolf, at Quebec; he had also been wounded at Louisburg. He immediately began to preach to the new church, and preached with power. A preacher in regimentals, with his sword lying across the Bible before him, was an exciting novelty to the people. All the little city (comparatively) of that day was stirred. Embury and his good Captain had to beat up for larger quarters. They hired a "rigging loft," of which we give a sketch. It is famous in Methodist annals, and canes made of its old timbers are precious relics throughout the denomination. But the rigging loft could not long suffice, and "Old John Street Church" soon rose, though with the humblest proportions, as our illustration shows. Embury, being a carpenter, made with his own hands the pulpit, and, afterwards mounted it, and preached the valedictory sermon. It has been rebuilt several times, and is to-day a noble edifice, though always entrusted, and one of the most sacred monuments of the city.

Captain Webb was a mighty preacher; he was compared to Whitefield, and Whitefield, in a much braver very spirit, "preached like a lion." The elder President Edwards used to delight to hear him, and speaks of him, in his published diary, as "the old soldier—one of the most eloquent men I ever heard!" Having forbidden Methodism, its new chapel, the Captain went preaching through Long Island, New Jersey, Philadelphia, Delaware, Maryland, etc., the beginning of denomination in Philadelphia and other places. He spent about ten years in the Colonies, building up the work with all his might. At the revolution he returned to England, and there "died in the faith," honored by the whole Methodist world. He was a gallant, generous, devoted and most lovable man.

Embury kept at his religious work till Wesley sent over successors, or regular Methodist preachers, when he gladly resigned his pulpit to them. He retired with a little colony of his friends to Salem, Washington county, New York, where he died in 1774. He was buried on the farm of one of his Palatine friends, a substantial man, who built a church in a century, without a stone to mark the place, his remains were disinterred, with solemn ceremonies, and borne by a long procession to the city neighborhood, on burial ground, where his monument records that he "was the first to set up in America a train of measures which resulted in the founding of John street Church, the cradle of American Methodism, and the introduction of a system which has benefited the whole land, and which, and increased the joys of heaven!" His family, with other Palatines, subsequently founded Methodism in Canada.

This article has already sufficiently referred to some of the features of our congregation's history—scene and grave, the old rigging loft, and old John Street Church, Captain Webb, etc. Of the two Wesleys we need say nothing—they are known throughout the religious world; the one as the great apostle and legislator of Methodism, the other as its unrivalled hymnist, whose lyrics are fast finding their way into the hymn books of all English-speaking churches. Adam Clarke and Richard Watson have been the recognized "commentators" of Methodism; their great works on the Holy Scriptures and on Christian Theology, than anything else for the training of the Methodist mind throughout the world. We give a picture of St. Paul's Church, the cathedral of the Episcopal branch of the church of the denomination. It has similar, if not quite equal, edifices in Boston, Newark, Philadelphia (lately begun), Wilmington, Chicago, etc. Our other portraits represent the present bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Francis Asbury, of whom we give a likeness, is considered the representative man of American Methodism. He was the first episcopal Bishop, and the first itinerant Bishop consecrated to the office in the Western hemisphere. He was a heroic, a gigantic character, preaching almost daily for forty years. He traveled over the Union at the rate of about 6,000 miles a year, equal to the circumference of the globe every three years; he presided at no less than 224 Methodist Annual Conferences, and ordained more than 4,000 preachers. He continued to preach when he was too old and infirm in the pulpit, but had to sit in it, and often to be carried to and from it. He began his episcopal career in 1784, when the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and when it comprised less than 15,000 members, and but 83 preachers. He fell, in death, about 71 years old, at the head of an army of more than 211,000 members, and more than 700 preachers. He died in the Methodist hosts moving, by his own activity, for 45 years.

The success of American Methodism is one of the greatest events of religious history. Little less congregation of five persons, in Embury's house, in 1766, has a million communicants of churches, from the northernmost frontier of Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, from Nova Scotia to California, and the whole country is dotted with Methodist colleges of the most elegant structures. There are now in the United States, in the Centenary year, 19,000 preachers, 1,901,164 communicants; adding three non-communicant members of its congregations for each communicant (which is considered by the Methodist calculation), it has nearly or influence 7,604,656 souls—between one-fifth and one-fourth of the whole national population. But the numbers of Methodism in New York were founders of it also in Canada, and Methodism has in its congregations a large proportion of the population there. Aggregately, there are now, in the United States and Canada, as the result of the Methodism of 1766, 1,077,170 Sunday-school scholars, and 14,000 teaching presbyters; 15,000 local preachers; 230 colleges and academies, with about 23,000 students; 32 periodical publications, from the Child's Paper to the Quarterly Review, and about 8,000,000 of people.

Methodism, throughout the world, is now estimated at 3,000,000 of members and 12,000,000 of hearers. Geographers state the Protestant population of the globe at 80,000,000. According to this estimate, the communicants of Methodism alone constitute more than 1-27th of all the Protestantism of the world. As these 80,000,000 of Protestants, however, include all the Protestant populations, whether "professed" Christians or not, the Methodist part of this mass, according to the above figures, must amount to between one-sixth and one-seventh of the whole.

Franchise and Representation.

The Congressional Joint Committee on Reconstruction, consisting of six Senators and nine Representatives, have agreed to the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which will require to its adoption the votes of two-thirds of both branches of Congress, and the subsequent ratification of the Legislatures of three-fourths of all the States of the Union:

ARTICLE ——. Representatives and Direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: provided, that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State, on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

This is substantially the same provision which exists in the Constitution of the State of New York, which provides that in calculating the basis of representation, "aliens and persons of color not taxed," shall not be counted. It provides, in effect, that South Carolina, for instance, shall not have three members of Congress over and above what her white population would entitle her to have, unless they shall really represent people who have some voice in their election. The provisions of this amendment would apply to all States where suffrage is based on color, whether North or South, although practically the effect would be felt sensibly only in the late Slave States. As we have several times had occasion to say, unless an amendment of this kind be embodied in the Constitution, the whites of the lately rebel States will be represented in Congress by thirty-three more members than an equal number of whites in the loyal States will count back into the Union with thirteen more representatives than they were entitled to before the abolition of slavery!

Apart from the question of the prudence of continuing to these States such a disproportion of political power, we are to consider whether it is just to the white men of the North to permit them to be outvoted by what are practically the votes of four millions of black men, but cast without their consent by the whites of the South! Of the equity of such an amendment as that proposed, there can be no question.

NOTHING better evinces the truth and strength of republican institutions than their self-reliance. They are not the servants of opinion and admit the utmost license of censure, while such governments as France cannot tolerate even the mildest form of criticism, or the mildest admonition. Not a week passes but some English, Belgian, German, or American newspaper is suppressed in the French, but more especially the Parisian, post-office. The imposture of imperialism confesses its weakness by all of its acts, but its meanness finds its strength to express criticism and dissent. On the other hand, we have published in New York several newspapers in foreign languages, organs of Irish precedent and Spanish vair-glory, hostile to our institutions sustained by foreign subsidies, misrepresenting our policy, vilifying our leaders, and libelling our society from day to day and week to week, and yet permitted to go on their base and disreputable way without hindrance, and with only now and then a reproof which is only mirthful because it is contemptuous. American generosity is like that of the Duke Toby to the fly, "go away, wretched insect, the world is large enough for you and me!" That is the prevailing sentiment as regards the Franco-Austro-Hungarian organs in this city, called the Courrier des Etats Unis. Through disreputable work and abuse of America in Europe, several needy expatriates are of humanity, of Gallic origin, have succeeded in obtaining a cheap red ribbon in their buttonholes, and a significant amount of money to pay for a fillet and perhaps a glass of absinthe daily —highest ambition of fellows who might better have been sent to the tailors—as they would be in America have been, except when they were of the higher "profession" of dancing-masters. The number of the French organ is only to express the suicide of the wretched Archbishop of Paris, who shot himself in the Seine Pacific, because the Chilians captured one of his vessels. But to comfort its readers and illuminate the garlic-scented back rooms of restaurateurs, where ill-regarded as an oracle, it invents, out of whole cloth, a supplement to the story, to the effect that the Cowadinga, the vessel captured by the Chilians, had been retaken, and that the Esmeralda, the sole Chilian vessel of war, had been put to flight. Now these are the Courrier and no other information. They invented the intelligence, and debased journalism so far as was in their power—which, fortunately, was not much. They hope the news is true, in order that the momentary stain that attached to a European flag may be effaced. Unless European flags keep within their proper sphere, our fragrant friends will find that both haute and flags will disappear together. If Spain prosecutes her contest with Chile and Peru, it will be at the expense of the overthrow of the Bourbon dynasty. If Louis Napoleon persists in Mexico, it will be at an equal cost.

THE Emperor of the French held his annual levée on New Year's Day, and expressed a hope that he might "augur a long day of peace and prosperity for the world," a prophecy which, as the augur is also Caesar, may possibly be realized. At least the peace may, but prosperity must wait till Europe ceases to keep every tenth male in idleness, to order that he may prey on future period protect the other nine. Europe is at peace just as a soldier is at ease when marching under a hot sun with rumors respectfully, and even confidently, current that the ball will roll on through all time. And why should not peace be given to the good purposes for which it is now used.

And then, before this paper reaches its hebdomadal readers, the Rt. Hon. Gentleman will come off, and that is promised to be the affair of the year. We shall look for a splendid, perhaps illustrated, and send its beauties down to posterity.

After this comes the Artim and Liederkranz, easily which, as we have already remarked, but this year expect to tell us that they will both be failures, for the simple reason that the managers have made an attempt to destroy the goose that lays the golden eggs. This they are attempting to do by charging too much for their tickets. Two dollars each, the second $15, with an extra charge for extra Index. To the Artim this is a doubtful experiment, but to the Liederkranz it will be struggle through, though not with an attendance such as in past years; but to the Liederkranz it is certain that it will have many additional balls—and, without exception, they declare that they will not give $15 for a ball ticket, and that is our opinion. It is not yet too late for the society to change its determination, and we hope it will. If they have done this to guard against the cheap and disreputable crowd, as they assert, no greater mistake can be made. The improper characters are the very ones that will not complain of the high price of tickets will not deter them. They always have plenty of money, which they will spend lightly, and they will not feel their presence a blessing as a matter of business. We assure the gentlemen managers of these balls that there is no surer way to keep away the crowd that has made the attendance for the past years, than to kill their balls past all resuscitation.

THE Arion Society gave a grand reception at their rooms in Germania Hall, Bowery, below First street, on Tuesday evening, January 30, which was largely attended. These receptions are an extraordinary feature in the organization. The management has possessed a wonderful charm of novelty to the inquiring mind. Each season a room, a hall, or a house is fitted up or hired, fitted up with a stage at either end. Around the walls are placed tables of life, of every kind. Midway in the room is built a pupil, representing a tub or fountain, from which flows lager beer. Around this the room a thousand or more men, each with a fool's cap and bells upon his head, was admitted without without the cap and bells upon his head, was admitted without cut this adornment- and perhaps as many ladies, all of whom are waited upon by the Arion waiters with their super-atemmed glasses before them.

Among the many things, of which there is a very fine one, plays beautiful airs, and from the tub-pulpit or the stage come forth songs, glees, and other music or dances performed. This is continued until midnight, when the tables and chairs are removed, and dancing commences, which is kept up till daylight. There are, in addition to the above, numerous smaller rooms, and all the conveniences necessary for enjoyment while a "reception" lasts. In a hasty glance we will provide any one having the entree or society badge with a fool's cap and bells, that he may be one of the evening, begging it subject to his call all through the season. The intention of the Arion Society is good, and the way that our German fellow-citizens enjoy themselves.

Lacking of amusements brings us naturally to the ball. New York is, for the first time of it, but also, for the uncertainty of all human happiness, a heavy fall season. Not a single ball of any kind is to be given in the month of January, and the season is unprecedented. This has not been the case in all Christian times, for we have known the cessation of skaters, and the failure of ice in winter is a by no means unusual thing, but a failure of balls is unique. But it is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and, as a consequence, theatres and theatres are joyful. It sends up the audiences to summer heat, and fills the pockets of managers. We have not yet forgotten when the ice is bad at Central Park and when Major Cahoon kept the rooms at Fort Schuyler look glad.

In the face of this fact, we have nothing new to record at the Opera House.

MR. Booth, at the Winter Garden, has varied himself with Shylock's "Revenge is my Bliss," and in so doing has kept up stronger houses than Hamlet would have done. The New York public are not unlike a child, who, even with Edwin Booth as an exponent. They have stickto-it-iveness.

WALLACK'S has produced "The Rivals," one of Sheridan's most amusing comedies, which has not been seen for years; and Mr. Robinson, the new actor, has given us a new edition of Sir Anthony Absolute, quite unknown to version, that shows the refined actor.

LAURA KEENE has produced a charming all of us with "Leah," and filling her house densely every night. She is backed by her very efficient stock company. Mr. Jamieson; she has made her mark—a mark that can never be obliterated—and we only omit to say that we recognized.

MR. Wood's New Theatre, "The Balloon Wedding" has been withdrawn, while the Hanlons and the "Wonders" of Humanity" are drawing full houses at Niblo's Saloon. Chanfrau is doing "Toodles" and other good things, and Mr. Wood is preparing a new piece with "Paddy Shingle," and we presume, will until time is old. His house does and deserves such as, for there is nothing new on the stage to equal it.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The number of unpardoned rebels who have taken the oath of allegiance is 7,000. Virginia as follows: "Seven hundred or then fall under the $20,000 and the remainder under the general clause." In congress, in the State army officers, 152; rebel generals, 127; prominent civil officers, 58; rebel governors, 8; officers of the United States navy, 116.

A movement is on foot to erect a monument to Henry Winter Davis, in Baltimore. Over $3,000 have been subscribed for the purpose.

——The Nashville Blood Horse Association offers a stake for the spring meeting of sweepstakes for all ages, three miles, $500 entrance, $200 forfeit, $3,000 to be added by the proprietors; conditions, that two of the best horses from Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, and Kentucky, before running elsewhere, enter and run. The race is to be run on the second day of the fair, and the winning horses run: entries to be made before April 1st; the race to be run during the spring meeting of the spring meeting.

A bill is pending in Congress to amend the naturalization laws, by striking out the words "free white" where they occur, so as to make all persons, except Indians, capable of being naturalized as American citizens.

AMONG the instructions passed by the House of Representatives is one directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the propriety of requiring all fire and marine insurance companies to invest it government securities, and deposit a certain per centage of their capital and receipts in the Treasury of the United States, for the better security of the insured in any part of the United States, under such rules and regulations as Congress shall prescribe.

The following is a country gentleman's answer to a letter from the Department, stating that another woman claims to be the widow, by a prior marriage of a deceased volunteer, for whose second widow he had filed a claim for pension: "I have not seen Mrs. A. for more than a year. I have heard lately that the dead soldier was alive again; in fact, had got out of the army by getting a bogus discharge. I have kept him close, know nothing about the first wife, but know that he was a woodchuck by nature, and that he is honest, and that I married them before he went into the army."

——California has again been visited with heavy rains and extensive freshets. Sacramento, perhaps the most exposed town in the state, has been saved by extensive efforts, and its substantial dykes from serious damage, a destructive tornado occurred at Geneva, Nevada, on the 6th inst.

——The articles of incorporation of a new railroad company called the "La Crescent, Rochester and Winona Railroad Company," has been filed with the Minnesota Secretary of State. The object is to construct a railroad from the Mississippi river through the southern tier of Minnesota counties to the Missouri river. The capital is $10,000,000.

——The report of the Georgia Commission to prepare a system of laws for the government of freedmen has been made. It provides that all persons of color shall have the right to acquire property, make contracts, sue and be sued, inherit property, and have testimony in all civil cases when the rights of colored persons are involved. The law of apprenticeship shall be accused is a person of color. The report recommends that organizations in each county of the State, for which precisely the same redress will be afforded the negro as is afforded the white man. The Governor, in recommending this report, says: "While we insist upon the immediate return to the State of every full citizen of the governing class, let us fully and fairly meet the responsibility."

——The new United States Telegraph line, west of Chicago, on the Pacific route, is a perfect success. Since no one was injured at Clinton, Cedar Rapids, or Bonville, Iowa. The office at Omaha will be opened in 6 days, and the intermediate stations completed in a fortnight. Twelve in number, will be opened without delay.

——The Democratic State convention of certain newspapers in Pennsylvania, for the too frequent exercise of the appointing power, a correspondent of the Pittsburg Commercial gives the official figures, which we have to thank our correspondent for, and circulate in Allegheny County during the last 12 years. For the five years of the administration of Gov. Curtin 53 persons convicted of crimes have received clemency at his hands. Of these 19 were murderers, and 5 horse thieves. 45 pardons were issued; and for the whole period of seven years 1,000 persons have received executive clemency.

——At the late convention of colored people held at Louisville, Ky., resolutions were passed declaring universal suffrage, but favoring the voting of such colored men as can read and write well, and the payment of the proper qualifications; that all vices and crimes among freedmen should not be condoned; that the Freedmen's Bureau should compel negroes to work, and provide summary laws for that end; and also declared that Southern property should not be confiscated; and recommended the resolution that the Southern States are practically Territories.

——Capt. Henry A. Stolle, of the 2d Illinois cavalry, was brought under arrest near Springfield, Ill., on a charge of murder. He was stabbed in seven places and received five gunshot wounds, any of which would have caused his body. The object of the murderers was no doubt robbery, as the pocket of the deceased contained valuable documents, including, as is supposed, about $500.

Foreign.—The Russian government has complained to that of the British Museum. When Mr. Panizzi was librarian he had a number of books, and when the librarian he offered to Sir Edmund Head, a distinguished scholar and privy councillor.

——Lucrezia Borgia is interested in a case before the London Courts. In giving judgment on a question of boundling Lords Justices Wood and Turner quoted Victor Hugo's drama of his predecessor, and ruled that a testator cannot forget his wife, even if she has been very bad to him, but he must both know and approve of the contents of the instrument, or be without a will.

——In consequence of imperative orders from the Austrian Governor of Holstein, the long-established and well-conducted public observatory at Altona will cease to exist. It is to be transferred to Kiel, and a commission has been appointed to superintend the removal of the observatory instruments and staff.

——Rare bargains in rich old Rome are daily turning up from out of the grave of the Eternal City. The Danish Minister, Count Moltke Huitfeldt, reports that there have recently come to light new traces of the gorgeous Imperial chambers of Caligula. Columns are adorned with bass-relief, marble columns, one or two inches, fine, beautiful, and perfect as if they had left the care of the best period of art. At Ostia discovery is daily unfolding more and more the ancient town, the vines, near the baths of Caracalla, Monsignore Guidi has come upon a magnificent mosaic pavement, in skeleton, life size, with the inscription in Greek letters, signifying "Beware of Canis!" The last is supposed to be of the time of the Antonines.

——After many parties, the scheme for erecting an archæological museum at Athens seems likely to be put in practice. The Greek government has granted a site for the edifice at the Polytechnic, and applied to the plans proposed by Professor Lange, of Munich, for the erection of a museum of the same kind at Copenhagen. Of its kind, nothing can be more desirable in Greece than the formation of a place of refuge for the many ancient treasures which turn up from the soil of the country. Many of these have been but the other day found in Mr. Barnadaki, a Greek merchant of St. Petersburg. Indeed, some time ago, Athens had a museum of the first instance, and when a beginning was made, an equal interest was at once aroused towards the end of the building in question. More subscriptions have been received, and the government has given a site between nearly a commencement of the work.

——A great conflagration in London, who is desirous of emulating Miss Muskin in Mazeppa, has proposed to several awareness offers of a life policy, but has, in each case, been refused, in consequence of the dangerous nature of the risk.

——The late M. Dupin is said to have left 11 wills at his death so seriously were the lawyers employed on the occasion when it was read could not prevent the effect when the good man doubtless intended to produce. He left $6,000 a year between nearly a dozen nephews and nieces.

ELECTRICITY AS A VITALIZING AGENT.

THE celebrated French physician, Du Bois, who made electricity a life-long study, used frequently to experiment upon the human dead body and on occasion, a man who had died in a hospital, in Paris, was experimented upon. He had been dead some twenty-four hours, and before the operation commenced rigor mortis had not set in. The body was then carefully examined by Du Bois and his assistants, and every appearance of death was observed. When all was prepared an electric shock was given to the corpse, and to the surprise of all present, it opened its eyes. Another and a stronger shock was given; the dead man sat up in a sitting posture, made a spasmodic effort to breathe, tried to speak, and then fell back dead. It was found that more experiments were tried with similar results.

Late at Saint Mandrier, Dr. Crochet, after much lifegiving power to the dead, what must it be to the living, who are not dead, but ailing? In it was developed a vitalizing agent with the most beneficial results.

At the New York Medical Institute, No. 9 Union Square, electricity and galvanism are the curative agents used in almost all kinds of diseases. The faculty of the Institute have made the science of electricity their special study, and have done wonders in curing the most obstinate and stubborn diseases. The last annual report of the establishment verifies this statement. Out of 8,127 persons registered, 4,686 have been cured, and 407 described as benefited; the remainder have not yet been heard from. For nervous, pulmonary and venal complaints, and in the fearful malady a deficiency of vital power, there is no doubt that electricity—as the celebrated John Wesley said—as a theory and medicines in one.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE INDIAN TRIBES—THE SIOUX MAKING MEDICINE.—FROM A SKETCH BY C. MORLIAN.

SUPERSTITIOUS RITES OF INDIAN TRIBES.

THE superstitious rites of savage nations will ever possess strange interest to enlightened minds, so closely do they resemble the religious observances of the classic Greek, the barbaric Goth, and the primeinble Roman, of ancient days. The accompanying sketch presents most forcibly to the imagination the "mother operandi" of the Sioux in "making medicine," or, as would be said in the English language, invoking the assistance of their gods before venturing their lives upon the field of battle, or, in the common parlance of the Indian races, the war-path.

When an expedition for hostile purposes has been fairly decided upon by the council of a village or tribe, the High Priest, or, in other words, the "Big Medicine Man," gives notice to the Indians that there will be a meeting of the whole tribe at some suspicious time, which is generally in the evening, for the purpose of "making medicine." As the time approaches, the chiefs of the war-party and the medicine man array themselves for the ceremony: this is done by denuding themselves of all superfluous clothing, retaining only that which decency requires, and placing on their heads a kind of mask, which completely envelops the head and blindfolds the wearer; this mask, however, is worn only by the assistants; the mask worn by the "medicine man" is usually part of the skull of a buffalo with horns attached, which is put on the head in such a manner as to leave the wearer a partial use of his eyesight, the only obstacle to his complete vision being the difference in distance between his own visual organs and those of the animal through whose eye-sockets he is gazing. All being prepared, and the hour arrived, a fire is lighted, around which the whole village take their stand, leaving an open circle of some 35 or 40 feet in diameter in their midst. The first part of the ceremony which then ensues reminds one forcibly of the sacrificial observances of the Jewish nation, as delineated in the Old Testament, the only obvious difference being in the animal sacrificed and the manner of death. The dog whose unlucky fate it is to provitiate the anger of the "Great Spirit" and obtain for the Indians his countenance and assistance, is brought into the limits of that dusky circle, and there hung by the neck till dead. This method of killing their offering, is, we believe, peculiar to these prairie Indians, for though the "Meriahs" of Khondistan are killed by suffocation, and the human sacrifices of some other savage nations by strangulation, produced by pressure with bamboos, yet we had never heard of any nation who deliberately hung the victims of their sacrifices until acquainted with these western savages. The dog being dead, the "medicine man" and his assistants, who have, during his expiring struggles, been dancing around him to the music of a wild chant, extemporized for the occasion, take down the carcass, and while one of the assistants is engaged in cutting it up in small pieces, with a view, no doubt, to its easier digestion by their gods, (of course by proxy, for the delicious canine morsels are eaten by the "medicine man,") the remainder continue to dance around the fire, flourishing their tomahawks and other implements of war, and chanting some low, monotonous tune, occasionally enlivened by some hideous yell; this continues without intermission until the dog has been completely dismembered and fairly roasted, when the chanting and dancing cease, and the actors in this mummery partake of a plenteous supper of dog-meat, after which the dancing becomes more general, the ceremonies being carried usually far into the wee sma' hours of the night.

Though far from believing in the efficacy of these proceedings, we yet think that as a religious observance this "medicine-making" of the Sioux will not compare unfavorably with the superstitious rites of our own ancestors, before the light of Christianity had revealed to them the error of their ways.

THE COUNT OF POZES DULCES.

DON FRANCISCO FELIS, COUNT OF POZES DULCES, is now one of the best known men of Cuba, not less on account of his talents and attainments, than because he is at the head of progressive ideas in his country. Although approaching 70 years of age, he is physically and mentally active and vigorous, of fine presence and elegant manner. Addicted to books from earliest youth, cultured through travel in Europe and the United States, he fills with admirable tact, ability and usefulness the post of editor of El Siglo, one of the leading daily journals of Havana. Aside from his editorial duties, the Count of Pozes Dulces has published several works on several industrial subjects. His life has been remarkable for that storms, and has not been free from political persecution. He was once rich, but his pen is now the support of those years to which most men look forward as a period of repose.

THE COUNT OF POZES DULCES, EDITOR OF "EL SIGLO," HAVANA, CUBA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY N. MESTRE & CO., HAVANA.

DUCK SHOOTING ON THE CHESAPEAKE.

WHAT one of us that has not smacked his lips over the precious bird? How many of us that have welcomed them with hospitable hands to the range of our fowling-pieces, and bagged them with a shudder of delight!

The canvas-back duck returns from its breeding places at the north about the 1st of November, and during the winter extends its visits to the southern parts of the seacoast of the United States. It is not unfrequently shot in the eastern part of the Great South Bay of Long Island, in Long Island Sound, on the shores and bays of New Jersey, at Squan Beach, Barnegat, Egg Harbor, and in the estuary of the Delaware; but, in all these localities, it is but a common duck, in nowise superior to any other, and decidedly inferior to the red-head.

It is only in the Chesapeake Bay, about the confluence of the Potomac and Susquehanna Rivers, where it becomes itself the king of all wild fowl. This excellence is attributable solely to the peculiar food which it finds in that estuary, a plant commonly known as wild celery, botanically as the vallisneria spiralis, or valisneria Americana, which is on no account to be confounded with the sistera marina, or common eel-grass. This plant, of which the canvas-back duck is so fond, that it derives from it its specific name of vallisneria, grows on shoals, where the water is from eight to nine feet in depth, which are never wholly bare. It has long, narrow, grass-like blades, and a white root somewhat resembling small celery, whence it has its vulgar name; although it is unnecessary to say that it has no real connection whatever with that plant. This grass is, in some places so thick as materially to impede a boat, when rowed through it, by the opposition it affords to the oars. It is on the root alone of this grass that the canvas-back feeds. For these roots the canvas-backs dive assiduously and continually, tearing up the grass, and strewing it on the surface of the water, in long, regular windrows, like hay from the mower's scythe. The duck rises to the surface as soon as he has obtained the reward of his labor, in the shape of his favorite root, which he cannot swallow under water; and, before he has got his eyes well open, says Mr. Wilson—though, with all due deference to the eloquent pioneer of American ornithology, it may be well doubted whether so expert a diver as the canvas-back ever stands his eye—is robbed of his meal by the impudent widgeons, or bald-pates, as they are called in America, which never dive, but, being equally fond of the root of the valisneria, depend on their adroitness and agility to rob the industrious canvas-backs.

On this account the bald-pates congregate eagerly, as far as they are allowed to do so, with the canvas-backs; who, however, live in a constant state of contention with their thievish neighbors, and, being by far the heavier and more powerful fowl, easily beat off the widgeons, who are compelled to retreat, and make their approaches only by stealth at convenient opportunities. With the canvas-backs also associate the redheads, the sonups, or, as they are called in the Chesapeake, the black-heads, and some other varieties, with which they feed on terms of amity.

The excellence of the flesh of the canvas-backs causes them to be much sought after for the market, but in the waters which they frequent they are so strictly preserved by the real sportsmen, who abound in that part of the country, and have obtained the control of most of the shores, that the worst methods of poaching are prohibited. The canvas-backs will not fly, like geese and many of the species of ducks, to decoys; and the anchoring of batteries on the feeding flats, and the sailing after the ducks on their grounds with boats, are not permitted under any circumstances, which has preserved thus far this delicious fowl from extermination. The ordinary mode of killing them is by shooting them on the wing, from behind screens, or blinds, as they are termed, of reeds, arranged on the projecting points of the land, over or in the vicinity of which the fowl are compelled to fly in going up or coming down the bay, to and from their feeding grounds. The velocity at which they fly, as well as the height of their course, renders it extremely hard to hit them; and a great allowance must be made in taking aim, in order not to shoot far behind the object, which will surely be the case if the sight of the gun be held directly n the passing fowl. Add to this, that the feathers on the breast of this duck, as of many others of the family, are so closely compacted together, of so thick and elastic texture, and so matted by the aid of the oil from the gland in the rump with which the bird fabricates them, that any ordinary shot, striking on the breast, as the fowl comes towards the shooter, will make no more impression than it would on the breast-plate of a French cuirassier. The best and most deliberate fowlers, therefore, when they have time to do so, let the flights pass, and then shoot them with the grain of the feathers.

DUCK SHOOTING ON CHESAPEAKE BAY BY NIGHT—SAILING ON THE DUCKS.

A remarkable propensity of these birds is to be attracted, with a most singular and insatiable kind of curiosity, by the appearance of any unusual sight on the shores; and anything of this nature will induce them to leave their feeding grounds, and swim in great flocks of thousands together, so fectly fearless, or rather reckless, to the places where men lie for them in ambush. It is said that the scaup, or black-head, can be allured in this manner more easily than the canvas-back; and that the red-heads and widgeons, when they are alone, cannot be deceived at all, though, when in company with others, they will fall into the same error, and accompany the flocks to their own destruction. Advantage has been taken of the habit to ensnare the unwary birds to their ruin, by a system which is called toling. It is thus practiced: A long range of screens is set up along the shore, within a few yards of the water mark, behind which the shooters lie concealed, with small openings at intervals to permit the egress and ingress of a small cur-dog, the more like a fox the better, and so also the odder his appearance and more remarkable his color, who is taught to run back and forward in front of the blinds, performing all sorts of curious tricks and antics, to attract the attention of the fowl. So soon as this object is attained, they will swim up in a body within easy gunshot; and so totally are they infatuated and demented by their curiosity, that so long as the shooter holds himself concealed, and the dog continues his deceptive gambols, so long can the stupid birds be drawn up, to receive volley after volley, until they are decimated or destroyed, perfectly regardless of their dead or wounded companions, through which they will continue to advance on the muzzle of the gun. The only thing necessary to be observed in this sort of shooting is, not to overshoot the flock, which the novice is sure to do, so deceptive is the effect of shooting over water.

The plan adopted by the oldest shooters is, in taking aim, to see the whole body of the nearest fowl, in a flock of hundreds, in clear relief above the sight of the gun, and then the charge will fall into the middle of the throng. By good sportsmen, toling, and indeed any other way of shooting canvas-backs than on the wing from points, is held rightly to be rank poaching. When the rivers begin to freeze, vast numbers of all these varieties of ducks congregate at the open air-holes, and fearful slaughter is made of them in hard weather at such places; and as many, it is said, as 80 canvas-backs having been killed at a single discharge of a heavy gun. Wounded canvas-backs are expert divers, and are extremely difficult to recover; wherefore it is usual, always, to be accompanied by a good Newfoundland retriever.

THE celebrated artist who crowed so naturally that the sun rose three hours before its time, has recently finished a picture of the moon, that's painted with such wonderful fidelity to nature, that it can't be seen in the daytime.

DUCK SHOOTING ON CHESAPEAKE BAY—THE BLIND.

DECEIVED.

BY FANNIE STEVENS BRUCE.

Blow from the north and blow from the east,
Oh, piercing April wind,
For truth is rare as the century plant,
And a friend is hard to find;
And thou art warmer, with all thy sting,
Than the soul of human-kind.

Smile in sunshine, and weep in rain,
Oh, changeful April sky!
For traitors are common as forest leaves,
And life is a gilded lie.
And them art less fickle, with all thy caprice,
Than the crowd that pass me by.

I had a love, and I held her dear
As the red rose holds its heart,
And I said, "Come want, or come toil to me,
She never shall feel those smart."
And my love grew cold in a single month,
And the next we were wide apart.

I had a friend, and I held him true
As the needle to the pole,
And I said, "My comfort is not afar,
Come pain, come shame, or come dole."
And my friend turned false in my sorest need,
And occasa between us roll.

I prayed a prayer for cold love and false friend,
Nor clearer word did I say,
Then I shut the hurt down into my heart,
But it gnawed there night and day.
It gnawed there still. Sweet Christ, I think
It never will go away.

Then change with each hour which dies, oh, sky,
And bitterly sting, oh, wind!
For vain, vain longings before me rise,
And useless regrets behind;
And on all the broad earth there is not a salve
For this hurt of heart and mind.

"CALIFA."

BY SANS SOUCI.

CHAPTER I.—THE HOME BY THE SEA.

All day long the sea-waves dashed
Against the grey old cottage wall;
All the wild, soft, softly dying,
Like a mantle wrapt 'round all.

No sound save the solemn murmur of the sea-waves rolling over the sandy shore broke the monotonous stillness of the sunset hour at Galveston Bay. The royally-tinted clouds lay piled in crimson and golden glory, smiling on the sparkling foam-crested waves, that sang their mournful music, like a spiritual chant, through the slowly dying hours.

Two figures were roaming, to and fro, with steps that kept sweet measure; one lithe, graceful, and bending as a syren's; the other commanding, proud, elastic as a monarch's, and were blending melodiously as the evening breezes when they met.

"You know not what you ask, Marcus Heath. I cannot be your wife!" and the words seemed to pass the pallid lips of the woman with a wailing agony, as the hand, which had rested on the strong arm, was withdrawn, and she stood alone. Her beautiful face looked then—this wild maiden by the sea, with her creamy, creole complexion—with the crimson blushes playing coquettishly upon her cheeks, and marking their kisses on her scarlet lips; with her weird, dark eyes, and her graceful form.

And Marcus Heath noticed it, too; and it influenced his fond and tender reply:

"Califa"—there was a world of sorrow in the cadence of his voice, as he spoke her name; and there was disappointment in his eye, as he sought to catch her glance. "Is it for this reward that I have labored so long at the 'Cottage'!—cut myself off from all communion with the outer world, to be beside you, and hoped to win you to my heart, and to give you to shappier home, though colder clime?"

"Nay, you must not, will not, reproach me, when I tell you all. Listen!" and to and fro the figures walked again, while only the woman spoke.

"Twenty years ago I was saved from shipwreck—a little baby, one year old. My parents were lost. I could murmur but a single word in my lisping accents, 'Califa.' I bore no mark—no clothing—nothing—by which I might be recognized, and 'father Worden' (as I have been taught to call him), the old fisherman, adopted me. I have learned to read and write, but am not fit wife for Marcus Heath; and, most of all, am too proud to submit to criticisms from the wealthy and cultivated. I possess refinement of feeling, at least. No, go to your proud Virginian home, and forget that your shipwreck ever threw you here. If you have lingered, I've tried to make you happy; and, Marcus, wherever you go, if you do remember me, let it be tenderly—as of a woman who loved you devotedly; so fondly, that she, at all risks, was willing to sacrifice her joy to your interest!"

She ceased to speak—the tears would come.

And does my darling think I desire to marry for personal considerations? Oh, no, sweet one. I seek you as my wife, because I love you, Califa; and, whatever doubt there may be of your social parentage in your present position, as Califa Heath, you would submit to no curiosity; and, whatever your limited opportunities for improving your intellect, I know you to be good and true, and refined in feeling beyond many who have lived in palaces, and beautiful as a dream. Only say you love me, Califa, for myself, and let sacrifice go to the winds. I want you to love me selfishly!"

He had turned, fired by the generous impulses of his nature, by his gallantry and passion, and again taken the young girl's hand; his arm stole softly about her waist, and, as her head was bowed to press his lips to her upturned brow, he whispered, so low that the winds could scarcely hear:

"Let my heart be your home, Califa, and sorrow shall never reach you. Only promise to be my wife."

Show me a woman over the breadth of the world who has the power to resist an appeal from the man she loves. Califa was no prodigy. She was so happy in her beautiful confidence that, had the gates of heaven opened to her then, she would have refused to enter without Marcus Heath. Therefore she answered timidly—

"If you love me, as you say you do, then my life is but a poor return for such devotion; but, such as it is, it is freely yours, if that were possible! But, oh, Marcus, never let any other earthly passion move you to desert me. Were this to happen, I would feel myself alone in all the universe, and die at your feet. This would be my vengeance."

She trembled with passionate excitement; the color burned upon her cheek, and her eyes fairly blazed in their liquid light. Awed and fascinated by the intensity of devotion, Marcus leaned in the breast of this child of the sea, he only kissed her, and said: "My life, my love!" very softly; and she was satisfied, and nestled happily.

When the twilight shadows fell, and the hollow murmur of the sea grew hoarser, the lovers turned toward the cottage, which stood about two hundred yards off, upon the jagged jutting of a cliff, which frowned on the waves below; and, during which time Califa busied herself in home preparations for the evening meal: and Marcus Heath, with a kind of dreamy pleasure, watched her every movement, saying, smilingly, to himself: "She is mine!"

"Father Worden" petted her—caressed her—called her his "elf"—his "fairy," and seemed to be inspired into activity and talkativeness by her mere presence—so entirely were the old man's heart-strings bound about his foster darling.

Never did the moon rise and smile over a sweeter picture than could be seen that eve at the Cottage: Father Worden, the fisherman, and the blue-eyed stranger, Marcus Heath, listening reverently to the holy words of prayer that rose, like an angel's refrain, from the sweet lips of the orphan girl.

Happy, deluded Califa!

CHAPTER II.—THE FAREWELL.—THE WANDERER.

The last kiss of spring
The last clasp of the hand—
And the wanderer goes forth
To his ceaseless land.

Not many days longer did Marcus Heath linger in the Cottage; for, having accomplished his desire in winning the heart of Califa, he felt the imperative necessity of going to Virginia to "make some final preparations," as he assured her, when he would return for her.

"And you will come back, Marcus? You will?—and you are not deceiving me?" The sweet face was bathed in tears, and quivering with pain.

"Come back, Califa? Why, surely, my darling! And I even want you to count the days, and to see that an ardent lover I am, for I'll be with you before the seasons change!"

They were standing on the sea-shore, and the little boat which was to convey Marcus Heath and the old man Worden to the town, about three miles down the bay, was gaily riding the gleaming waves. The tide was beginning to recede, and the white sand lay in bold relief overlying with its kisses but Califa's face.

"Oh, I believe you, Marcus," she exclaimed, with sudden fervor, flinging forceful arms about him. "I'll believe you, because I love you; but, if my life I plead with you, if you are going to deceive me, tell me now, for I shall die, and don't hold out impossible promises you don't intend to fulfill, that I may linger on, desperately wretched."

Softly, fondly, tenderly, he soothed and caressed her, until the old fisherman called out to him that it was time to leave when the wind was fair." Then, snatching one last kiss, one close, close caress, he tore himself away from the weeping girl. Califa, your heart I am going; and her heart should fail him, until fairly pushed from her sight, then he looked, and saw Califa far up the steep, her kerchief fluttering to the breeze. The signal was answered, and again and again, turning, saw the fluttering farewell; and Marcus Heath sighed deeply.

At last, reaching the village on the coast, he said, when parting from the fisherman:

"I am not bidding you good-bye for all time. I am coming back again, and shall try to steal away from the ocean, to wear in my own heart. Don't let Califa grieve for me. I am going; and here"—taking off a beautiful emerald ring—"give her this. I intended to do so this morning, but was so excited, it slipped my memory. Tell her it is Cupid's jewel; while its color is deep, as it is true, its love constant; when it pales, I will have become false. Good-bye."

He was turning away.

"As far as I speak," replied the old man, tremulously. "You know I'm true up, and body, in this child of mine, and wouldn't cross her for the world; but, if you love her, I'll give her to you, because she wants it with a life. She was born for better days than she has ever seen with me, and will make you a good wife. Come back soon, as you said, for she'll be miserable till you do; and, then, I'm getting old mighty fast, and I'm feeble, too."

After a few additional words they parted, and Marcus Heath breathed more freely when he found himself, ten hours later, on a homeward bound vessel. Old memories of the beautiful affiianced he had left in Richmond, months before, began to revive in his heart; and he pictured glowing scenes of how she would meet him; her joy—her surprise—and he grew quite excited; but suddenly, small those bright anticipations, there rose a melancholy, intensely painful. It was his farewell to beautiful Califa, the pearl of the sea. And, with real emotion, his heart resolved to be true to her.

Alas! how soon these flimsy resolutions of erratic passions fade or change—their basis governed entirely by the selfishness of external surroundings and physical comforts and enjoyments!

Hurried back to the scenes he had left eighteen months before—to the rush, and glare, and excitement of a life in the marts of the world, Marcus Heath could not long support his manly principle of constancy to the fond heart he had won; but, in a "Last Day," when the good and ill shall be summoned before God's tribunal, these broken hearts will rise as witnesses against the faithless accused.

The days were counted, with hopeful yet tearful waiting, by the dark-eyed Califa, until seven after season should have come to shine; until death, like a grim-visaged horror, stood without the cottage-door, silently waiting for the dying old man, who had set his life binding him to earth—his foster child; until despair and despair crept up beside her, as she sat weeping, alone and weary, above the flickering flames of the hearth-stone; or in the pale sunshine which hovered mournfully over the old trysting-places of happier days, in the white, sandy beach, where the hollow murmurs of the sea moaned their ceaseless chant. But the shadow of Marcus Heath never fell upon the threshold again, and Califa, stricken dumb with grief, realized that she was forsaken and broken-hearted, wretched and hopeless! God have mercy!

One night, when the moon smiled with solemn tenderness on the little home whose purity and happiness had been so desecrated, Califa stole down to the shore and seized the little boat, which lay floating calmly at its safe moorings, and, springing lightly, she pushed the gleaming sail, and putting out to sea, sat down to meet death, with yearning and tender sorrow for the agence of days that were dead, and could never come back to her."

"Where God directs me now, on the boundless track of the sea, I will go; even if it be to the depths of the coral caves, where the mermaids sleep," she said, clasping her hands softly together, while her dark eyes, too burning for tears, looked over the sleeping waters, as their pearly crests, kissed by the gleaming moonbeams, floated away to touch the shore. The pure suns rose and set before the little boat ceased its roaming over the waters. Then a steamer, bound for a northern port, hove to and captured it.

"A woman, by Jove!" said the captain of the craft; "and pretty, too; there is a key to this mystery, which we must discover."

And he did, in time; the girl attended and ministered to, as tenderly and respectfully as if she had been his sister.

Califa refused, for her reason, she concisely gave this information, and no more:

"I lived on the coast of Galveston Bay—my father and mother died some months ago, and nothing was left to me but starvation, and I preferred to die upon the open sea rather than there; and I will not be forced against my will from its mooring, believing God would direct me to a northern port, where I could find the only living friend I claim on earth—Marcus Heath."

"Where does he reside?" asked the good-hearted captain.

"Somewhere in Virginia. God knows where, Richmond, perhaps. I am not confident, though."

"Well, we first touch at Wilmington, N. C. and I will direct you in search of getting to Richmond. And I am only too sorry that I cannot aid you farther in your search. Yours is a most romantic wandering."

And he went away, suspecting more than his delicate feelings would allow him to express: and Califa, deep in thought, planned how she would wreak her revenge.

CHAPTER III.—THE WELCOME HOME—THE OLD BETROTHAL RENEWED—THE GOLDEN CORDON.

The world is dark with shadows—
'Tis a "wilderness of woe."
But, thank God! there glows
The sunbeams come and go!

The twilight shadows were gathering softly over the city of Richmond, lights were gleaming through half-drawn curtains; bazaar windows and chemist shops were brilliant with their thousand rainbow hues and dazzling jets of gas. And the tumult and bustle, when Marcus Heath, after two years of exile, stepped from a "hack," and rang the door-bell of a modest, tasty residence, on the corner of Grace and Ninth streets. The door was almost immediately opened, and exclamations of joy and surprise resounded from the servant who had answered the signal:

"Oh! Massa Marcus! de dead is come ter life!"

The excitement attracted attention in the parlor, and the master of the house, stepping in the hall, the cook, in a moment of disturbance, was equally surprised and delighted; heartily embracing our hero, he led him in the room, saying:

"Our wanderer has returned safely, and looks some as ever! Come, Nettie, no shy blushes; I know you're happy!"

This was the home of Mr. Clegg. Nettie was the affiance to whom his heart turned when he left the Cottage; but it was a joyous welcome which he received from every member of the family.

"Oh, dear Marcus," the little lady said, when they sat alone enjoying that sweet converse of the soul, so infinitely precious to lovers, "I feared you never would come back, when the months vanished, and we never heard of you. And, then, when the report came that the Adrienne had been shipwrecked—and we knew it was the vessel in which you had embarked—we all gave you up as lost; and I was so miserable!"

"But misery did not kill you, did it, ma belle?" and the gay gallant pressed the white hand, which rested in his own, tenderly.

"No; that seldom happens for broken hearts, but I had made a very firm resolution to be an old maid!" and a merry laugh rippled over the sweet lips of Nettie Craigg.

"But that resolution must be abolished instanter, for I shall not yield my claim to you; a claim which I won before you went ago; and I want my darling, as soon as possible, to designate the day when her smiles and blushes will brighten and beautify my home as the Cottage."

Mr. Craigg being consulted, it was decided that Nettie should go from the shadowing "roof tree" when the season consumed festivities welcomed in the New Year.

Almost half a year of freedom yet, for it was early September, and Marcus had been from the cottage on Galveston Bay since the July twelve months before; but travelling to Havana, and from thence to New York, he had only reached Richmond until all hopes of his return had faded. Califa's resolves to deny that many times in his thoughtful moments, his memory—his and his heart—reverted to those beautiful days when he roamed with Califa on the shore of the sea, listening to the musical murmur of the waters, and wooing her in his own, irresistible way; but that music thawed, to return to bear her from that music thawed, to return to bear her from the tropical and tempestuous clime to happier home. No! Califa was romance—Nettie Craigg was a reality. And then he put aside the remembrance, which, at times, would obtrude upon his cheeks, in spite of his control; and, finally, almost forgot that he had ever been shipwrecked and saved, been loved and remembered, in the shadows that played on the shores of Galveston Bay.

One day in December, so bright and balmy, that it seemed like a sweet prophecy of the coming Spring, Marcus Heath had called for Nettie Craigg "to take a promenade in the Capitol Square;" and with her hand upon his arm, chatting happily together, they had just issued from the house, when an organ-grinder walked quickly past them. It was a woman.

Oh, Marcus!" exclaimed Nettie, "do look at that beautiful organ-grinder! Now is she not lovely? And so picturesque!"

Marcus Heath turned his face towards the woman, and as he did so, he met the most wary vestige of color faded from his cheek, while his lips fairly gasped "Califa!"

But she was gone, and as Nettie Craigg was with him, he could not follow her.

"Why, Marcus, what is the matter? You act so strangely!" said the young girl, wonderingly and anxiously glancing in her lover's face.

"Nothing, oh, nothing; only a chance resemblance to an old friend made me start. Come to myself—" It was Califa; there were never other eyes like hers; and she looked as if she knew me, too!"

The walk in the "square" was not pleasant, as had been anticipated, and before almost any other promenaders were there, Marcus returned to Nettie's home. But a few moments did Marcus Heath linger there, either, for, professing "urgent business," he hastened down the street after the organ-grinder had taken, but no sign did he receive that any such character had passed that way. Inquiry only served to baffle him, for there were so many persons of that class in the city, that hunting or going never attracted attention; and at a last hope, after a weary and useless search, he sought his room at the "Spotswood," worn in body, and troubled in mind.

CHAPTER IV.—THE NIGHT BEFORE THE BRIDAL—THE MESSAGE.

The moonlight, calm and silvery,
As a maiden's dream of love,
Was streaming 'mid and canopy
Of deep clouds above;
When a song, like a solemn wailing
Of a fettered soul in pain,
Rose softly on the midnight air,
Then died away again.

It was the night before the bridal, and no happier heart throbbed than that of Nettie Craigg; but Marcus Heath sat alone in his room, smoking earnestly, as if trying to drive away bitter memories. While engaged thus, the sound of an organ was heard beneath his window, and, as if fascinated, he left his chair, and, magic power, he listened to the wailing song, which, mingled with the solemn music, filling his soul with a profound sadness.

The night was terribly cold, but, going to the window, he opened it, and looked down on the throng of people who were passing below. Just in front of the hotel door, a little group of boys, men, and women, had paused to hear the song of the organ-grinder, whose back was turned, as her face was raised to the window, and through the distance Marcus Heath trembled beneath the impassioned gaze of Califa, the Pearl of the Sea. He could not move. Spell-bound, he gazed down—down in the depths of those eyes, while his heart throbbed by the quickened pulsations, unless in her beautiful voice. Clear as the echo of the droppings of a crystal spring, through the darkness of the woods she sang, and he knew they were for him:

Down on the sandy shore of Galveston Bay,
Where the sea-waves roll and the sea-breezes play,
Lived a maiden with her sire, happy and free,
And the world around her was the Pearl of the Sea!
And the wind spirits named her the Pearl of the Sea!

Then there rose a wild storm, and waves dashed 'gainst the shore,
And a stately ship went down, to ride the sea no more:
But the mermaids tenderly laid upon the beach
A form, where the storm-king's wrath could never reach,
And Califa, mourning down by the sea,
Found the dying hero. Oh, Marcus, it was thee!
Found by Califa, the Pearl of the Sea!

When the sunbeams shone, love, upon the smiling sea,
Loving and beloved, then, we wandered for hours so:
And Califa's fond heart held one image for
When Marcus said "Farewell!" and left her weeping there!

When Marcus said "Farewell!" and left her weeping there!

Quick the seasons changed from shadow to shine,
But you ne'er returned, love, to bless this heart of mine.
I followed but to give back the love you gave to me,
Down 'mid the shadows that slept by the sea,
Down 'mid the shadows that slept by the sea!

And then to die, love, kneeling at thy feet,
Gazing in those eyes, love, so bright, so blue, so sweet;
Till then, farewell, love—farewell love to thee!
Angels soon will call me, the Pearl of the Sea!
Angels soon will call me, the Pearl of the Sea!

The song died away—the spell was broken. Turning, assailed by a thousand emotions, Marcus Heath caught up his hat and hastened from his room. Once on the street, he sought in vain for the organ-grinder. She had vanished, and the group dispersed in the hurrying crowd.

"My little man," said he to a newsboy, standing near the office door, "which way did that organ-grinder go, who was playing just a moment ago?"

"Down the street, mister," replied the urchin.

"No she didn't, neither," said another, coming up; "she turned round the corner here."

Marcus Heath hastened away in the direction designated, while the little fellow, with a knowing wink to his comrade, laughed heartily.

"Smart chap, he! He might a-knowed she didn't turn down that corner, when I told him."

"What made you tell him so, then?"

"Gump! That was a sly way of gitting 'change!' and away he ran to catch up with Marcus.

"Sir," he exclaimed, breathlessly, "you've turned down the wrong corner! This is the way." Leading him back, he said: "I charges something for showing you."

Marcus put half a dollar in the shrewd youngster's hand, and hastened away again, amid the silent laughter of the rogue, who went off gaily for a 'spree.'

Nettie Craigg sat alone with her mother, gazing, with dilated eyes, upon the heaps of snowy linen, silk, satin and laces, which were strewn around the room, upon every conceivable support.

"Mamma," she said, "I'll try on my bridal attire."

No sooner proposed than accomplished. Standing, with admiring glances, before the mirror, she cried out:

"Now, my veil, mamma!"

"Yes, darling."

And from its silver covering Mrs. Craigg lifted the fleecy lace. Shaking out the folds, before putting it on Nettie's head, it parted in her hands!

"Oh, such an ill-omen!" cried Nettie, with tears in her eyes; "I wish I hadn't tried it on!"

"No, no; it is only a flaw in the lace, darling."

But an anxious look stole over Mrs. Craigg's face, which a smile could not hide.

CHAPTER V.—THE LETTER—THE ORGAN-GRINDER AGAIN.

It came like a wail of sorrow,
For a cherished treasure lost,
Or a cry of sudden anguish,
When a ship is tempest-tossed.

NETTIE CRAIGG was standing, amid her attendant maids, radiant with the snowy beauty of a youthful bride, when a servant hastily entered, and said:

"Miss Nettie, a strange-looking woman left this letter for you, and went away without waiting for an answer."

And he handed her a dingy little note, written in a cramped and almost illegible hand:

"You are happy with the bridal-wreath upon your brow, but it cannot last for long. Marcus Heath is a perjured lover, and when he fires and wrongs a Southern heart, the dagger of remorse must enter his soul! Send up a prayer for him and yourself, destined as you are to be a maid, a wife, and a widow in one day. CALISTA."

The agitation of the young girl was extreme, and amid the startled glances of the surrounding ladies, and whispers of "Who could have sent it?" Marcus Heath entered. Nettie handed it to him; he read it, started, colored, then, commanding self-control, said fondly;

"At least, Nettie, I have never proved unfaithful to you. And while I fear not for myself, have faith in me. Come!"

And with a proud and tender look upon his manly face, he drew the unresisting hand of his bride within his arm, and preceded his escorts from the room with a firm and stately step.

The lofty shadows of the cathedral lengthened and deepened as the party wended their way towards the altar, amid strewn flowers and the soft perfume of burning incense. Every eye was intently gazing on the bride, every ear strained to catch the sound of her voice, but none noticed the trembling figure, wrapped in a dark mantle, which stood just within the doorway, and amid the full, melodious notes of the organ, and the angelic song of praise from the veiled sisters in the choir, none heard the gasping wail of dry agony that parted the lips of that same trembling figure, as it darted into the street:

"Oh, God, and does he defy me? Does he court the bloody deed?"

The last benediction pronounced, Marcus Heath, flushed and happy, was leaving the church with his bride, when, directly at the corner, there stood an organ-grinder, her dark dress fluttering in the wind, her long, dark hair stealing from under a scanty shawl, which was pinned over her head, and her weird eyes glistening like those of a basilisk. Her organ was strapped over her shoulder, but resting half on the iron-railing round the cathedral, for support, and her hand was clenched about the handle despairingly, while the thin, red lips gaspingly parted for the song she sang:

"Death at the bridal, death at the feast,
Flowers are gathered to fade,
Woe for the widow, tears for the bride,
And tears for the smiling maid.

"Death at the bridal, death at the feast,
A dagger lies hid mid the flowers;
Smile while you may, but find time to pray,
For Death counts the perjurer's hours."

Quick as the flash of a thought, the song ended, she hastened down the street, and vanished up the shadow of an alley.

Marcus Heath's hand trembled, and the lips of his bride turned white with sudden fear, as they heard the words and remembered the letter; and an ominous look of wonder, like a cloud, drifted over the faces of the bridal train, which was not immediately dispelled in the glow of the bridal feast.

CHAPTER VI.—DEATH AT THE BRIDAL FEAST.

Aye, perfidious lover, look,
Till your soul grows sick with pain,
As out from the grave of the past
The memories rise again,
And ask of your heart if God
Can forgive your bloody crime,
Or blot the stain from your life,
Through cycles of endless time?

THE table was spread for a royal feast, and the glow, and radiance, and beauty of all Richmond, were gathered within the walls to consecrate with jest, and repartee, and wine, the bridal of the popular belle, Nettie Craigg.

Smiling and bowing, blushing and replying, she stood beside her happy husband, receiving with unequalled grace the compliments and encomiums showered upon her by loving relatives and admiring friends.

The wine sparkled while the hours sped on, rose-wreathed and radiant, as a song of love on the lips of Bacchantes. Just as the convivial spirit of the party began to wane, the dining-hall doors were thrown open, and a regally beautiful woman swept into the room with stately steps. Her velvet robe, in unbroken sweep, left its dark train upon the tapestry carpet. Her dead-white face and wan hands were the only light to an otherwise shaded picture; her dark hair was twisted in one massive coil at the nape of her exquisite neck, and fastened with a dagger.

Every eye opened with amazement, for it was a strange face, and the bride looked equally unconscious of who advanced towards her as her guests; but on she glided, without pause or hesitation, to the head of the table, where stood the bridal pair.

Marcus Heath had his face turned from her, engaged in earnest conversation with some friend, and did not observe her presence until she stood close beside him; then he started, exclaiming in a shocked voice:

"Calista! Calista!"

"Aye!" she answered, in a cold, steady tone, "Calista; and years ago, Marcus Heath, I told you, when you won my heart on the shores of Galveston Bay, that if wronged, my vengeance would be to die at your feet. I have struggled through untold suffering and crime to accomplish this vow; and, therefore, you see me here to-day, like a cloud of midnight blackness above the golden radiance of your newly risen sun. You see, Cupid's gem has turned to blood!" and she held up her hand, where a ruby ring was gleaming in lieu of the costly emerald.

"Maiden," and she turned to Nattie, "I pity your sorrow, and ask pity for my despair. I have been wronged, and my vengeance——" here she threw up her arm, and jerking the dagger from her hair, cried, in a sharper, quicker tone—"is steady, swift and sure!" And before any hand could be raised to stay the blow, she plunged the glittering blade in the breast of Marcus Heath, and then, once, twice, to the hilt, in her own.

Both victims to such unbridled passion fell; she dead; he gasping—dying.

The bridal feast was broken up in alarm and dismay. The bodies were borne away into other apartments, and fainting and heartsick, the bride was taken to her own room, where, for many a weary day, she did not look out on the face of the world that had once so loved to smile upon her.

Both wounds had proved mortal—Calista's instantly, and that of Marcus Heath a few brief hours after its infliction. A maiden, a wife, and a widow in one day—a world of joy, a world of woe, had Nettie Heath experienced.

Yet, when the time of humble submission to the will of God dawned upon her heart—as it must to even those who suffer most, for hearts are essentially human—she said tearfully to her mother:

"Perhaps this is for the best, mamma, even though so hard to bear; for if my grief is so unutterable, when he loved me in his dying, how profound must have been her despair, when she realized that she, too, had been loved—been wronged and deserted. A woman who suffers as she did, might dare to arrest vengeance from high heaven, and wreak it on the offender's head, though an eternal woe were her portion!"

BOUNTY IN THE OLDEN TIME.

In all history there is nothing so intensely interesting as that bearing upon Scottish life, and especially as connected with the warlike deeds of the Gaelic regiments that have from time to time been raised and sent forth to seal the devotion of their native land to the bond of union between herself and Great Britain.

In the pages of an English periodical, an old Scottish army chaplain is giving sketches of these regiments. He writes: The gallant deeds of the Highland-regiments in every quarter of the globe added to the general enthusiasm for Caledonians. It was long, indeed, before the English government would believe that they could be trusted; to have armed the Highlanders about the beginning of the last century would have been deemed as much an act of insanity as to arm at the present hour the New Zealand Maoris. Scottish men were known to be under the control of their chiefs, and their chiefs, almost to a man, were devoted to the Pretender. No wonder, then, that the government hesitated before accepting their services; it was not till 1730—only one hundred and thirty years ago—that the first experiment was made. Six companies of Highlanders were then raised, each company being independent of the other. They were known as the Freicudan Dhu, or Black Watch, to distinguish them from the Seideran Dearag, or Red Soldiers. They derived their names from the color of their clothes; the regular soldiers wore scarlet, as they do now, while the Highland companies retained their sombre tartan. There was no lack of men: gentlemen of good family were proud to serve as privates under their native officers; for the whole country had been disarmed, and this indignity was deeply felt by a race who, even in times of peace, never went forth without dirk or claymore. The cadets of good families were proud to serve, if only in the ranks, because they were thus entitled to bear arms; and to carry a weapon was regarded as a proof that the bearer was a gentleman. The pay privates received was small to a degree, yet poverty was so universal that the pittance they took from government was not to be despised. They were stationed in small parties over the country, and seem to have discharged the same duties as are intrusted to the rural police at the present day. In 1739 four additional companies were raised, and the whole were formed into a regiment of the line. Such was the origin of the first Highland regiment in the service—the gallant 42d, still known as the Black Watch. The 92nd or Gordon Highlanders was raised in 1794 by the last Duke of Gordon, then Marquis of Huntly, and by his mother, the beautiful and witty Duchess Jane. The duchess used to frequent the country fairs, and when she saw a likely youth she would try every persuasion to induce him to enlist. When all other arguments failed, she would place a guinea between her lips, and no young Highlander, however pacific, could refuse the bounty thus proffered. One kiss of that beautiful mouth was worth dying for.

Three-fourths of Duchess Jane's regiment were Highlanders; all the rest were Lowlanders, except 35 Irishmen, whom one of the officers was obliged to accept, faute de mieux, to make up his complement. In 1825 the numbers were 716 Scots, 51 English, and 111 Irish; in 1857, 1,043 Scots, 7 English, and 40 Irish. The only other regiment which retains the garb of the old Gaul is the 79th, or Cameron Highlanders, raised in 1793 by Allan Cameron, of Errach, in the northern counties. About four-fifths of the men were Highlanders; the rest were English or Irish. In 1857 the regiment consisted of 895 Scots, 37 English, and 39 Irish. Many of the men in these old Highland regiments bore the same name. We find, for example, in one regiment of 800 men no less than 700 who have the word Mac prefixed to their names. In another we find no less than nine John Roses; and as for Donald Macdonalds, their name was Legion. The drill-sergeant showed his ingenuity in distinguishing the bearers of the same cognomen by jocular allusions to their personal appearance, which must occasionally have been not altogether gratifying to the nick-named. In the same company there would be Donald Macdonald with the red hair, Donald with the big feet, Donald with the long legs, Donald of Skye, Donald of Harris, and so forth. When all other means of distinguishing his recruits failed him, the drill-sergeant had recourse to figures, and ranked them as Donald Macdonald No. 1, No. 2, No. 3. No wonder he occasionally got confused amongst so many Donalds, and lost his temper.

About the close of the last century the citizens of Edinburgh found much amusement in listening to the calling of the muster-rolls of one of the newly-raised Highland regiments stationed there, and studying the ingenuity of the sergeants in distinguishing the countless Macs and Donalds in their different companies. The ludicrous effect of such scenes was enhanced by the guttural accent and imperfect English of the speakers, who, if we may judge by the following specimen, seem occasionlly to have had peculiar ideas of military duty:—

"Tonald Mactonald No. 5," cried the sergeant, going over the muster-roll of his company.

"Here!" cried a voice so shrill and abrupt that it excited a general titter in the ranks, and the unbounded indignation of the sergeant.

"Here, ye tamm'd rogue! Is that the way she speaks to a shentleman? But we a' ken Tonald's liar, sae pit her down absent, and tak' her to the guard-room."

"Tonald Mactonald No. 6," continued the sergeant. There was no answer. The sergeant broke forth into a sort of soliloquy—

"Tonald Mactonald No. 6; that's my sister's son frae Achallatus. Ay, ay, Tonald, she was aye a modest lad, that never spak' till she was spoken to, so we'll put her down present."

And thus the sergeant went over the whole roll, accompanying each name with some remark which showed the estimation in which he held the bearer. As to the Highlander's mode of fighting, it was the simplest thing in the world. He discharged his musket, threw it aside, drew his bonnet over his brow, and rushed upon the foe, leaving all the rest to God and his own good broadsword. It was so that he conquered at Prestonpans and elsewhere, but it would be difficult to assert that his undisciplined valor rendered him superior to troops thoroughly drilled, or that the broadsword is more formidable than the bayonet. General Stewart, nevertheless, is of a different opinion: "From the battle of Culloden, where a body of undisciplined Highlanders, shepherds and herdsmen, with their broadswords cut their way through some of the best disciplined and most approved regiments in the British army (drawn up, too, on a field extremely favorable for regular troops), down to the time when the swords were taken from the Highlanders, the bayonet was in every instance overcome by the sword."

In one of the skirmishes with the French in Egypt, a young sergeant of the 78th killed six of the enemy with the broadsword; the weapon was the same as that still used by sergeants in Highland regiments. The half-dozen Frenchmen were not cut down while retreating, but in fighting with the bayonet, hand to hand, against the broadsword. The gallant sergeant met his death-blow from a sabre stroke from behind as he was returning to his company, after cutting down the last of his six foes. Many other proofs of the efficacy of the basket-hilted weapon might be given, but we question whether its warmest admirers would prefer it to the bayonet in a close attack.

A TERRIBLE ICE VOYAGE.

ONE of the most fearful adventures that it has ever been the lot of pen to record has just occurred upon the Niagara River, in the neighborhood of the Falls, ending in the death of one person and the mortal danger of two others. The three actors in this fearful tragedy were, William A. Thompson, Esq., the Vice-President of the Erie and Niagara Railroad, a Mr. Warren, foreman on the same road, and William Bartlett, a colored boy. The origination was an attempt of the three to cross the river in a small boat. It was getting late in the day, and in their eagerness to proceed, they lost sight of the danger. Our correspondent gives the affair in these words: "About half-past five o'clock the three pushed out into the stream. They found much difficulty in making their way through the ice which ran close to shore, and Mr. Thompson advised a return. But presently getting through the shore pack of ice they found clear water, and went forward confidently, meeting no obstacles until they again neared the shore on the American side, near the Erie Mills, when the ice pressed about them thicker than in the first instance. Mr. Thompson then gave an imperative order to the boy to back away and return, but it was too late. They had entered so far that return was impossible. They were caught by the ice, wedged fast between its grinding cakes, and could go neither forward nor back. Another moment, and it had crushed the sides of their boat, so that it began to fill rapidly and sink. The three immediately leaped out upon a cake of ice nearest at hand, which proved to be but a small one, scarcely larger than a door, and drew the boat partly upon it after them. Their hope was in being able to turn the craft bottom up and mount its keel, in which position they might be floated by it; but the mass was not large enough to permit such an operation. Mr. Thompson then attempted to bail out the boat with his cap; but while doing so, the boy Bartlett cried out that the ice was upon them again, and they had barely time to throw themselves into the half-filled boat when the piece upon which they had stood was crushed by another mass coming down upon it. An instant more and the boat was also struck, turned bottom upward, and Mr. Thompson and Mr. Warren plunged into the water. The negro boy succeeded in leaping upon an ice cake. Mr. Thompson sank once and came up, when he clutched the boat, made his way to the stern and climbed upon the keel. Here he saw his companion Warren sinking for the last time, a short distance away, and drowning before his eyes, while he was utterly powerless to help. He had scarcely witnessed this, when death rushed upon him again. The boat was once more struck, and rolled over. Again he sank, and again, on rising, he clutched the boat, which again had righted itself. Climbing into its stern, which sank with his weight two or three feet below the surface, he sat for a time with the water to his chin.

"It had now been dark for some time, intensely, so that nothing could be seen about him, but in the midst of this horrible situation, Mr. Thompson felt a cake of ice drifting upon him. He put out his hand to ward it away, and feeling it to be several inches thick, and apparently of some size, he concluded it best to escape, if possible, from the boat to the ice. He very nearly failed in doing so, barely getting his breast upon the cake when he sprang from the boat, and finding it impossible to lift his body above that position. Providentially, however, the boat in rising just touched his foot and gave him a slight push forward, after which he was enabled by long and exhausting efforts to crawl upon the cake. Here he stood upright, and not knowing the size of the ice raft, dared not move. Hailing the boy Bartlett, he found him still afloat upon his bit of ice, 100 or 200 yards away, loudly engaged in almost frantic prayer.

"And now began the wonderful voyage of the river, through the darkness and the storm of freezing sleet which fell upon their frail rafts of ice. A fine rain, driven by keen north winds, stung the face of the traveller, and cased everthing exposed with a quick mail of ice. To all this pelting storm, these wet and exhausted cast-aways, drifting along the cold waters of the Niagara, with the horrid dread of imminent death to freeze their hearts within them, were exposed for three mortal hours. Mr. Thompson had lost both cap and gloves. His clothing was frozen into the rigidity of iron armor, and he became incapable of motion, except as he slightly swung his arms to keep them flexible. All that he could do for himself was to shout and cry for help, which he did steadily, and with the whole strength of his lungs, for hours. Fortunately, possessed of a magnificent physique in every respect, his voice was capable of the exertion. Once, somewhere, in the vicinity of Lower Black Rock, he received a response from shore, but to his appeal for rescue, the voice, out of the darkness, replied that it had no oars and could do nothing. The miserable fool, or worse, who heard and hailed, seems to have made no effort to rouse his neighborhood and set its energies to work for the rescue of the periled men who appealed to him. And so they drifted on beyond Black Rock, beyond Strawberry Island, past the head of Grand Island, and steadily on towards those currents of the great cataract where no hand could save them. Steadily the cry for 'help' rang out across the water and through the black night, and no ear heard, and no tongue answered. Three hours had passed—seven miles of the river traversed—it was 9 o'clock of the night. Hope began to die in the heart of Mr. Thompson, stout and strong as it was. He called to his companion, the negro boy, and gave him a message for his wife and children, if it should be his lot to escape. His thoughts, as he describes them, were very quaint and curious. They were too busy to give an opportunity for fear, and death was faced calmly and coolly.

"And so they drifted steadily down, between Grand Island and the American shore, until Tonawanda was passed, and the last houses upon either shore from which help could come before help should be too late were going by. But there, at the last, by the good providence of God, help did come. The shouts were heard on the Grand Island shore. Lights began to move from house to house. The neighbors were running together. Presently the gleam of a lantern moved upon the river, and they knew that boats were coming out.

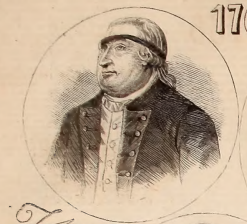
"Mr. Thompson, when reached, had to be rolled into the boat like a log. He has taken off by Mr. Charles Poplar and Mr. George Gilde. Another boat, manned by Mr. William W. Blackney and Mr. John A. Bacon, rescued the boy Bartlett. The boy, being thinly clad, had nearly perished when taken off; but Mr. Thompson, a man of large, robust frame, and great vitality, felt himself capable of enduring an hour or two more of the bitter trial. Astonishing to say, neither were seriously frozen, and Mr. Thompson, whom we saw lately, appears little the worse for his extraordinary experience.

"Mr. Warren, who was drowned, was an elderly man, of about 55 years of age. He resided at Prescott, C. W., where, we understand, he leaves a family."

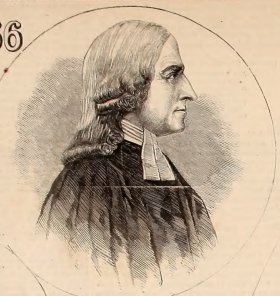
THE PELELE, OR LIP RING,
Of the Manganja Women in Africa.

THE fashion of wearing rings as ornaments has, in different parts of the world, assumed most eccentric varieties. Our ladies pierce their ears, and are charmed with the effect produced by the glitter of diamond pendents, but they shrink from the Egyptian beauty, with her nose rings, and are horrified at the squaws on the North-West coast, whose ears are dragged earthward by the imposed gewgaws. What will they say to the picture we now give of the lip ring, pelele (too pretty a name for a hideous thing), of the Manganja, or lake women, in Southern Africa?

"The lake people," says one who has recently visited their remote region, "are by no means handsome: the women—to use our mildest term to the fair sex—are very plain; and really make themselves hideous by the means they adopt to render their persons beautiful and attractive. The pelele, or ornament for the upper lip, is universally worn by the ladies; the most valuable is of pure tin, hammered into the shape of a small dish; some are made of white quartz, and give the wearer the appearance of having an inch or more of one of Price's patent candles thrust through the lip, and projecting beyond the tip of the nose. Some ladies, not content with the upper pelele, go to extremes, as ladies will, and insert another in the under lip, through a hole almost opposite the lower gums. A few peleles are made of a blood-red kind of pipe-clay, much in fashion—'sweet things' in the way of lip rings—but so hideous to behold, that no time nor usage could make our eyes rest upon them without aversion."



CHINESE EXECUTIONS.—Dr. Rennie, a recent traveller in China, tells us: "At a later period of the day, riding through the Chinese city, I passed the place of execution. There, at the point of junction between two crowded streets, a large number of heads of criminals recently decapitated were exposed to public gaze, and seemed to attract little or no notice from the streams of people who were passing. The heads were in wooden cages, arranged in three groups, and suspended from the tops of poles, placed so as to support one another, as soldiers pile their arms. There were about twenty cages in each group, and each cage contained two, and sometimes three heads. Several heads were also hanging in clusters without cages. On a rough estimate, there must have been considerably over a hundred heads hanging up. It appears that an unusually large number of criminals have been executed of late—as many, I am told, as forty at a time, in consequence of prisoners under sentence of decapitation having accumulated for some months, the emperor's death having for the time arrested the sword of justice at the capital. The decapitations are all performed by one man, who holds the offices of executioner and torturer by hereditary right, and receives a regular annual salary. He is stated to be very expert, and seldom to miss severing the head at one blow, the sword being wielded by him with both hands. As in the case of the executions at Tien-tsin, the neck is stretched by traction employed in front, while the criminal is stretched by force applied in the opposite direction. On the head being severed, the executioner holds it up, and calls out the name of the malefactor."

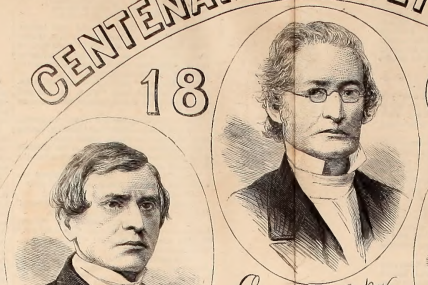


CENTENARY OF METHODISM

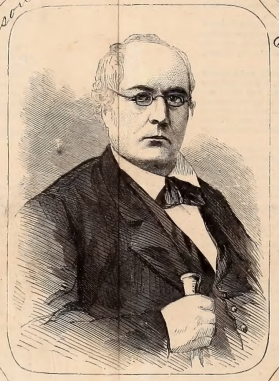
18 66.

1766

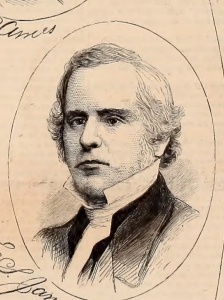
1766

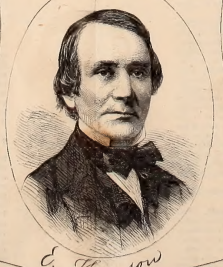


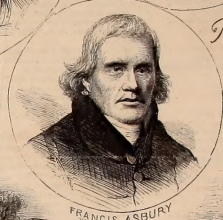
PHILIP EMBURY'S GRAVE
IN ARMONDALE CEMETERY



ST. PAUL'S M.E. CHURCH 22 ST. & 4 AV. NEW YORK
RECENTLY DEDICATED







THE BISHOPS OF THE M.E. CHURCH

FRANCIS ASBURY

PHILIP EMBURY'S RESIDENCE
IN NEW YORK CITY
HERE THE FIRST METHODIST SERMON WAS PREACHED

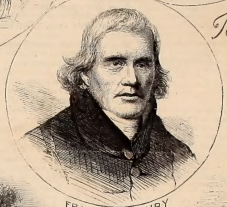
THE RIGGING LOFT
No. 120 WILLIAM ST. N.Y
USED AS A PREACHING HOUSE BY THE METHODISTS 1767

THE OLD METHODIST CHURCH & PARSONAGE IN JOHN ST. N.Y.
ERECTED & DEDICATED PHILIP EMBURY 1768

THE HISTORY OF AMERICAN METHODISM, FROM ITS FIRST INTRODUCTION.

OF METHODISM

66.



1766

Wesley

Joseph Benson

FRANCIS ASBURY

E.R. Ames

PHILIP EMBURY'S RESIDENCE
IN NEW YORK CITY
HERE THE FIRST METHODIST SERMON WAS PREACHED

THE RIGGING LOFT
No. 120 WILLIAM ST. N.Y.
USED AS A PREACHING HOUSE BY THE METHODISTS 1767

E.O. Jones.

Durbin

THE OLD METHODIST CHURCH & PARSONAGE IN JOHN ST. N.Y.

THE M.E. CHURCH

DISM, FROM ITS FIRST INTRODUCTION.

TRUE VICTORS.

BY R. V. R.

"There are other battle-fields than those
On which men's bones lie bleaching,"
And better lessons to be learned
Than by such bloody teaching;
In every hour, as it speeds by,
Is won some nobler victory.

Some steadfast brow is crowned above,
With amaranths immortal,
And angels lead the conqueror's steps
In triumph through the portal;
And all earth's grandest pageantry
Is lost in one such victory.

But not in glare of midday sun—
Not where the world beholdest,
And cheers and lauds with praises loud
The strongest and the boldest—
Not where earth's worthless plaudits be
Is fought and won such victory.

And not to earthly might and power
Such battle's meed is given;
The weakest arm, the gentlest heart,
Hath oft most bravely striven;
While crowds passed on unheedingly,
It fought and won its victory.

Not in one hour of pride elate,
But in long years of striving,
Through cloudy days and starless nights,
A lifetime's combat living;
God only and His angels see
The cost of such victory.

With poverty, or care, or pain,
Or toil that never alters,
Struggling to keep a cheerful mind,
And heart that never falters;
And step by step, and day by day
To truest victory winning way.

Learning to bear with hopes deferred,
And stronger for the bearing
To see each undertaking fail,
Yet think not of despairing;
When seeming most cast down, to see
Most surety of the victory.

God knoweth now how many hearts
Such battles are enduring,
How many heroes in His sight
Their victor's crown securing;
Theirs seems the common life to be,
Yet leads to noblest victory.

Even we, as heroes in the strife,
Ignorant of our glory,
May each be living, day by day,
A theme for angel's story;
As weak and ignorant as we,
Others have won this victory.

It matters not, if in the dark,
Unconscious what we're doing,
If but with earnest, patient hearts,
Our way we are pursuing;
For as our day our strength shall be,
And God will give the victory.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LVIII.—MR. SLEUTH HAS PHILLIS TAKEN CARE OF.

When the first feeling of terror, that the sight of his master in so fearful a position inspired in the servant, wore off a little, he set to work to do his best to recover him. He gave him a draught of wine, and the wounded man's spirit sensibly revived with the cordial.

Then the man cut away the clothes that hid the wound—making a great ugly round hole through cloth, and linen, and wool—till he saw the spot. Happening to touch it, Sleuth screamed with anguish, and then they both knew that the point of the knife had been left behind, sticking in a rib bone.

Fortunately, the man had nerve enough to look steadily at the place; and at last saw, as he wiped aside the blood, a bit of the protruding metal.

"I can get it out, sir, I am sure I can—if you ain't afraid to let me get good hold with my nails. I've done worse things than this."

"Very well; but give me some more wine first. This dreadful faintness——"

He was, in fact, fainting, but the wine acted powerfully; and then an instant later—as Sleuth, with something like self-control, showed only in his horrified face the pain he felt—the bit was drawn forth. Some sticking-plaster and thick pads of cloth, and a scarf, fastened diagonally across one shoulder, finished the business, and made Sleuth feel once more he was likely to live, and to plot, and to triumph.

Meanwhile, his latest victim sat there looking on with the same stony aspect, giving now and then a terrible and long-continued shudder, generally ending in low moans and sobbing cries; but there were no tears—no expressions implying she noticed what was going on—no movement either to retard or promote Sleuth's recovery.

"Do you think, sir, you could walk a bit—leaning on me?" asked the man.

"I'll try," said Sleuth, casting a side-look of inquiry at Phillis, as if wondering whether his movement to leave her might bring on a fresh crisis. What had she done with the broken knife? That question was answered as they passed her. It was lying near her on the floor, dropped as if in some sudden feeling of moral paralysis.

Sleuth's pause and the direction of his eyes warned the servant what was on the floor. He stooped and picked up the knife, and then they went out and locked the door upon the unhappy woman who had come to show her future husband how she had been preparing herself in the hope to please him.

"She's mad; she must be," said Sleuth. "I'm sorry I called her a murderess, for she seemed stung by it; and it was that which made her repeat my word so violently. I dare say you heard her?"

"I did hear her say something like that, sir." And then the topic dropped.

"You had better go to Mr. Jarratt. You know his place?"

"The mad doctor, sir?"

"Yes. Tell him to send a couple of discreet persons here as quick as he possibly can. Say discreet persons, as we are in danger; and then, if he doesn't like to keep her longer than a day or two, I can have her sent to a criminal asylum. Perhaps that will be best—perhaps that will be best," he repeated, musingly.

Within a couple of hours Sleuth, the man-servant, and two brawny keepers, re-opened the door, and there found Phillis squatted on the floor, gazing at the just rising moon, and saying, as she turned her head and saw them:

"I'm glad you're come. Isn't she bonny? I wanted somebody to see her with me." Then she added, in a lower voice, "Why doesn't he come, I wonder?"

Sleuth was at that moment gazing on her—pity for her growing just in proportion as he saw his own safety from her secured.

"Take care of her, I beg you," he said to the men, as they took her away. "I respect her and her godmother very much indeed. Poor old lady! this will be a sad blow to her. Poor things! poor things! Pray, take care of her."

CHAPTER LIX.—PRIMROSE GATHERING.

One afternoon, when the doctor was reading to Mr. Sleuth the first act of a new tragedy, Clarissa took a basket, and with her two poodles at her heels, and an old tame jackdaw on her shoulder, came to gather primroses in her favorite little wilderness behind the cedars.

The birds' nests looked big and burly in the light, airy network of green leaves and buds above her, and the setting sun shone warm upon the place. The poodles ran down, and barked at the little stream chattering over the stones; the old jackdaw hid his head from the sun in hair almost as golden, and his mistress sat down upon the bank, rested her round elbow in the luxuriant neglected grass, her cheek in her hand, and fell into a reverie.

The poodles got tired of barking at the obstinate little stream, and came up the bank with tongues hanging out, and fell down panting at her feet. One by one the sunbeams crept out of the little dell—one by one the pale primrose clusters began to gleam in the shade.

A little loose earth came tumbling down the bank. The dogs looked up and barked, the jackdaw changed legs and grumbled. Clarissa colored, erected herself, and took up her basket.

In another instant Mr. Sleuth sat a little below her on the bank.

"What a little paradise! Can I be forgiven for intruding, I wonder? I almost deserve to be, after the trouble I have had to find you."

"Mrs. Bishop could have told you where I was, if you had asked her the question. Did papa come out with you?"

"No; he is fatigued with his reading, and is asleep. What a charming spot!"

He looked delightedly about.

Clarissa rose, and went towards a tuft of primroses. He was at her side in an instant.

"May I help you?"

"Thank you. You are very kind." And she yielded her basket to him.

"It is you who are very kind—most kind—to give me such pleasure. I know I do not deserve it, but—" He paused, and instead of holding out the basket for the flowers she had gathered, leaned forward and stroked the jackdaw on her shoulder, and said with a sigh, "but neither does this—this happy bird."

The "happy bird" chuckled, and nestled its head slyly against the prettiest little ear in the world; and croaked out:

"Jack, Jack! Jolly Jack! Jolly Jack!"

Then hid his eyes bashfully from Sleuth's sentimental regard, behind a veil of soft hair that it shook lose with its beak.

"What a charming picture?" murmured Sleuth.

Clarissa tossed the bird off with her hand, impatiently.

"Was that because I admired it?" he said, in a low, reproachful voice.

"Oh, dear, no! Jack is quite willing to be admired. Look how he struts away."

"I am afraid Jack is not much to admire, standing alone."

"Nothing against Jack, if you please; he has hopped about our lawn for two years, and is a great favorite."

Again Sleuth sighed, and again the basket was not ready when Clarissa held out her handful of primroses.

"Jack is more fortunate than some of your friends, Miss Pompess. I know one who in thought has never left you for three years instead of two, and yet what is he in your [illegible] your—what is he to you? Nothing—less than nothing!"

He spoke in some haste and heat, for he noticed that Clarissa was so managing the gathering of her flowers, as to ascend the bank. She was far enough from him to be able to pretend (if she wished) that she had not heard his last few words.

"I am sorry I came, Miss Pompess, if I am driving you so soon from your little retreat," he said, in a louder voice, with the least touch of injured pride in it.

"Oh, no! We have filled my basket, which is all I came here for," answered Clarissa, still lightly ascending.

Sleuth scrambled up the steepest part to reach her sooner.

"I know better, Miss Pompess," he panted. "I know very well I am driving you away, as I always do when I come. Why don't you tell your father how hateful the sight of my face is to you, and get him to forbid me the house? Why do you torture me by letting me see you so constantly? Why—"

"Mr. Sleuth, that grievance is soon remedied."

The quiet, haughty face turned round upon him so suddenly, that the panting, breathless climber was startled, and lost his footing. She might have helped him by giving him her hand, but as she did not, down he went, slipping and rolling over stones and briars, till he lay still, close to the stream.

Clarissa stood looking at him, and turned a little pale when she saw him so quiet. After a moment's hesitation she went down towards him, but before she got half way down the bank he moved, and rose to his feet.

"I am afraid you are hurt, Mr. Sleuth?"

"No. Not sufficiently, at least, to trouble the pity of Miss Pompess. I must go poaching to do that."

"Yes, you are hurt," she said, as he reached the ridge where she stood. "Your forehead is bleeding. I advise you to sit down a minute. You have struck your temple against one of those sharp points."

"Have I?" said Sleuth, in truth feeling very faint and giddy. He seemed, indeed, to have always something of a woman's shrinking from the sight of blood, and the feeling of physical pain. Then, dropping on the grass, he murmured:

"Oh, Clarissa, why was the blow not a little harder?"

Clarissa colored; but without saying anything, went down and dipped her handkerchief in the water, and came quickly back with it.

"You had better lay this on your forehead. or let me."

She sat down beside him.

"No, no. I am not hurt. You were going in; don't let me detain you." This he said with a half groan, turning his face to the grass as he lay at her feet.

She sat and looked at him with a puzzled air.

The whole picture was the fulfilment of a certain prophecy made wildly one dark night long ago in the doctor's garden—the prophecy of the worm and the flower.

"Mr. Sleuth, you will frighten my father if you go in with such a face as that."

"Me! I frighten him! Who, or what am I?"

"A person to whom he has shown much kindness, I believe, and for whom he has consequently some little regard."

"No, no. It is only his charity, his goodness. He wishes to direct me to use my fortune properly, but he does not care for me. Not a soul in all the world cares for me. I am more of an outcast in my prosperity than I was before. Why did I ever come between Anthony and you, to make you hate me? Why did I ever see you, Clarissa?"

"You are talking very wildly, Mr. Sleuth—too wildly for me to feel it necessary to answer you. Will you let me wipe your forehead or not?"

He raised his face, and she touched the brow with her handkerchief, keeping as unmoved a countenance as she could, with his sad, worshipping eyes looking up at her.

When she withdrew her hand, and had seen that the wound was not a very serious one, he flung his head on the ground again, saying, bitterly and passionately:

"You can pity me for a scratch like this, and yet you let me go on day after day, suffering what no man can bear long. And yet, what right have I to complain? It is my own fault that I keep near you, and get worse and worse—loving you more and more the more you hate me. I wish I was thousands of miles away, without the agony of making up my mind to go. I wish I was dead. I wish——"

The last wish, whatever it may have been, was rendered indistinct by sobs, and his burying his face in his hands.

Clarissa rose.

"Mr. Sleuth, if you are in any trouble, I am sorry—very sorry. But, please, quiet yourself, and listen to me while I say, that, of these wild sort of hints (which I do not want making any plainer, as I fear I understand them too well), I can take not the slightest notice. You will please never let me hear anything more of the kind."

"There, there! Unfortunate as usual! I have offended you now past all hope—all forgiveness. You will tell the doctor; he will forbid my ever coming again. Oh, miserable, miserable wretch that I am!"

"I shall not say a word of this to any one, Mr. Sleuth, so do not make yourself uncomfortable. As for my forgiveness, you have it already; though I trust you will not need it again."

"You do—you do forgive me?"

"I do fully. And now don't think me rude if I advise you to go home. I will make some excuse to papa. Good-bye."

She took up her basket. The poodles bounded before her. Jack flew up to her shoulder, and looked back, with his head on one side, at Sleuth rising slowly from the bank.

CHAPTER LX.—AN OLD FRIEND.

To ponder over one's rejection by a beautiful and tolerably rich woman is not pleasant, even when it takes place, as with Mr. Sleuth, in a luxurious carriage, where the thickly-padded sides, soft seat, and gentle movement, all suggest that the mental shock may, perhaps, prove of no more ultimate consequence than the physical shock occasionally endured on the return home.

"I'll make her marry me—that I will. I'll bend my whole soul to the business. I don't care how long I am about it. But I will marry her at last. I will! Of course I knew well enough I wasn't going to succeed at first time of asking. I was a fool for being so cut up, or for being so afraid of her superb and disdainful looks. She'll come round in time. I wish I knew how to get her alone and in good mood to my house, to show her the new boudoir I've fitted up, before anybody else sees it. Somehow, it isn't the same thing if she only comes as one of a party to look at it. What ails me, I wonder—my feet so cold, my head so hot? I must have been more excited than I thought I was. I'll get out and walk, and stir my blood a bit."

He touched the check-string, stopped the carriage, and got out, saying to the coachman:

"There's a stiff hill before us, on the other side of this little one. You can go on till you get to the top of the farthest. There wait for me. Push on now, but walk the horses slowly up the long slope."

The gay equipage, with its two men-servants in resplendent liveries, rolled off, and Sleuth followed slowly, thinking of Clarissa, and with a growing sense of mortification and bitterness, while his eyes followed the carriage up the gentle slope just before him, till it stood out in enormous size against the sky line, and then disappeared.

His eye was still resting on the spot, when he saw another object fill the vacant place, and be similarly thrown into strong relief against the glowing sky, with its long, level, black bars of cloud stretching through the orange suffusion half across the heavens.

It was a man, who seemed to carry a bag over his shoulder, and to stoop a little, after the fashion of wayside vagabond plodders, in whose gait there seems always expressed a desire to squat down on the spot then being passed over, and to protest against the idea of going on. Poor wretches! Too often it means that they feel the grave is their immediate as well as real destination, and that they revolt against the irony of pretending they want to go anywhere else. It is as if life were not a thing that concerns them—that they come into existence merely to die.

But this man certainly did not suggest that idea to Sleuth, or anything even distantly resembling it. He carried a thick stick in his hand, and with it was knocking away, with strange gaiety of heart, stones that lay in his path.

Buoyantly he came down the hill, and presently Sleuth fancied he was looking at him; and then the wild fancy crossed his mind that this was a ferocious, bloody-minded footpad, who had noticed the empty carriage, then came upon the owner out of sight of the servants, and who was, in sheer triumph over his prey, manifesting his pleasure as he approached.

The man comes nearer, and his garb suggests new causes for disgust, it is so thoroughly that of one of the lowest ruffians, met with mostly in disreputable places. Sleuth quaked for his well-filled purse, quaked for his gold repeater, quaked for his own very dear, very precious life.

Still nearer; and Sleuth partly understands the jocund gestures of hand, the rolling lightness of step. The man is slightly in liquor.

Sleuth thinks he will have to run for it. He measures with his eye the ground, considers which side of the man he will take, and fixes precisely how near he will let him come before he diverges from his present line, just a yard or two diagonally off, to see whether the man makes any hostile advance, and if he does—then flight!

What a villainous countenance it is, half hidden in dirty gray hair! But though the form rolls, the eye is dangerously sober, and bright, and penetrating, and fixed on Sleuth, who is in a sense fascinated by it.

His very blood seems changed into icy sleet, and rushes, with pricking torture, through his arteries, and then stops, as if paralyzed, and oozes slowly back upon the heart, as he hears a voice only too well known, and which is the only thing about the man that is unchanged.

"Richard Sleuth, Esquire, Eddington Hall, wot's driven in his own carriage, with two flunkeys, but sends him on afore when he expects he's goin' to meet a hold friend—Richard Sleuth, Esquire, Magistrate, and all that, don't you know me, your old acquaintance, Bob the Ostler?"

Sleuth did only too well recognize him, though he was greatly changed. The eyes had become bloodshot, the lips thick, black, livid and cracking, the cheeks puffy, the nose swollen at the bridge, by some tremendous blow. Evidently the fortune had done Bob no good. On the contrary, what little of health of mind or body poverty had managed to keep up in that always unlovely frame, had disappeared promptly when Bob was able to eat what he liked, drink what he liked, live as he liked, be as vicious as he liked, and so on to the end—to the end of his money, to the end of his dream of turning gentleman, to the end of his health, beauty and wits. The whole history of the Australian expedition, and of the mad debauchery and riot which had swept away Esau's fortune, were written in terrible characters on Bob's frontispiece.

"Bob! You!" were the only words Sleuth could for the moment gasp out.

"Ay, it's me. Bin to see the new world. Don't like it; come back, like a true Briton, to my native land—bless it! and to you, my noble, munificent-minded squire, as sent me off with my hands so full of good things, that when one by one I dropped them, or had 'em stolen from me—great rogues, Mister Sleuth, out in Australy!—what could I think on, if I had a bit of gratitude in my bosom, but coming back to tell you all my misfortins, and ax you to give me another start?"

"And that's what you are here for?" said Sleuth, recovering himself a little, aided by the recollection that, in a certain sense, the eyes of all his brother magistrates were now upon him.

"Lord love you, Mister Sleuth, and how well you do look, to be sure! I hadn't an idea of meetin' you here. I was prepared for a deal of bother and nonsense, hanging about in damp woods at nights, all brought on you. I was quite out o' heart just now, till I zeed that 'ere ekipage, and then I made so bold as to think the flunkey who it belonged to; and thought he was cheeky, and made game of my clothes and my general hinspect, he did condescend to enlighten me. Lord love you, Master Sleuth! didn't I come down the hill in a burst of affection. What! To catch you all alone! Oh, come now, you must a-known I was nigh, and did it o' purpose!"

"Where's the boy?"

"Under the Hillidanie. Tumbled overboard at Southampton. Never seed him any more!"

"A hlody story, Bob, to tell to me—Esau's Hinsam and Hachitophel—to say nothing of what I think of it as a magistrate."

"Oh, if you want him back again, that's another affair altogether, and I'd better see if you can't be accommodated."

"And where's the ten thousand pounds?"

"Ah, Mr. Sleuth, that is an unkind question. It takes that ten thousand a good deal to heart, and a friend might he knowed better than to rip up a worry bad subject. He's gone, Master Sleuth! Never some more, Mister Sleuth! Look at my clothes Master Sleuth! Ain't yer ashamed of me? Your flunkeys with a Law, if I don't, they will I was a friend of their master's. But, look at me! Is this a friend of Richard Sleuth, Esquire, of Eddington Hall, Justice of Peace? Why, I says yes; but he didn't ought to be obligated to expose his rags and he knows his friend won't let him, now they've got touchers of 'em."

"Bob, one word with you. I may be amused with your consummate impudence; but I shall at the same time be angry with you for, put you in the stocks. We have a pair in our parish not yet quite disused."

"I'd like to see 'em. But, Richard Sleuth, Esquire's carriage waits, as they bawls out at the playhouse, so we'd best cut it short. Look at me, Mister Sleuth! Is this the way to ill-treat a friend? Feel my pockets, if them dainty white fingers isn't afeard o' the uninvitin' insides. And what'll you find there? Nothing but what I put in long, and that's all. But I'm in tip-top spirits for why, as I says to myself, because Richard Sleuth's rich enough for both on us."

"Man—what is your claim on me?"

"Oh! that's the tune, is it? Shall I sing it out just here? Or, shall I go back with you to your flunkeys? Is that the road to the stocks, Mister Sleuth? And shall I ax them to listen while I whispers in your ear—"

"What?"

"Only murder! Mister Sleuth!"

Bob paused to note the effect of his blow; but Sleuth had learned to master the changes of fate, and Bob could not see much there to enlighten him.

"Put it in plain words what you want to say. Who has been murdered—and whom do you suppose to be the murderer?"

Bob stared at him, and then lost a little of his sublime serenity, as he turned his looks to the ground in meditation. He hadn't quite expected this.

"You are a magistrate, Mister Sleuth. Worry good. But do you know who I am? The man as married that 'ere Miss Emilie inside of me. A man was deprived of his natural protector when that 'ere fine old gentleman was made away with. When I laid Lord Ketin in Abbey, I used to think I ought to ha' stayed in my native land, and ha' stuck to it till I had disclosered the assassin as struck the fatal blow, and then I'd worry bed of death. I lost my money. Why? Because I hadn't done my duety to my honored father-in-law. I left it to the families inside of me. I can't sleep for thinking on it. I zeed it all when that 'ere money was gone. And now I means to go about hunting my murderer for existence, so long as I can bring the horrid wretch to justice as made me and my boy a kind o' horphane!"

"Perhaps, then, it is as a magistrate you appeal to me?"

"Take it so, if you like."

"Then against whom do your suspicions lie?"

"A worry nice gentleman indeed, if he only keeps his hands off my property—Richard Sleuth, Esquire, of Eddington Hall, Justice of the Peace!"

"Bob, there will be a meeting of magistrates to-morrow at Hengston. Anybody will show you the way. Come there to-morrow, at eleven in the forenoon, and I will be hear in public what you have got to say. Good-bye!"

"And that's all?"

"That's all."

"You're sure it's all? You won't be a runnin' after me presently, with your heart a burstin' because you can't get at me?"

"Good-day, Bob! Had you appealed to me in your distress, and in a proper manner, I should have done something for you even now."

It was Bob's turn now to cry out.

"Ohe! Good-day, Mr. Sleuth."

He made no attempt to interfere with Sleuth's progress, and he thus was able to overtake, in a few minutes, his carriage, and get in, and begin to reflect on his new and startling, because altogether unexpected, apparition.

Phillis's attack, and her subsequent madness—which might have not only temporarily cover her revelations—Clarissa's refusal to receive him as a suitor, and now Bob's almost incredible audacity in charging him with the cruel murder of the alderman—all alike impressed him as with a sense of the unreality of his position, and gave a kind of supernaturism tinge to his thoughts, suggestive of coming trouble.

He was glad he had dealt so sternly with Bob. It might convince Bob he was on a false track; and then, if his own faith in Sleuth's guilt were shaken, he would hardly like to risk the treatment that could so easily be inflicted on him as a rogue and a vagabond. And for what? Why, in the mere hope of wringing money out of a man who had no strong secret reason for giving it.

But what if Bob took him at his word, and publicly appeared in the court? Pooh! it was incredible! If any facts unknown to Sleuth were in his possession, he would, of course, have let it come out in their talk, to frighten him; for where would be the good to him of convicting Sleuth? Certainly he might do it in revenge for Sleuth's refusing to be again victimized; but hardly on so slight a foundation as his mere belief.

Still, the question must be faced—What if Bob does publicly move in the matter? Theis—and Sleuth's blood crept in his veins at the many horrible aspects involved in the contingency—he must resort to his long-prepared, but latest even, desperate means of remedy. On that, at all events, he believed, if the worst came to the worst, he could rely.

Yes, on the whole, he was quite satisfied with what he had said, and with his whole behavior to Bob, him or with his antagonist.

Fortunately, Bob was weak and Sleuth was strong. Bob could have no friends; and the magistrate gentlemen would not meet for a week even yet—this very night, perhaps—sweep him out of the country by the aid of the press-gang or some other equally-lawful proceedings, if only he could keep him in sight.

He hesitated whether to turn back and drive after him, or wait for his appearance. Finally, he decided to wait for the morrow.

Meantime he would finish with Phillis's affair.

CHAPTER LXI.—A NEW ARRIVAL AT SLEATHILL PRISON.

As the last wards of women in Sleathill Prison were plodding the usual dismal round in the sharing-yard, one April evening, the bell of the outer gate rang loudly.

Some of the most hardened-looking faces glanced at one another and smiled; some turned pale; others remained perfectly unmoved, trying, as they passed the matron on guard, to get a peep at the watch she held, to see how near they were to the end of their weary march. These sighed as they went, for they knew that another hour must needs continue a few minutes more than they had thought, and not for the sister or sisters in crime, whose arrival that deep clanging had announced.

It was but one, a girl, who had been brought in a wretched state of mind.

She sat very quietly between her two guardians. When one got down and rang the bell, she looked up at the gate with a vacant stare, and then she turned and gazed back down the road at the pale April foliage, with the stars beginning to glimmer faintly between the trees. Her face was wild and pathetic as she looked: and, clinging to the rough fellow's arm, she said, under her breath, pointing to the prison wall—

"Tell me, please, shall I ever see the stars in there?"

"You'll get good wittels, which I dessay's more'n you deserves, my gal," answered old Constable Mullins, of Hengston, turning away from the young face as he spoke, coldly.

"I'll be thankful for that, Mr. Mullins," said the prisoner, wrapping her shawl round her, and speaking in a low, gentle voice, "for I'm sure I don't deserve anything, and I'll be good in this place—as good as I can be; and, perhaps, some day, after many years, I may be forgiven. Don't you think so, sir?—and ask his forgiveness on my knees. Will you tell him that'll be my prayer, Mr. Mullins, night and noon, and night? Will you kindly tell him, sir?"

The great gates swung open, then the inner grated gates, and the prisoner quit jolted in and stopped at the door of the reception-room.

A tall, stout matron, in a widow's cap, came to the door, and took them, from one of the men, the name, age, offence, and sentence of the prisoner.

Phillis Conyngham was then passed on to the charge of another matron, who stood waiting. She followed her humbly to a little stone room, looking out of the airing grounds.

"Sit down," said the matron, pointing to a chair.

Phillis obeyed.

"Take off your bonnet."

She did so, and held it by the strings, hanging her head, and hardly daring to look round at the frame of being there—a shame she felt more before one of her own sex than she had before the men who had brought her.

The matron looked at her a long time steadily. Phillis felt that, and could scarcely draw her breath, from the full pain, rather than saw, that she moved close to her, and touched her hair, which began undoing the fastenings with a firm and gentle hand.

Phillis turned round and saw a pair of scissors in her hand. She clasped her hands on the back of the chair, and looked up in the matron's face with a pitiful entreaty.

"Please, ma'am, what are you going to do?"

"I am going to cut your hair off; it is the rule here."

As she spoke, the matron tried firmly to turn the girl's head to the position it was before.

"I tell you it is the rule."

"But you will break through it just once—just this once, ma'am!"

"I cannot. Will you sit down?"

"Remember, ma'am, I'm not like the other poor creatures that come here. I'm not, indeed. I never did anything wrong but once. You needn't cut my hair off. I'm sure you needn't."

"Phillis Conyngham, if you do not sit down instantly and be quiet, I shall be obliged to call for assistance—I have no time to lose."

Phillis turned pale and pressed her hands to her brows. The matron tried to draw her back to the chair.

"No, no!" she cried, pushing her off. "Oh! don't cut my hair—I couldn't bear that. My hair he used to praise so. Oh! ma'am, I've been very wicked. I am willing to be in prison for it months —years, if he likes; but I think he'll come and see me some day. Don't let him find me so disgraced. Oh! I couldn't bear the thought; it would drive me mad, and I am not mad—not now; I was when I ran away from him, as they say I did. I was mad—I must have been, for I couldn't do it else. I love him so—whatever he may do, I love so; and indeed, he loved me once. He wouldn't have my hair cut off—oh, no, he never would. Why, I wonder how you dare think of it without his orders, you're a magistrate."

The matron smiled grimly.

"I don't like to use violence to one like you," she said; "but I will put again, you must either sit down instantly in that chair, and submit quietly, or I must get some one to force you. Now, which will you choose?"

"It's no use!" sobbed Phillis, hysterically; "I won't have it done, so—"

"I must call a man in, then, to hold you."

"Oh, no, no, no!"

"Will you let me do it, then, quietly?"

She clasped her hands over her head.

"Oh! ma'am, I can't have it done—I won't, I won't!"

The matron took hold of her arms and forced her back into the chair.

Phillis struggled, and held her hands tightly clasped on the matron's arm.

"Remember, ma'am, I have been mad," she said, looking up in her face with wild, entreating eyes. "I am not strong now, I—I—"

She stopped, smiled vacantly, and nodded with listless apathy.

The matron shuddered, and shook her arm free. She then went to the door, spoke to some one outside, and then came back to one of the gauze fans on the outer yard came in. One held a pair of handcuffs.

"Now," said the matron, sternly, "do you submit, Phillis Conyngham? Say you do, and I will not have you touched by any one but myself."

Phillis, at the sight of the men, let fall the scissors she had taken from the table, and held her den under her shawl, and rushing past the matron, crouched down in a corner, where she remained with her face to the wall, her hands behind, and with restless, dangerous eyes staring around.

The men approached, and put the handcuffs on her. A few words passed from the door, she seemed to feel her utter helplessness and weakness, for she ceased to struggle, and only panted and wept.

They bore her to the chair, where the matron, safe and harassed, stood waiting to perform her thankless task.

When Phillis felt the touch of the cold steel on her brow, she turned round sharply, and tried to hide her hands.

She seemed to have forgotten what caused their weight, and gazed down at them with a passionate look of regret and pain. Then a weird, passionless gleam of sense came in her eyes, and stretching out her fettered hands as far as she could, she looked at them, and at her head, and smiled, and let the tears ebb over her eyes, as she said, in a low, trembling voice, full of meaning:

"Ah, husband, Richard! is this the wedding-ring you give me?"

The matron had now quite loosed her hair, and as Phillis felt it fall over her shoulders, she stood it till the dark, waving mass nearly touched the floor, and her old wildness came back.

She sprang from the matron's hand like a young lioness, and emiting vacantly in their faces: "'tis 'mess a pity, isn't it? You don't see such hair every day, ma'am, do you? No; I'll warrant you don't. And that reminds me—what, what? Where am I? What was that our old parson said about a wedding-ring? Husband? Why, I'm married by this and by that, my lads, whoever you are, you're cutting off my wits with mine. Oh, mercy on me! I'm going mad—I'm mad—I'm all."

She became so frantic before the task was over that the men had to hold her in the chair.

A scrap of something, the consciousness returned to her as the matron laid down her scissors and gave some order to the men. Phillis then threw herself on the floor in a paroxysm of remorse, and hushed, for a moment, her laughter and her sobs.

"Oh, one moment!" she pleaded, as the matron took hold of her arm. "Let me just look at it—it was so pretty! And now I think of it, there is something in the color of it like—like—as though I'm his daughter—send him one look I do live in Cumberland. Yes, send him one, and tell him to give the rest to Clarissa, and bring it to this place—for he's an honest man, I tell you. Stop, stop one minute more!"

Bring him here—Richard Sleuth, I mean—and let him look at the—this—the hair he was to crown with honor! Oh, let him come now and see it shorning the floor of a prison!"

Mr. Richard Sleuth sent to the prison that night, some hours later, to inquire with gracious sympathy after the condition of the unhappy creature who had so injured him. The answer he received was that Phillis Conyngham was raving mad.

THE FIRST VICTIM OF THE LOCOMOTIVE.

THOSE who can remember the introduction of the railway system into England, cannot yet have forgotten the gloom cast over the public mind by the shocking accident which marked the inauguration of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway—the first line constructed in that country—an accident by which one of the most remarkable statesmen and one of the soundest political economists of that time was suddenly deprived of life in the presence of the entire British Cabinet, his brother ministers. We refer to the death of Mr. Huskisson, which took place on the 15th of Sept., 1830. It was on that day that it was determined to open the new line, and the excitement in the public mind was at its highest point. The sanguine had been daring enough to predict the day when passengers should be carried at not less than twenty miles an hour through tunnels and cuttings, and over embankments and viaducts, spanning busy high roads and murky beds of water, while old adherents of the coaching interest shook their heads, and prophesied that no good would come of so daring an attempt at interference upon the ways of our forefathers.

In the town of Liverpool a general holiday was observed, and all were in expectation of the brilliant assemblage who had been invited to the ceremony. At half-past two on the morning eight locomotives were drawn up at the entrance of the tunnel in Liverpool. The Duke of Wellington arrived at ten, and was received with enthusiasm by the crowd, which was immense. At the moment when the magnificent carriage prepared for the Duke passed from the tunnel, a musician band played the air entitled "See the Conquering Hero Comes!" Then the multitude burst forth in joyous huzzas. The cortège left the town at twenty minutes to eleven, drawn by the eight locomotives, which, as the venerable procession of all conquerors' engines, deserves honorable mention in the history of that day. There were the Northumbrian, drawing the Duke and the guests of honor; the Phœnix, at the head of the fleet, the Rocket, the Dart, the Comet, the Arrow, and the Meteor, each of which was distinguished by a flag of a different color. On issuing from the tunnel, the Northumbrian took the lead of the eight, with its three carriages, of which the first carried the procession. In the centre was the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and the remainder of the ministers and other distinguished guests, and the third the directors of the companies. The seven other locomotives took the same route to the first, and every four or five carriages, the entire cortège being composed of 772 persons.

The train moved slowly, alternately accelerating or retarding their progress, to permit the party to examine the more remarkable portions of the track. At length they came to the place where the Parkside Station is made the engines to take a fresh supply of water. The joyous and delighted crowds were by no means disappointed at the calamity which was about to result from this stoppage. Before leaving Liverpool, all had been cautioned not to descend from the carriages at the time—the precaution which was, unfortunately, not so well understood what was to result in the death of one of the most valuable lives. The caution had even been inserted in the printed programme of the day's festivities; a copy of which had been handed to every guest. Notwithstanding this caution, Mr. Huskisson, who had been lifted the office of Home Secretary in the British Cabinet, accompanied by Mr. William Holmes, a member of Parliament, and some others of the travellers, ventured to get out of the carriage in which he had been seated, the two former with the intention of going to exchange a few words with Mr. Huskisson's friend, whose carriage occupied the right line of rails. The scene was observed with interest by the company, as it was known and had been known to exist between the Duke and Mr. Huskisson, and the coolness with which the former greeted him was felt to be in harmony with the good auspices of that day. Mr. Huskisson and the Duke were on the best of warmly shaking hands at the window of the carriage, when to the utter horror of the spectators, at that very moment, the locomotive engine, the Rocket, was suddenly observed to be coming express on the parallel line. The latter had descended now had to regain their places. Some stepped on the one line, and some on the other. Some were minded enough to obey this warning, climbing into the carriage with more or less cold. Others, whether behind the carriage of the Duke. But there was one, a man already advanced in years of age, whose active, unsupply, not so great—this was the unfortunate Mr. Huskisson. He seemed to have entirely forgotten. His first idea appeared to be to cross the line before the Rocket, but the confusion of the simultaneous shout passed deterred him. Mr. Holmes, who was in the same predicament, had succeeded in regaining his body so closely as possible against the side of the carriage of the Duke. At the moment between the two men each four feet, the projection of the Duke's carriage was about two feet, and that of the Rocket about six inches only, so that there remained a breadth of eighteen inches, which enabled Mr. Holmes to make a passage. Mr. Holmes, seeing the unfortunate indecision of the gentleman, cried out to him, "This way, sir!" Mr. Huskisson, not thus—but, unfortunately, the latter had turned upon the side of the carriage, where, in short endeavor to pass round it, when the Rocket struck the door. Mr. Huskisson was crushed immediately, which was driven by Mr. Locke, afterwards the great Stephenson, who was always viewed with high admiration the train.

The Earl of Wilton, Mr. Holmes, and others rushed to the spot and lifted the unfortunate minister, who was endeavored, "I am dead! My blood has entered on my soul!" Mr. Huskisson died the same night at Eccles, where he was carried immediately after the accident by the Northumbrian engine, driven by George Stephenson. Mr. Locke, driven by Mr. Locke, reached the fifteen miles in twenty-five minutes, or at the rate of thirty-six miles an hour, a fact which inspired the public so far for the most marvellous achievement yet heard of in connection with steam.

Assuredly, if there were any truth in the popular belief in evil omens, none might be taken a gloomy view of the prospects of railway travelling. A constellation of the Duke, the Duke, and the Duke has its antipathy to railways, strangely urged that the cortège should return to Liverpool, and the locomotive was finally neglected, and it was resolved to proceed with the ceremony of the day. Amid the gay and joyful spirits among the crowds who had flocked from all parts to witness the opening of the railway, the sad occurrence to the viceroy-to-house at Eccles, while another of the engines, driven by Mr. Manchester, brought back the best medical aid which could be obtained. But all the skill and kindness were unavailing, and at half-past nine in the evening of the day the sanguine Mr. Huskisson breathed his last.

THE FIRST VICTIM OF THE LOCOMOTIVE.

Bob stared at him, and then lost a little of his sublime serenity, as he turned his looks to the ground in meditation. He hadn't quite expected this.

"You are a magistrate, Mister Sleuth. Worry good. But do you know who I am? The man as married that 'ere Miss Emilie inside of me. The man was deprived of his natural protector when that 'ere fine old gentleman was made away with. When I laid Lord Ketin in Abbey, I used to think I ought to ha' stayed in my native land, and ha' stuck to it till I had disclosered the assassin as struck the fatal blow, and then I'd worry bed of death. I lost my money. Why? Because I hadn't done my duety to my honored father-in-law. I left it to the families inside of me. I can't sleep for thinking on it. I zeed it all when that 'ere money was gone. And now I means to go about hunting my murderer for existence, so long as I can bring the horrid wretch to justice as made me and my boy a kind o' horphane!"

"Perhaps, then, it is as a magistrate you appeal to me?"

"Take it so, if you like."

"Then against whom do your suspicions lie?"

"A worry nice gentleman indeed, if he only keeps his hands off my property—Richard Sleuth, Esquire, of Eddington Hall, Justice of the Peace!"

"Bob, there will be a meeting of magistrates to-morrow at Hengston. Anybody will show you the way. Come there to-morrow, at eleven in the forenoon, and I will be hear in public what you have got to say. Good-bye!"

"And that's all?"

"That's all."

"You're sure it's all? You won't be a runnin' arter me presently, with your heart a burstin' because you can't get at me?"

"Good-day, Bob! Had you appealed to me in your distress, and in a proper manner, I should have done something for you even now."

It was Bob's turn now to cry out.

"Ohe! Good-day, Mr. Sleuth."

He made no attempt to interfere with Sleuth's progress, and he thus was able to overtake, in a few minutes, his carriage, and get in, and begin to reflect on his new and startling, because altogether unexpected, apparition.

Phillis's attack, and her subsequent madness—which might have not only temporarily cover her revelations—Clarissa's refusal to receive him as a suitor, and now Bob's almost incredible audacity in charging him with the cruel murder of the alderman—all alike impressed him as with a sense of the unreality of his position, and gave a kind of supernaturism tinge to his thoughts, suggestive of coming trouble.

He was glad he had dealt so sternly with Bob. It might convince Bob he was on a false track; and then, if his own faith in Sleuth's guilt were shaken, he would hardly like to risk the treatment that could so easily be inflicted on him as a

SKETCHES FROM THE BURMESE WAR—THE ELEPHANT BRIGADE AT MOULMIN.

A FEW LONDON HOUSES.

THERE is always a deep interest attaching to the homes and haunts of writers and artists who have ministered to our instruction and amusement, or excited our admiration. A late London writer has given us a most interesting series of sketches, which he entitles, "A Walk from London to Putney," and in this walk encounters various houses, had a life of duller calm than the indwellers of our square.' Hans place may also be approached from Sloane street, and No. 23 Hans place is the south-east corner. Among its inmates have been Lady Caroline Lamb, Miss Mitford, Lady Bulwer, Miss Landon, Mrs. S. C. Hall, and Miss Roberts. How much of the 'romance and reality' of life is in a moment conjured up in the mind by the mention of the names here grouped in local association!

"The editor of the memoirs of L. E. L. records two or three circumstances which give a general interest to Hans place. Here it was that Miss Landon was born on the 14th August, 1802, in the house now No. 35; and 'it is remarkable that the greater portion of L. E. L.'s existence was passed on the spot where she was born. From Hans place and its neighborhood she was seldom absent, and then not for any great length of time; until within a year or two of her death, she had there found her home, not indeed in the house of her birth, but close by. Taken occasionally during the early years of her childhood, into the country, it was to Hans place she returned. Here some of her school time was passed. When her parents removed, she yet clung to the old spot, and, as her own mistress, chose the same scene for her residence. When one series of inmates quitted it, she still resided there with their successors, returning continually, after every wandering, like a blackbird to its nest.

THE HOME OF MISS LANDON.

THE ROOM IN WHICH MISS LANDON WROTE.

"The partiality of Miss Landon for London was extraordinary. In a letter, written in 1834, and addressed to a reverend gentleman, she ominously says: 'When I have the good luck or ill luck (I rather lean to to the latter opinion) of being married, I shall certainly insist on the wedding excursion not extending much beyond Hyde Park Corner.' When in her sixth year (1808), Miss Landon was sent to school at No. 22 Hans place. This school was then kept by Miss Rowden, who, in 1801, had published 'A Poetical Introduction to the Study of Botany,' and, in 1810, a poem entitled 'The Pleasures of Friendship.' Miss R. became the Countess St. Quentin, and died some years ago in the neighborhood of Paris. In this house, where she had been educated, Miss Landon afterwards resided for many years as a boarder with the Misses Lance, who conducted a ladies' school. 'It seems,' observes the biographer of L. E. L., 'to have been appropriate to such purposes from the time it was built, now was L. E. L. the first who drank at the 'well of English' within its walls. Miss Mitford, we believe, was educated there, and Lady Caroline Lamb was an inmate for a time.'

"It is the remark of Miss Landon herself, that 'a history of the how and where works of imagination have been produced would often be more extraordinary than the works themselves.' 'Her own case,' observes a female friend, 'is, in some degree, an illustration of perfect independence of mind over all external circumstances. Perhaps to the L. E. L., of whom so many nonsensical things have been said, as that she should write with a crystal pen, dipped in dew, upon silver paper, and use for pounce the dust of a butterfly's wing, a dilettante of literature would assign, for the scene of her authorship, a fairy-like boudoir, with rose-colored and silver hangings, fitted with all the luxuries of fastidious taste. How did the reality agree with this fancy sketch? Miss Landon's drawing-room, indeed, was prettily furnished, but it was her invariable habit to write in her bedroom. I see it now, that homely-looking, almost uncomfortable room, fronting the street, and barely furnished with a simple white bed, at the foot of which was a small, old, oblong-shaped sort of dressing-table, quite covered with a common, worn writing-desk, heaped with papers, while some strewed the ground, the table being too small for aught beside the desk, a little, high-backed cane chair, which gave you any idea rather than that of comfort. A few books scattered about completed the author's paraphernalia.'

"In this attic did the muse of L. E. L. dream of and describe music, moonlight, and roses, and 'apostrophize loves, memories, hopes, and fears,' with how much ultimate appetite for invention or sympathy may be judged from her declaration, that 'there is one conclusion at which I have arrived, that a horse in a mill has an easier life than an author. I am fairly fagged out of my life.'

"Miss Roberts, who had resided in the same house with Miss Landon, prefixed a brief memoir to a collection of poems by that lamented lady, which appeared shortly after her death, her own mournful lines:

> "'Alas! hope is not prophecy—we dream,
> But rarely does the glad fulfilment come;
> We leave our land, and we return no more.'

And within less than twenty months from the selection of these lines they became applicable to her who had quoted them.

"Emma Roberts accompanied her sister, Mrs. M'Naughten, to India, where she resided for some time. On her sister's death, Miss Roberts returned to England, and employed her pen assiduously and advantageously in illustrating the condition of our Eastern dominions. She returned to India, and died at Poonah on the 17th September, 1840. Though considerably the oldest, she was one of the early friends of Miss Landon, having for many years boarded with the Misses Lance, in Hans place.

"These were happy days, and little boded the premature and melancholy fate which awaited them in foreign climes. We believe,' says the editor of the Literary Gazette, 'that it was the example of the literary pursuits of Miss Landon which stimulated Miss Roberts to try her powers as an author, and we remember having the gratification to assist her in launching her first essay—an historical production, which reflected high credit on her talents, and at once established her in a fair position in the ranks of literature. Since then she has been one of the most prolific of our female writers, and given to the public a number of works of interest and value. The expedition to Ava, in which she unfortunately perished, was undertaken with comprehensive views towards the further illustration of the East and portions of her descriptions have appeared, as she journeyed to her destination, in periodicals devoted to Asiatic pursuits.'

"The influence of Miss Landon's literary popularity upon the mind of Miss Roberts very probably caused that lady to desire similar celebrity. Indeed, so imitative are the impulses of the human mind, that it may fairly be questioned if Miss Landon would ever have attuned her lyre had she not been in the presence of Miss Mitford's and Miss Rowden's 'fame, and felt its influence.' Miss Mitford has chronicled so minutely all the sayings and doings of her school-days in Hans place (H. P., as she mysteriously writes it), that she admits us at once behind the scenes. She describes herself as sent there (we will not supply the date, but presume it to be somewhere about 1800) 'a petted child of ten years old, born and bred in the country, and as shy as a hare.' The schoolmistress, a Mrs. S——, 'seldom came near me. Her post was to sit all day, nicely dressed, in a nicely-furnished drawing-room, busy with some piece of delicate needlework, receiving mammas, aunts and godmammas, answering questions, and administering as much praise as she conscientiously could—perhaps a little more. In the school-room she ruled, like other rulers, by ministers and delegates, of whom the French teacher was the principal.' This French teacher, the daughter of an émigré of distinction, left, upon the short peace of Amiens, to join her parents in an attempt to recover their property, in which they succeeded. Her successor is admirably sketched by Miss Mitford; and the mutual antipathy which existed between the French and English teacher, in whom we at once recognize Miss Rowden:

THE PELELE, OR LIP RING, OF MANGANJA WOMEN, AFRICA.

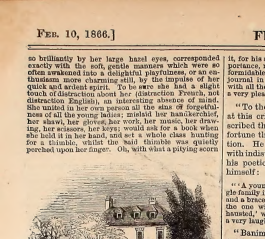
"'Never were two better haters. Their relative situations had probably something to do with it, and yet it was wonderful that two such excellent persons should so thoroughly detest each other. Miss R.'s aversion was of the cold, phlegmatic, contemptuous, provoking sort; she kept aloof, and said nothing. Madame's was acute, fiery and loquacious; she not only had a Miss R., but hated her for sake knowledge, and literature, and wit, and, above all, poetry, which she denounced as something fatal and contagious, like the plague.'



"Miss Mitford's literary and dramatic tastes seem to have been acquired from Miss Rowden, whom she describes as 'one of the most charming women that she had ever known:'

"'The pretty word gracious, by which Napoleon loved to designate Josephine, seemed made for her. She was a full of a delicate grace of mind and person. Her little elegant figure and her fair mild face, lighted up so brilliantly by her large hazel eyes, corresponded exactly with the soft, gentle manners which were so often awakened into a delightful playfulness, or an enthusiasm more charming still, by the impulse of her quick and ardent spirit. To be sure she had a slight touch of distraction about her (distraction French, not distraction English), an interesting absence of mind. She united in her own person all the sins of forgetfulness of all the young ladies; mislaid her handkerchief, her shawl, her glovest her work, her music, her drawing, her scissors, her keys; would ask for a book when she held it in her hand, and set a whole class hunting for a thimble, whilst the said thimble was quietly perched upon her finger. Oh, with what a pitying scorn

THE FIRST VICTIM OF THE LOCOMOTIVE.

THE HOME OF BARTOLOZZI.

our exact and recollective Frenchwoman used to look down on such an incorrigible scatterbrain! But she was a pearless, as Madame said, and what could you expect better?'

"Such was Miss Landon's schoolmistress; and under this lady's especial instruction did Miss Mitford pass the years 1802, '3, and '4; together they read 'chiefly poetry:' and 'besides the readings,' says Miss Mitford, 'Miss B. compensated in another way for my unwilling application. She took me often to the theatre; whether as an extra branch of education, or because she was herself in the height of a dramatic fever, it would be invidious to inquire. The effect may be easily foreseen; my enthusiasm soon equalled her own; we began to read Shakspeare, and nothing else,'

MONKEYS TEAZING CROCODILES.

"In 1810 Miss Mitford first appeared as an authoress, by publishing a volume of poems, which, in the course of the following year, passed into a second edition.

"At No. 21 Hans place, the talented artistes, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan, resided some time." And then comes another celebrated home:

"In the house (No. 13 Brompton Grove), which stood in a little way back from the road, between Grove House and the Grapes public-house, and which was taken down in December, 1844, and in the previous June, when sketched, occupied by a stone-mason, Mr. Banim lodged from May, 1822, to October, 1824. While residing here, he was engaged in contributing to and editing a short-lived weekly paper, entitled the Literary Register, the first number of which appeared on the 6th of July, 1822, and which publication terminated with the forty-fourth, on the 3d of May, 1823, when Banim devoted his attention to preparing the 'Tales of the O'Hara Family' for the press. It is a remarkable local coincidence, that Gerald Griffin, who

'To his own mind had lived a mystery,' the contemporary rival of Banim, as an Irish novelist and dramatist, should have immediately succeeded him in the tenancy of '13 Brompton Grove,' as this house was sometimes called.

"'About this period (1825) he (Griffin) took quiet, retired lodgings, at a house in Fetter lane, now a stone-mason's, close by Hermitage Lane, which separated it from the then residence of the editor of the Literary Gazette, and a literary intercourse rather than a personal intimacy, though of a most agreeable nature, grew up between them.'

"On the 10th of November, 1824, Griffin, writing to his brother, commences a letter full of literary gossip with:

"'Since my last I have visited Mr. —— several times. The last time he invited me to dine with him, which I happened not to be able to do; and was very sorry for it, for his acquaintance is to me a matter of great importance, not only from the eagine he wields—and a formidable one it is, being the most widely circulated journal in Europe—but also, because he is acquainted with all the principal literary characters of the day, and a very pleasant kind of man.'

"To the honest support of the Literary Gazette at this critical period in Griffin's life may be ascribed the struggle which he made for fame and fortune through the blind path of literary distinction. He came a raw Irish lad to the metropolis, with indistinct visions of celebrity floating through his poetical mind; or, as he candidly confesses himself:

"'A young gentleman, totally unknown, even to a single family in London, with a few pounds in one pocket and a brace of tragedies in the other, supposing that the one will set him up before the others are exhausted,' which, he admits, 'is not a very novel, but a very laughable delusion.'

"Banim's kindness—his sympathy, indeed, for Griffin, deserves notice.

"'I cannot tell you here,' writes the latter, 'the many, many instances in which Banim has shown his friendship since I wrote last; yet it suffice to say, that he is the sincerest, heartiest, most disinterested being that breathes. His fireside is the only one where I enjoy anything like social life or home. I go out (to Brompton Grove) occasionally in an evening, and talk or read for some hours, or have a bed, and leave next day.'

"Again, in a letter dated 31st of March, 1824, Griffin says:

"'What would I have done if I had not found Banim? I should have instantly despaired on——'s treatment of me. I should never be tired of talking about and thinking of Banim. Mark me! he is a man, the only one I have met since I left Ireland, almost. We walked over Hyde Park together on St. Patrick's Day, and renewed our home recollections by gathering shamrocks, and placing them in our hats, even under the eye of John Bull.'

Then comes the home of Theodore Hook:

"Next to Thames Bank, formerly stood Egmont Villa, the residence of Theodore Hook, and the house in which he died, now pulled down, the back of which is shown in the annexed sketch. This house, though of the smallest dimensions, was fitted up with much good taste. There was a small boudoir on the side of the drawing-room, which was very rich in articles of virtù, more especially in some remarkably fine carvings, attributed to Cellini, Brustolini, and others. These were left to Hook by his brother, the late Dean of Worcester. As an improvisatore, Hook was unapproachable.

THE HOME OF THEODORE HOOK.

The name of Bartolozzi, the great engraver, is one of world-wide celebrity, and this is the house in which he resided.

"Exactly opposite to this house, in the angle of the road, stands an old house in a moderate sized garden (Cambridge Lodge). Francis Bartolozzi, the celebrated engraver, who arrived in England in 1764, came to reside here 1777. He was born at Florence in 1730, and died at Lisbon in 1815. His son, Gaetano Bartolozzi, father to the late Madame Vestris, was born in 1757, and died August 25th, 1813."

The last is the residence of Edmund Kean. It was called Walnut Tree Cottage, and stood upon the Fulham road. Here the great actor passed a large part of his life, and here he died. This house was also, for many years the residence of Copley, the artist.

BOUNTY IN THE OLDEN TIME.

THE ELEPHANT BRIGADE.

True circumstances of the English-Burmah war are still familiar in the memories of our readers. Our illustration is taken from an incident of that time, when the English found that it become necessary to fight the enemy with their own weapons, and to that end organized an elephant brigade. This was composed of 100 picked animals, who passed through a thorough course of training to make them warriors of a high degree. A part of this training was the education of the animal to stand fire. The brigade is drawn up in line, and a 12-pounder brought to its front, heavily charged, and fired down the line, and under the very noses, or trunks of the elephants.

The result has shown that the elephant possesses stolid courage and imperturbability, the cases wherein they showed any fear or disturbance being exceedingly rare, while among the horses the panic was excessive, and the training to bring them up to artillery standard very difficult.

CROCODILES AND MONKEYS.

FROM Henry Mershot's travels in Indo-China we select the following paragraph: "Crocodiles are more numerous in the river at Paknam Yem than in that of Chantaburn. I continually saw them throw themselves from the banks into the water; and it has frequently happened that carcles fishers, or persons who have imprudently taken asleep on the shore, have become their prey, or have afterwards died of wounds inflicted upon them. This latter has happened twice during my stay here. It is amusing, however—for one is interested in observing the habits of animals all over the world—to see the manner in which these creatures catch the apes, which sometimes take a fancy to play with them. Close to the bank lies the crocodile, his body in water, and only his capacious mouth above the surface, ready to seize anything that may come within reach. A troop of apes catch sight of him, seem to consult together, approach little by little, and commence their antics, by turns actors and spectators. One of the most active or most impudent jumps from branch to branch, till within a respectable distance off from the crocodile, when, by hanging by one claw, and with the dexterity peculiar to these animals, he advances and retires, now giving his enemy a blow with his paw, at another time only pretending to do so. The other apes, enjoying the fun, evidently wish to take a part in it; but the other branches being too high, they form a sort of chain by laying hold of each other's paws, and thus swing backward and forward, while any of them who comes within reach of the crocodile torments him to the best of his ability. Sometimes the terrible jaws suddenly close, but not upon the audacious ape, who just escapes; then there are cries of exultation from his tormentors, who gambol about joyfully. Occasionally, however, the claw is trapped, and the victim dragged with the rapidity of lightning beneath the water, when the whole troop disperse, groaning and shrieking. The misadventure does not, however, prevent their recommencing the game a few days afterward."

THE HOME OF GERALD GRIFFIN.

INCREDULITY PERSONIFIED.—There is living on Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts, an old man who has never been off the island, and the extent of his knowledge is bounded by the confines of his home. He has been told of a war between the North and South, but as he has never heard the din of battle, nor seen any soldiers, he considered it a hoax. He is utterly unable to read, and is ignorant to the last degree. An excellent story is told of his first and only day at school. He was quite a lad when a lady came to the district where his father resided to teach school. He was sent, and as the teacher was classifying the school he was called up in turn and interrogated as to his former studies. Of course he had to say that he never had been to school, and knew none of his letters. The schoolmistress gave him a seat on one side until she had finished the preliminary examination of the rest of the scholars. She then called him to her and drew on the blackboard the letter A, told him what it was and wished him to remember how it looked. He looked at it a moment, and then inquired (he stuttered):

THE HOME OF EDMUND KEAN.

"H-h-how do you know it's A?"

The teacher replied that when she was a girl she had been to school to an old gentleman who told her so.

The boy eyed the A for a moment, and then asked:

"H-h-how did he know?"

This was almost a stunner, but the teacher suddenly recollected that he had told her that when a boy he had been to a school to a lady who taught him that it was A.

The boy eyed the letter a little longer, when he burst out with

"H-h-how did he know but she l-l-lied?"

The teacher could not get over this obstacle, and the poor boy was sent home as incorrigible.

The New American Novel.

THE DEAD LETTER.

CHAPTER III.—CONTINUED.

We passed on into the house, and deposited our charge in the back parlor. I thought of Eleanor, as she had walked this room just twenty-four hours ago, a brilliant vision of love and triumphant beauty. Ay! twenty-four hours ago this clay before me was as resplendent with life, as eager, as glowing with the hope of the soul within it! Now, all the hours of time would never restore the tenant to his tenement. Who had dared to take upon himself the responsibility of unlawfully and with violence ejecting this human soul from its house?

I shuddered as I asked myself the question. Somewhere must be lurking a guilty creature, with a heart on fire from the flames of hell, with which it had put itself in contest.

Then my heart stood still within me—all but the family had been banished from the apartment—her father was leading in Eleanor. With a slow step, clinging to his arm, she entered; but as her eyes fixed themselves upon the rigid outlines lying there beneath the funeral pall, she sprung forward, casting herself upon her lover's corpse. Before, she had been silent; now began a murmur of woe so heart-rending that we who listened wished ourselves deaf before our ears had heard tones and sentences which could never be forgotten.

She talked to him as if he were alive and could hear her. She was resolved to make him hear and feel her love through the dark death which was between them.

"Ah, Henry," she said, in a low, caressing tone, pressing back the curls from his forehead with her hand, "your hair is wet still. To think that you should lie out there all night—all night—on the ground, in the rain, and I not know of it! It was cruel of me to sleep so. Would you guess, I was vexed at you last evening because you didn't come? It was that made me so gay—not because I was happy. Vexed at you for not coming, when you could not because you were dead!" and she laughed.

As that soft, dreadful laughter thrilled through the room, with a groan Mr. Argyll arose and went out; he could bear no more.

The kisses; the light, gentle touches of his hands and forehead, as if she might hurt him with the caresses which she could not withhold; the intent look which continually watched him as if expecting an answer; the miserable smile upon her white face—these were things which haunted those who saw them through many a future slumber.

"You will not say you forgive me for singing last night. You don't say a word to me—because you are dead—that's it—because you are dead—murdered!"

The echo of her own last word recalled her wandering reason.

"My God! murdered!" she exclaimed, suddenly rising to her full height, with an awful air; "who do you suppose did it?"

Her cousin was standing near; her eyes fell upon him as she asked the question. The look, the manner, were too much for his already overwrought sensibility; he shrunk away, caught my arm, and sunk down, insensible. I did not wonder. We all of us felt as if we could endure no more.

The arrival of the relatives was the last scene in the tragedy of that day. Unable to bear more of it, I went out in the darkness and walked upon the lawn. My head was hot; the cool air felt grateful to me; I leaned long upon the trunk of an oak, whose dark shadow shut out the starlight from about me; thought was busy with recent events. Who was the murderer? The question revolved in my brain, coming uppermost every other moment, as certainly as the turning of a wheel brings a certain point again and again to the top. My training, as a student of the law, helped my mind to fix upon every slightest circumstance which might hold a suspicion.

"Could that woman?"—but no, the hand of a woman could scarcely have given that sure and powerful blow. It looked like the work of a practiced hand—or, if not, at least it had been deliberately given, with malice aforethought. The assassin had premeditated the deed; had watched his victim and awaited the hour. Thus far, there was absolutely no clue whatever to the guilty party; bold as was the act, committed in the early evening, in the haunts of a busy community, it had been most fatally successful; and the doer had vanished as completely as if the earth had opened and swallowed him up. No one, as yet, could form any plausible conjecture, even as to the motive.

In the name of Eleanor Argyll—in the name of her whom I loved, whose happiness I had that day seen in ruins, I vowed to use every endeavor to discover and bring to punishment the murderer. I know not why this purpose took such firm hold of me. The conviction of the guilty would not restore the life which had been taken—the bloom to a heart prematurely withered; it would afford no consolation to the bereaved. Yet, if to discover had been to call back Henry Moreland to the world from which he had been so ruthlessly dismissed, I could hardly have been more determined in the pursuit. In action only could I feel relief from the oppression which weighed upon me. It could not give life to the dead—but the voice of Justice called aloud never to permit this deed to sink into oblivion, until she had executed the divine vengeance of the law upon the doer.

As I stood there, in silence and darkness, pondering the matter, I heard a light rustle of the dry leaves upon the ground, and felt, rather than saw, a figure pass me. I might have thought it one of the servants, were it not for the evident caution of its movements. Presently, where the shadows of the trees were less thick, I detected a person stealing toward the house. As she crossed an open space, the starlight revealed the form and garments of a female; the next moment she passed into the obscurity of shadows again, where she remained some time, unsuspicious of my proximity, like myself, leaning against a tree, and watching the mansion. Apparently satisfied that no one was about—the hour now verging toward midnight—she approached with hovering steps, now pausing, now drawing back, the west side of the mansion, from one of the windows of which the solemn light of the death-candles shone. Under this window she crouched down. I could not tell if her attitude were a kneeling one. It must have been more than an hour that she remained motionless in this place; I, equally quiet, watching the dark spot where she was. For the instant that she had stood between me and the window, her form was outlined against the light, when I saw that this must be the young woman whose strange conduct at the gate had attracted my attention. Of course I did not see her face; but the tall, slender figure, the dark bonnet, and nervous movement were the same. I perplexed myself with vain conjectures.

I could not help connecting her with the murder, or with the victim, in some manner, however vague.

At last she arose, lingered, went away, passing near me with that soft, rustling step again. I was impelled to stretch out my hand and seize her; her conduct was suspicious: she ought to be arrested and examined, if only to clear herself of these circumstances. The idea that, by following her, I might trace her to some haunt, where proofs were secreted or accomplices hidden, withheld my grasp.

Cautiously timing my step with hers, that the murmur of the leaves might not betray me, I followed. As she passed out the gate, I stood behind a tree, lest she should look back and discern me; then I passed through, following along in the shadow of the fence.

She hurried on in the direction of the spot at which the murder had been committed; but when nearly there, perceiving that some persons, though long past midnight, still hovered about the fatal place, she turned and passed me. As soon as I dared, without alarming her, I also turned, pursuing her through the long, quiet street, until it brought her to a more crowded and poorer part of the village, where she went down a side street, and disappeared in a tenement-house, the entrance-hall to which was open. I ought to have gone at once for officers, and searched the place; but I unwisely concluded to wait for daylight.

"As I came up the walk on my return, I met James Argyll in the avenue, near the front portico.

"Oh, is it you?" he exclaimed, after I had spoken to him. "I thought it was—was——"

"You are not superstitious, James?' for his hollow voice betrayed that he was frightened.

"You did give me a confounded uneasy sensation as you came up," he answered, with a laugh. How can people laugh under such circumstances? "Where have you been at this hour, Richard?"

"Walking in the cool air; the house smothered me."

"So it did me. I could not rest. I have just come out to get a breath of fresh air."

"It is almost morning," I said, and passed on into my chamber.

I knew who watched, without food, without rest, in the chamber of death, by whose door my footsteps led; but ache as my heart might, I had no words of comfort for sorrow like hers—so I passed on.

CHAPTER IV.—MORELAND VILLA.

Several minor circumstances prevented my going in search of the woman who had excited my suspicions on the previous day until about nine o'clock of the morning, when I engaged an officer, and we two went quietly, without communicating our plans to any one else, to the tenement house before spoken of.

Although Blankville was not a large village, there was in it, as in nearly every town blessed with a railroad depot, a shabby quarter where the rougher portion of its working people lived. The house stood in this quarter; it was a three-story frame building, occupied by half a dozen families, mostly those of Irish laborers, who found work in the vicinity of the depot. I had seen the strange girl ascend to the second floor, in the dim light of the previous night, so we went up and knocked at the first door we came upon. It was opened by a decent-appearing middle-aged woman, who held the nob in her hand while she waited for us to make known our errand; we both stepped into her apartment before we spoke. A rapid glace revealed an innocent-looking room while the ordinary furniture of such a place—a cooking-stove, bed, table, etc.; but no other inmate. I was certain that I had seen the girl enter this room at the head of the stairs, so I ventured:

"Is your daughter at home, ma'am?"

"Is it my niece you mean?"

"Oh, she is your niece? I suppose so—a tall girl with dark eyes and hair."

"That's Leesy herself. Was you wanting any work done?"

"Yes," answered the officer, quickly taking the matter out of my hands. "I wanted to get a set of shirts made up—six, with fine, stitched bosoms." He had noticed a cheap sewing-machine standing near the window, and a bundle of course muslin in a basket near by.

"It's sorry I am to disappoint you; but Leesy's not with me now, and I hardly venture on the fine work."

"You did't say where she was, Mrs. Sullivan."

"She's making the fine things in a fancy-store in New York—caps and collars and sleeves and the beautiful tucked waists. She was here to stay over the Sunday with me—she often does that; and she's gone back by the six o'clock train this mornin'—and she'll be surely late at that by an hour. I tried to coax her to stay the day, she seemed so poorly. She's not been herself this long time—she seems goin' in a decline like—it's the stooping over the needle, I think. She's so nervous-like, the news of the murder yesterday almost killed her. 'Twas an awful deed that, wasn't it, gintlemen? I could'nt sleep a wink last night for thinkin' of that poor young man and the sweet lady he was to have married. Such a fine, generous, polite young gintleman!"

"Did you know him?"

"Know him! as well as my own son if I had one!—not that ever I spoke to him, but he's passed here often on his way to his father's house, and to Mr. Argyll's; and Leesy sewed in their family these two summers when they've been here, and was always twice paid.

"Leesy thought much of him, you think, Mrs. Sullivan, said the official, taking a chair unbidden, and putting on a friendly, gossiping air. "Everybody speaks well of him. So she sewed in the family?"

"Six weeks every summer. They was always satisfied with her sewing—she's the quickest and neatest hand with the needle! She'd make them shirts of yours beautiful, if she was to home, sir."

"When did she go to New York to live?"

"Last winter, early. It's nearly a year now. There was something come across her—she appeared homesick like, and strange. When she said she meant to go to the city and get work, I was minded to let her go, for I thought the change mebbe would do her good. But she's quite ailing and coughs dreadful o' nights. I'm afraid she catched cold in that rainstorm, night afore last; she came up all the way from the depot in it. She was wet to the skin when she got here and as white as a sheet. She was so weak-like that when the neighbors came in with the news yesterday, she gave a scream and dropped right down. I didn't wonder she was took aback. I ain't done trembling yet myself."

I remembered the gentleman who had first spoken to me about the girl said that she had come in on the morning train, Saturday; I could not reconcile this with her coming up from the depot at dark; yet I wished to put my question in such a way as not to arouse suspicion of my motive.

"If she came in the six o'clock train she must have been on the same train with Mr. Moreland."

"I believe she was in the seven o'clock cars—yes, she was. 'Twas half-past seven when she got in—the rain was pouring down awful. She didn't see him, for I asked her yesterday."

"In whose shop in New York is she employed?" inquired the officer.

"She's at No. 3—Broadway," naming a store somewhere between Wall street and Canal.

"Are you wanting her for any thing?" she asked, suddenly looking up sharply as if it just occurred to her that our inquiries were rather pointed.

"Oh, no," replied my companion, rising; "I was a bit tired and thought I'd rest my feet before starting out again. I'll thank you for a glass of water, Mrs. Sullivan. So you won't undertake the shirts?"

We descended to the street. It was arranged, as we walked along, that the officer should go to New York and put some detective there on the track of Leesy Sullivan. I informed my companion of the discrepancy between her actual arrival in town and her appearance at her aunt's. Either the woman had purposely deceived us or her niece had not gone home for a good many hours after landing at Blankville. I went with him to the depot, where we made a few inquiries which convinced us that she had arrived on Saturday morning, had sat an hour or two in the lady's room, and then gone away up town.

There was sufficient to justify our looking further. I took from my own pocket means to defray the expenses of the officer as well as to interest the New York detective, adding that liberal rewards were about to be offered, and waited until I saw him depart on his errand.

Then, turning to go to the office, my heart so sickened at the idea of business and the ordinary routine of living in the midst of such misery, that my footsteps shrunk away from their familiar paths! I could do nothing, just then, for the aid or comfort of the afflicted. The body was to be taken that afternoon to the city for interment, the next day, in the family inclosure at Greenwood; until the hour for its removal, there was nothing more that friendship could perform in the service of the mourners. My usual prescription for mental ailments was a long and vigorous walk; to-day I felt as if I could breathe only in the wide sunshine, so cramped and chilled were my spirits.

The summer residence of the Morelands lay about a mile beyond the Argyll mansion, out of the village proper, on a hillside, which sloped down to the river. It was surrounded by fine grounds, and commanded one of the loveliest views of the Hudson.

> "A spirit in my feet > Led me, who knows how?"

in the direction of this now vacant and solitary place—solitary, I believed, with the exception of the gardener and his wife, who lived in a cottage back of the gardens, and who remained the year round, he to attend to out-door matters, and she to give housekeeper's care to the closed mansion.

The place had never looked more beautiful to me, not even in the bloom of its June foliage and flowers, than it did as I approached it on this occasion. It had been the intention of the young couple to make this their permanent home after their marriage, going to the city only for a couple of the winter months. The very next week, I had heard, Eleanor expected to go down to help Henry in his selection of new furniture.

As I neared the house by the garden, I came nearly upon the portico which extended across its western front before I perceived that it was occupied. Sitting on its outer edge, with one arm half wound around one of its pillars, and her bonnet in the grass at her feet, I beheld the sewing-girl after whom I had dispatched an officer to New York. She did not perceive me, and I had an opportunity of studying the face of the woman who had fallen under my suspicion, when she was unaware that my eye was upon it, and when her soul looked out of it, unveiled, in the security of solitude. The impression which she made upon me was that of despair. It was written on attitude and expression. It was neither grief nor remorse—it was blank despair. It must have been half an hour that I remained quiet, watching her. In all that time she never stirred hand nor eyelid; her glance was upon the greensward at her feet. When I turn to that page of my memory I see her, photographed, as it were, upon every fold of the dark dress, which was some worsted substance, frayed, but neat; the black shawl, bordered, drawn close about the slender shoulders, which had the slight, habitual stoop of those who ply the needle for a living; the jetty hair pushed back from her forehead, the marble whiteness and rigidity of the face and mouth.

It was a face made to express passion. And although the only passion expressed now was that of despair, so intense that it grew like apathy, I could easily see how the rounded chin and full lips could melt into softer moods. The forehead was rather low, but fair, consorting with the oval of the cheek and chin; the brows dark and rather heavy. I remembered the wild black eyes which I had seen the previous day, and could guess at their hidden fires.

This was a girl to attract interest at any time, and I mutely wondered what had entangled the threads of her fate in the glittering web of a higher fortune, which was now suddenly interwoven with the pall of death. All her movements had been such as to confirm my desire to ascertain her connection, if any, with the tragedy. It seemed to me that if I could see her eyes before she was conscious of observance, I could tell whether there was guilt, or only sorrow, in her heart; therefore I remained quiet, waiting. But I had mistaken my powers, or the eyes overbore them. When she did lift them, as a steamer came puffing around the base of the mountain which ran down into the river at the east, and they suddenly encountered mine, where I stood not ten feet from her, I saw only black, unfathomable depths, pouring out a trouble so intense, that my own gaze dropped beneath their power.

She did not start upon observing me, which, as I thought, a guilty person, buried in self-accusing reveries, would have done—it seemed only slowly to penetrate her consciousness that a stranger was confronting her; when I raised my eyes, which had sunk beneath the intensity of hers, she was moving rapidly away toward the western gate.

"Miss Sullivan, you have forgotten your bonnet."

With a woman's instinct she put up her hand to smooth her disordered hair, came slowly back and took the bonnet which I extended toward her, without speaking. I hesitated what move to make next. I wished to address her—she was here, in my grasp, and I ought to satisfy myself, as far as possible, about the suspicions which I had conceived. I might do her an irreparable injury by making my feelings public, if she were innocent of any aid or instigation of the crime which had been committed, yet there were circumstances which could hardly pass unchallenged. That unaccountable absence of hers on Saturday, from three o'clock until an hour after the murder was committed; the statement of her aunt that she was in the city, and my finding her in this spot, in connection with the midnight visit to the window, and the other things which I had observed, were sufficient to justify inquiry. Yet, if I alarmed her prematurely I should have the less chance of coming upon proofs, and her accomplices, if she had any, would be led to take steps for greater safety. Anyhow, I would make her speak, and find what there was in her voice.

"Your aunt told me that you had gone to New York," I said, stepping along beside her, as she turned away.

"She thought so. Did you come here to see me, sir?" stopping short in her walk, and looking at me as if she expected me to tell my business.

This again did not look like the trepidation of guilt.

"No. I came out for a walk. I suppose our thoughts have led us both in the same direction. This place will have an interest to many, hereafter."

"Interest! the interest of vulgar curiosity! It will give them something to talk about. I hate it!" She spoke more to herself than to me, while a ray of fire darted from those black orbs; the next instant her face subsided into that passionate stillness again.

"So do I hate it. I do not like to have the grief of my friends subjected to cold and curious eyes."

"Yet, it is a privilege to have the right to mourn. I tell you the sorrow of that beautiful lady he was to have married is light compared with trouble that some feel. There are those who envy her."

It was not her words, as much as her wild, half-choked voice, which gave effect to them; she spoke, and grew silent, as if conscious that the truth had been wrung from her in the ear of a stranger. We had reached the gate, and she seemed anxious to escape through it; but I held it in my hand, looking hard at her, as I said:

"It may have been the hand of envy which dashed the cup of fruition from her lips. Her young life is withered, never to bloom again. I can imagine but one wretchedness in this world greater than hers—and that is the wretchedness of the guilty person who has murder written on his or her soul."

A spasm contracted her face; she pushed at the gate which I still held.

"Ah, don't," she said; "let me pass."

I opened it and she darted through, fleeing along the road which led out around the backward slope of the hill, like Io pursued by the stinging fly. Her path was away from the village, so that I hardly expected to see her again that day.

Within two minutes the gardener's wife came up the road to the gate. She had been down to visit the corpse of her young master; her eyes were red with weeping.

"How do you do, Mr. Redfield? These be miserable times, ain't they? My very heart is sore in my breast; but I couldn't cry a tear in the room where he was, a-lying there like life, for Miss Eleanor sot by him like a statue. It made me cold all over to see her—I couldn't speak to save me. The father and mother are just broke down, too."

"How is Miss Eleanor, this morning?"

"The Lord knows! She doesn't do anything but sit there, as quiet as can be. It's a bad symptom, to my thinking."

"Who was that went out the gate as I came around the bend? Was it that girl, again?"

"Do you mean Leesy Sullivan?"

"Yes, sir. Do you know her? She acts mighty queer to my thinkin'. She was out here Saturday, sittin' in the summer-house, all alone, till the rain began to fall—I guess she got a good soaking going home. I didn't think much about her; it was Saturday, and I thought likely she was taking a holiday, and there's many people like to come here, it's so pleasant. But what's brought her here again to-day, is more'n I can guess. Do you know, sir?"

"But, as you say, there is something queer in the actions of Miss Sullivan. I know that I can trust your discretion, Mrs. Scott, for I have heard it well spoken of; do not say anything to others, not even to your husband, but keep a watch on that person if she should come here any more. Report to me what she does, and what spot she frequents."

"I will do so, sir. But I don't think any harm of her. She may have been unfortunate enough to think too much of the kindness with which he treated her. If so, I pity her—she could hardly help it, poor thing. Henry Moreland was a young gentleman a good many people loved."

She put her handkerchief to her eyes in a fresh burst of tears. Wishing her good-morning, I turned toward the village, hardly caring what I should do next. Mrs. Scott was an American woman, and one to be trusted; I felt that she would be the best detective I could place at that spot.

When I reached the office, on my homeward route, I went in. Mr. Argyll was there alone, his head leaning on his hand, his face anxious and worn, his brow contracted in deep thought. As soon as I came in he sprung up, closed the outer door, and said to me, in a low voice:

"Richard, another strange thing has occurred."

I stared at him, afraid to ask what.

"I have been robbed of two thousand dollars."

"When and how?"

"This is what I do not know. Four days ago I drew that amount in bills from the Park Bank. I placed it, in a roll, just as I received it, in my library desk, at home. I locked the desk, and have carried the key in my pocket. The desk has been locked, as usual, every time that I have gone to it. How long the money has been gone I can not say: I never looked after it, since placing it there, until about an hour ago. I wanted some cash for expenses this afternoon, and, going for it, the roll was gone.

"Haven't you mislaid it?"

"No. I have one drawer for my cash, and I placed it there. I remember it plainly enough; it has been stolen." He sat down in his chair with a heavy sigh. "That money was for my poor Eleanor. She was to complete her wedding outfit this week, and the two thousand dollars go for refurnishing the place out at the Grove. I don't care for the loss so much—she doesn't need it now—but the anguish—at this time!"

He looked up at me, vague suspicions, which he could not shake off, lurking in his eyes.

"Who knew of your having the money?"

"No one, that I am aware, except my nephew. He drew it for me when he went down to the city last Wednesday."

"Could you identify the money?"

"Not all of it. I only remember that there was one five hundred dollar package, a fresh issue of the Park Bank, of which, possibly, they may have the number. The rest was city notes of various denominations and banks. I can think of but one thing which seems probable: James must have been followed from the city by some professional thief, who saw him obtain the money, and kept an eye upon it, waiting for a suitable opportunity, until it was deposited in the desk. The key of the common desk which he could have duplicated, and was so careless in this quiet community that he might enter at almost any hour of the night. Perhaps the same villain dogged poor Eleanor, to obtain another harvest."

"You forget that there was no attempt to rob Henry."

"True—true. Yet the murderer may have been frightened away before he had secured his prize.

"In which case, he would have returned, as the body remained undiscovered all night."

"It may be so. I am dizzy with thinking it over and over."

"Try and not think any more, dear sir," I said, gently. And Mr. Devereux said he would try. I am going this afternoon, with the friends to the city, and I will put the police on the watch for the money. We will also advertise in the large bills, if possible, from the bank, and I will have investigations made of the pawnbrokers of Wednesday on the train with James. Have you said any thing to him about the loss?"

"I have not seen him since I made the discovery. You may tell him if you see him first; and do what you can, Richard, for I feel as weak as a child."

For a continuation of this remarkable story, see BEADLE'S MONTHLY for February, now ready and for sale by all Newsdealers and Newsboys; or send, post paid, on receipt of price, TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Beadle & Co., Publishers, 118 William Street, New York.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment does not quite come up to the New York Herald. Circus and Drama twice each day. Afternoon; at 3 Evening; at 7½. GENERAL THOUPE, and thoroughbred Hens-e. TRICK PONY, Mr. Welch. Mons. Fortunello and Siegrist. Bill. New and Dashing Acts of Horsemanship. Prize to Circus-Rider. Dramatic drama of SIDE SCENES; OR, THE CONVICT'S VENGEANCE. W. B. Hemphill, Esq., Impresario Singer. Grand Ballet Divertissements; Tableaux Mimiques; Three Dwarfs; Two Circassian Girls; Leaping Skeleton; Mammoth Ox Woman; Giant Horse; Albino Boy; Cosmoramas, Learned Dog; Happy Family; Mermaid; Curiosities; Miniatures. Admission, 30 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

VIOLINS!

Including Now, Stainer, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, Britain Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN—Tuned or Strung, $2 50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE LINED—$7, $8, $9, $11, $15, $18.
FRENCH—Blocked and Lined, $6, $8, $10, $12, $16, $20.
ITALIAN—$14, $16, $18, $22, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $25, $50, $75 to $300.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest impressions. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
HERSH, 27 Ann St., N. Y.
600

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment. Search upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools readily yield to these wonderful remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by the Pills.

A CURIOSITY!!
Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare Illustrations. Address
CHARLES E. MACEEY,
Broadway, New York.
tf

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; prodic large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICH & CO.,
39 Nassau street, N. Y.
tf

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 BROADWAY, NT. NICHOLAS BLOCK.
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,
War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.
Photo Albums, Frames, Stereoscopes, or Views of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties. tf

---

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

THE CARDINAL'S DAUGHTER,
BY ROBERT MACKENZIE DANIELS.

NOTICES FROM THE ENGLISH PRESS.

This is a brilliant work. The plot is laid in the most stirring times of Henry VIII. . . . The interest is well sustained; and the scenes are admirably drawn; the language is vivid and glowing, and the whole book exciting, instructive, and pleasing to a degree.—London Observer.

A charming book! Cardinal Wolsey, Anne Boleyn, and "BLUFF OLD KING HAL!" would almost give interest to a baby written with it; but the author has done full justice to his character; which is saying much for him.—London Examiner.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

Mailed free of postage on receipt of price.
F. A. BRADY, Publisher, No. 22 Ann st., N. Y.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, CHARMS, BROOCHES, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

We will SELL YOU ONE!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send a three cent stamp, and we will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
289 Broadway, New York.

---

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 50 cents. Address B. H. MARTIN, Rindelaw, N. H.
tf

Over Fifty Secrets numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., &c., for 25 cents. Address Joseph Kennett free for FIVE CENTS.
tf 48 Ann St., P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Mustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, free of another harvest, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. C. GOADBY, 24 Nassau St., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!
NEW! BEAUTIFUL!! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!

A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs of the most celebrated and HIGHLY PERFUMED.

Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CLAVIN WILLIS & CO., P. O. Box 2,022, New York.

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address A BEADLE & CO., 118 Broadway, N. Y. tf

---

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample (6) of the finest French Imported Cards (6) viewsl, $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Masked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. Send for a descriptive Price. Address
FOWARDING AGENCY, 85 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.—supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By a man who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By enclosing a post-paid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Box 6,189, New York City.

JOB HILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jobs, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Anecdotes, etc. Price 10 cents. Sent out to P. O. Box 5,416, New York.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may supply my know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Matrimonial Herald. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It never fails to cure the worst case in from one to seven days. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.
For sale by all Druggists. Price One Dollar.

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
537-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and see us, or send for circular. Agents wanted. Sample and a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $5, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 10 Chatham Square, New York.
529tf

WANTED.

AGENTS WANTED in every town and neighborhood, for "THE GOLDEN HOME AND FIRESIDE," a new article of great demand, worth $30 to any family. Secured by patent and very popular. Will be sent to agents for the trade for $5 to $10 per day, with a capital of $5 to $10. Any person keeping a little store, will find it a profitable and profitable. Send two stamps for circulars and return postage. Address
B. WAYNELL,
Box 1,741, Chicago, Ill.

$1,500 PER YEAR! We want agents everywhere, to sell our NEW AND IMPROVED $20 Sewing Machine. These are the only Machines sold for $20 Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. Circulars free. Address, with stamp, for less than $50, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Doubleday. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

THE EXCELSIOR GLEE BOOK.

A Collection of the best Glees, Choruses, and Operatic Gems. For Mixed Voices, comprising the Secular portion of the popular Sacred Work. "Excelsior" is piece a standard composition. Neatly and durably bound in boards. Price $1. Sent postpaid, on receipt of price.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Sensecology, or the Secrets of Success. How to make a fortune. Win the Affections of any one you choose, the Matrimonial Agent, 86 Rock, Guide to Beauty, Physchologic Fascination, Matrimony Made Easy, How to Make French Brandy, Jamaica Rum, Liquor Coloring, and over 40 other useful receipts, either of which will enable a person to make a fortune. All in search of a legitimate business should read this book. Sent by mail for 25 cents.
tf EVANS & CO., Box 1,215, Philadelphia.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from two to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 50 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid.
H. J. PAGE & CO., Importers
91 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired. 531-4tf

---

$144 COMIC VALENTINES $1
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.
B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 537-40

Beauty—Hunt's Bloom of Roses.
A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; perfectly harmless. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1.
Price $1 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation.
tf 138 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, affection, friendship and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple means guarantees all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition, 100,000 copies already sold. Address
T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

$100 A MONTH SALARY will be paid for AGENTS to engage in a new, honorable, pleasant and permanent business. Send stamp for full information, call on or address O. L. VAN ALLEN, No. 81 Broad street, New York. (Clip and return this advertisement).

COLORED CARTE DE VISITES
SIXTY CENTS PER DOZEN.

I will send upon receipt of 60 cents 12 Cartes de Visite of French Actresses, beautifully colored, or the whole set of 50 different pictures, $2.
541-4 WILLIAM BUTLER, Lenox street, New York.

10,000 SOLD.

I will send by mail, post-paid, a beautiful Military Album, with 24 assorted portraits of our Union Generals, for 50 cents, $4 per dozen to Agents.
C. BRIGGS,
P. O. Drawer 6,308, Chicago, Ill.
541-4

50,000 Business Men. Address for circular "Absolute's Patent Copying Press," Providence, R. I. Owns with Scoop patent, Boston, 21. Copies quickly and well. Many thousands already sold. Stationers and Agents supplied.

SIAMESE TWINS.

Two men grown together. A Life Photograph sent by mail for 38 cents. Address
C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

EVANS' TOILET GEMS,

Consisting of Diamond, Pearl, Ruby, Rose Amber, Gold and Silver Powders. These gems are sprinkled in the hair, and produce a charming and brilliant appearance. For balls, parties, and social gatherings they are indispensable. Price 50 cents per package. EVANS & CO., 8 Perfumers, 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia. Sample box of either of the above sent by mail for $1 18; sufficient to dress the hair twenty times!
tf

Important to Wood Consumers!

For 50 cents I will send to any person a simple method by which they can, in at least one-fourth, defeat the new consumer. Address, with stamp, T. F. ROSS, Beeville, Texas.

MAN IMMORTAL!—Arguments from Nature, Revelation, and Spirits; Pore-knowing: The Soul; Annihilation; A Christian Life; Shapes of Heaven; Cost of a Cherub—How to Book a Horse; Bad Habits; Dante; General Heintzelman; J. Stewart Mill; Stephen Massett; Emperor Empress; Men and Monkeys of Brazil. Physiognomy—Instinct, Insanity, Individuality, Jealousy. Grey's Fables, with Illustrations. Woman's Rights; Woman's Beauty; Short Legs; Happy at Home; Work for Women; Kisses and Kissing. Price 10 cents. HARMONIAL THEOLOGICAL JOURNAL. $2 a year, or 20 cents a number.
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.
541-2

FUN, "O," FUN.

HURRAH for the new Humorous Book which are now just out; they sell like wild-fire. "The Rocket Primer," "Laughable Lyrics," "Comic Tales" take on earth; over 1,000 "Phunney Specimens of Wit, Humor, and Endless Amusement." Sent by mail only 50 cents. "The Single Rocket-Book," a rich thing. Price 30 cents. "The Comic Primer," the drollest thing the strangest thing on earth. Price 30 cents per pack. "The Old Salamander" is back. Price 25 cents. "The Rocket Song Album," with 24 assorted Pictures. Price 50 cents. A Rare Book—"Old Probabilities" in our great office. Price 75 cents. A beautiful bound book. M. "A" 1; it is the only true Book of Fortune, showing how to win your sweetheart, and make your money like dirt. Price 50 cents. "The Rocket" Song-book, beautifully bound. Price $1. I will send any of the above articles, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. Don't forget the whole lot for $4. These articles are just the thing to make a week's fun in the winter. I hope to hear from you all soon. Address orders to
C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

BROWN'S EXTERMINATOR,

For curing Warts and Corns, and warranted to effectually remove them with no pain or inconvenience. Price by mail $1.
BROWN & CO.,
Box 67, Chicago, Ill.

---

95 Secret.—Agents and others can have for only 10 cents, the great $5 secret. Also information whereby they can clear $20 a day, or circulars free. Address STEPHENS & CO., 239 Broadway, N. Y.
511-4

Watches at Wholesale.

Suitable for speculating purposes. Composition, Gold-Plated, Frosted, and Engraved. Also Gold Plated Chains at prices below any thing in the Trade. Our Price List is now ready for 1866, and sent free on application.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
497 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel).

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.
Sample and Catalogue sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address
tf JAS. F. MANCHES, 623 Broadway, N. Y.

---

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 60 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 60 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address
639-48 C. SEYMOUR, Box 49, Holland, N. Y.

FIRST PREMIUM.
DIPPED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June, 1865. THE GENUINE FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with Ornamental Stitchwheel, a most Desirable and Elegant Accessory. Novelty; is noiseless in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and works horizontal, sews with BOBBIN OR SINGLE THREAD OF ALL for thick or heavy, fine and soft work, without any adjusting. It stitches to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Fell, Braid, Quilt, Tuck, Run, Bind, Cord, Braid, Stitch, Ruffle, the strongest machine made. Warranted and kept in order for FIVE YEARS. It has taken the highest premium at New York and other STATE FAIRS, and received the FIRST PREMIUM at the late Fair of the American Institute, and the those who have OWNED THEM. THE ONLY Low Priced Machine Advertised, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others at the same price are IMPERSONATORS.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of seventy-four stitches per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Sole delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Terms to Agents sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

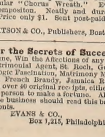
MISS CLARA HARLAND, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with name, date of marriage, and many other things, as testimonials without end bear out. By sending age, color of hair and eyes and autograph, and 25 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail.
MISS CLARA HARLAND,
540-41 P. O. Drawer 99, Albany, N. Y.

Matrimony Made Easy:

Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with specimen letters. Price 15 cents. Send orders to Box 5,410 P. O., N. Y.
tf

LADIES DESIRING A

SMOOTH, CLEAR AND



Should use GEORGE W. LAIRD'S Bloom o' Youth. Has no equal for Preserving and Beautifying the Complexion and Skin. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot 74 Fulton street, New York.
538-41

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865,

No. 14826	drew	$100,000
No. 32,210	"	50,000
No. 15,580	"	25,000
No. 34,210	"	10,000
No. 16,116	"	5,000
No. 30,997	"	1,000

Being the six capital prizes.
Prizes paid in Gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-576

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, etc., may be learned in from 12 to 20 hour hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 5,410, New York.
tf

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lucy's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Household; Every Home Lamp—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquor without the use of poisonous Articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pick-Lock Druggists and Rascals Exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Inks, Cutting Fluids, Blacking, etc.; How to Make the Whitest and Handsome Grey; all kinds of Salutation; Parlor Games; Valuable Receipts; Statistical and Historical Facts, Premiums of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Amusements, Conundrums, etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 5410, Post Office, N. Y.
tf

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains a large number of Receipts, Secrets, and useful kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Cosmetics and Curing Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to get rich; the Lucy's Guide, &c., &c., &c. Send, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,410 P. O., New York.
tf

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

S. M. WARD & CO.

Worthy the Attention of both Males and Females, who are in want of business. The well-known House of S. M. WARD & CO., Manufacturing Jewellers, 208 Broadway, N. Y., wish to establish an Agency in every town in the U. S., and in order that the Agent can have a sample to exhibit to their customers, they will send as a sample, on receipt of $2, a genuine Gold Pen (warranted) with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, together with a Wholesale Circular to Agents, and eleven certificates, or a Sample Certificate for 25 cents, or five for $1.

There is no Agent but what can make easily $3 a day, and often $10. o

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN, CURLS produced by the use of Prof. De Breux's FRISER LE CHEVEUX. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ, & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer, 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

SKATES FOR THE MILLION!

DEPOT FOR

Lovatt's Patent Skates,

WITHOUT STRAPS, AND

NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,

WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.

A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates. Depot for the "Latest Kink" and "Patent Foot Shells." Wholesale and Retail.

ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway.
Skates Ground and Repaired. o

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Three of different powers for $1. Address
000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address H. C. L. MEARS, 277 West 23d St., N. Y., eowo

Great American PRIZE CONCERT!

AT

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FEBRUARY 22d, 1866.

20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $96,300 will be presented to Ticket Holders.

100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD!

One Gift, in Greenbacks,......................	$10,000
One Gift, in 7.30 Bonds,......................	5,000
1 Gift, Residence three miles from Chicago......	6,000
9 Square Grand Pianos, 9 Gifts, $500 each......	4,500
50 Eng. Pat. Lever Gold Watches, $250 each....	12,500
50 Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each,	5,000
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches,....	5,000
38 Gifts, 38 Silver Lever Watches, $50 each,....	1,900
5,000 Gifts 5,000 Tky. Morocco Gold Clasp Albums,	25,000
4,800 Gifts, 4,800 Clasp Albums, $3 each,.......	14,400
10,000 Gifts, $10,000 Cash, $1 each,............	10,000
20,000 Gifts, Total value of which,.............	$96,800

The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public—

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.

2d. All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Pianos and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers names are sufficient guarantee that they are surpassed by none.

3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate No., these are placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed, a disinterested person, (selected by the ticket holders present at the Concert,) draws these duplicate No.'s from the wheel, the first one drawn out gets the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in like manner until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first sell sufficient number of tickets to insure us against loss, the Prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unlike all other Gift Sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietor makes a dead loss of the value you draw, consequently you seldom if ever get anything worth what your ticket cost you.

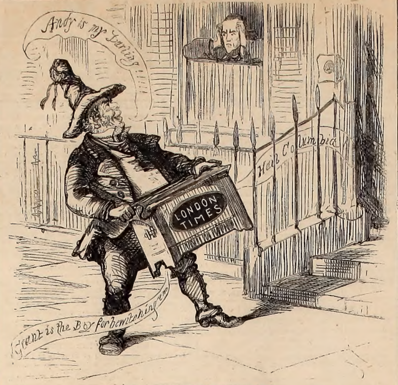
Dont throw your money away on valueless concerns, but send us your orders for tickets soon, if you would secure them; over 50,000 already sold. Every ticket is registered before being sent out, the number, name of party purchasing, and address, and all will be notified by mail of the result of drawing.

Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp. Address—

BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.
144 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH



SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
537-49o 505 Broadway, New York.

AN INCREASING NUISANCE.

Uncle Sam—"Darn that old rascal—I could bear his impudence, but his cussed toadyism is more than I can stand."

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 20th 1865.)

An Exact and Reliable Pocket Time-keeper for Ladies or Gentlemen, A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved scientific principles, and warranted to denote solar time, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Approved by the Press and all who have used them. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to

J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
tfo 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 692 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $80 each.
o539-45

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S

Extract Bucku.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-47o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by REIDE'S CRIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 35 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 535-47o

DEAFNESS

And Discharges from the Ear Radically Cured,

By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract

O'JITINE.

Price $1 50 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. WEEKS & POTTER, Druggists, No. 170 Washington st., Wholesale Agents.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents.
533-45o

ITCH. Salt Rheum. (WHEATON'S OINTMENT.) ITCH. Salt Rheum.
Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cure Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 Cents; by sending 60 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists. 541-66o

THE GREAT

BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUM.

Elegant and Useful Holiday Presents.

Ladies', Gents', Misses' and Children's Slippers, Gaiters, etc.,

At BROOKS' Agt.

575 BROADWAY, N. Y.
o Opposite the Metropolitan Hotel.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-43o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

If you want the best fitting, strongest, and most serviceable paper collar ever offered to the public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

The most Economical Collar ever Invented.

Showing the embossed or printed stitch equally well on both sides.

The following styles are now made:

Patent REVERSIBLE Enameled Paper Collars.	Patent REVERSIBLE Bank Note Paper Collars.	Patent REVERSIBLE Printed Stich Paper Collars

To be obtained all Furnishing Goods Dealers throughout the country.

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO., Agents,
541-53o Winthrop Square, Boston.

Patent Fasteners for Ladies and Gentlemen.

Have you used them? Try the 25 cents.

Good Books—Guide to Beauty, 25 cts.; Love Oracle, 30 cts.; Laws of Love, 25 cts.; How to Converse, 25 cts.; Rules of the Billiard Table, 30 cts; Guide to the Stage, or, How to be an Actor, 25 cts.; Parlor Dramas, male characters only, 50 cts.; female characters, 50 cts.; Burlesque Dramas, 50 cts.; Quotations from Shakspeare, 40 cts.; Life of a Showman, 50 cts.; Parlor Pantomimes, set, $1. Mammoth catalogues sent to every lady and gentleman, free. Send for them. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

THE GREAT NATIONAL PICTURE,

ENTITLED THE

OUTBREAK OF THE REBELLION

In the United States, 1861.

This Picture is not only valuable as a work of Art, but is interesting to every American citizen; it contains numerous correct portraits of the most prominent men of the period, including A. Lincoln, Scott, Jeff. Davis, Stevens, Buchanan, Floyd and others. The size of this Picture is 24 in. by 30, printed on extra thick paper. No Union Family should be without a copy of this beautiful Picture. It will be sent to any part of the United States, free of expense, on receipt of the price, which is $2 per copy.

KIMMEL & FORSTER.
Engravers, Printers and Publishers,
540-41o 254 and 256 Canal street, N. Y. City.

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Fine Watches at Old Prices.

English Silver Watches - -	$ 6, $8, $10
Pure Silver Hunting Lepines - -	$15 Each.
Fine 18 Karat Gold-Plated Watches -	$12, $15, $20.
Fancy Compass and Thermometer Watches - - - -	$15, $20.
Silver Hunting Levers - - -	$20, $25.
Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches -	$20, $25 to $75.
Coin Silver American Levers - -	$30.

All kinds of Good Watches, low.

CATELY BROTHERS, Importers,
tfo 102 Nassau street, N. Y.

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the Superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 537-40o

SERPENTS de PHARAON,

OR

SERPENTS' EGGS,

THE LATEST SCIENTIFIC MIRACLE.

"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and retail by OLDEN & SAWYER, 246 Canal street, New York. 50 cents a Box, free by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Self-adjusting Enamelled White, 50c. Linen finished, 75c. Snow White Illusion Stitched, $1. $1.25, $1.50. Ladies' Sett, $2.50. Fancy $3 Mailed free. Send price and size. Sold by first class houses.
o

Whiskers and Moustaches

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SEVIGNE'S RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
529-41o Sole Agents for the United States.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,057, P. O., New York. tf

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. otf

CHOLERA! CHOLERA!!

Do not die with the cholera. Save your life. Dr. Charles' European Cholera Remedy has cured the worst cases in from 30 to 60 minutes. Everybody should send at once and receive it by return of mail, for we know not what time it will come upon us. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 50, or six for $7. Address all orders to the agent.

CHARLES L. BRIGGS, Agent,
541-4o 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.

Eggs of Pharaoh's Serpents.

ONLY 25 CENTS A BOX.

We will supply, either at wholesale or retail, these curious and wonderful articles which are creating such a sensation in this country and Europe. Sent by mail, post-paid.

o ADAMS & CO., 21 Bromfield st., Boston.

SOUTHMAYD'S

Celebrated Balsam of Tolu Candy.

Has been found a most effectual remedy for the alleviation and cure of Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough, Influenza, Asthma, Bronchial Affections, Spitting of Blood, and other diseases of the Chest and Lungs.

Testimonials from Physicians of the first respectability, and thousands of others who have been benefited by the use of this Candy, give it the preference over all other preparations of the kind ever offered to the public. Public Speakers and Singers will find this invaluable to relieve hoarseness and tickling of the throat. For sale by all Dealers, and Wholesale and Retail by

J. K. SOUTHMAYD,
Corner Tremont and Bromfield sts., Boston, Mass.
o

MICROSCOPES for 60 CTS

MICROSCOPES for 60 CENTS.

THE FRENCH TUBULAR MICROSCOPE,

A very powerful instrument, mailed for 60 cents; two for $1. Address

GEO. D. WASHBURN & CO.,
541-53o Box 5,093, Boston, Mass.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York. o

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 542—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 17, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00.

Frauds on the Revenue.

The burdens of the war must be borne, and the cost of preserving the Union must be paid, at whatever sacrifice. That these burdens, and this cost, should not fall entirely on this generation, is a proposition which no one will attempt to dispute. The result attained is for all time, and has released the next generation, or the next, from a struggle still more fearful than that through which we have passed. It is right, therefore, that we should adjust the enormous load we are compelled to bear with some rational reference to present capacities, and to make the taxation to which all are willing to submit as equal as possible. This, at the outset, has not been an easy matter. Our schooling in the science of bleeding the people, happily, has been small. If, therefore, our authorities have not distributed the national load with that impartial justice that it should be distributed, we are not to suppose that the inequalities are the results of malice or design. It is, however, the part of wisdom, and, moreover, a duty, for those having this grave matter in hand, to study carefully the operations of the existing laws, and correct inequalities, especially when these amount to real grievances. Our tax system is cumbersome as well as unequal in its operations, unnecessarily costly, and in some things vexatious, and requires revision.

In nothing is it more grievous and vexatious than the existing tax, or rather, taxes—for there are sixteen of them—on books and periodicals:

"Paper, which is the principal material of books, after the chemicals used in its manufacture have paid a heavy duty, is taxed as a whole under the Internal Revenue Act. The printing-ink and all the materials used in bookbinding also pay separate taxes. Finally, the finished book is taxed as a whole. In England, where, as in this country, foreign rags are imported free, books, paper, etc., are especially exempted from taxation, and the English manufacturer is able to pay his duties and land books in New York or Boston at about half the price at which we can make them here."

We have an instance in point in the case of the "Sunday Magazine," a periodical which is published and sold in London for a sixpence sterling, or about twelve cents. It is brought to this country and entered at three farthings a copy, or about one and a half cents. After the duty is paid, it is put on the counter for sale at a cost to the importers of less than two cents. But twenty-five cents a copy is demanded by the importer or agent, and at that rate it is said 10,000 copies are sold.

A careful calculation shows that the production of these 10,000 copies here, including only paper, composition and other costs of manufacture, exclusive of literary labor and illustrations, at present prices, would be 14 cents a copy. Now we have no doubt the Custom House entry of the "Sunday Magazine" is fraudulent on the revenue, and that, as it is sold in England at 12 cents, it is probably produced at about six cents, instead of one and a half cents, its entry price. But, apart from that, the question comes home, not only to publishers but to the American public, in this eminently practical shape: "Can we afford to tax the production of American books and periodicals to such an extent as to enable British publishers, paper-makers, type-setters, stereotypers, engravers, binders, and venders, to entirely supplant all these various branches of industry in our own country?" Question second: "Does the revenue accruing from the fraudulent invoices of English books and periodicals sent to this country re-imburse, even fractionally, the loss of income tax, revenue tax on material, license, etc., etc., which the Government receives from the active prosecution of the publishing business in America?"

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT BALL—ENTRANCE TO IRVING HALL.

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT BALL—THE SUPPER ROOM AT IRVING HALL.

Perhaps, up to this time, the revenue from publishing sources does not appear astonishing. Why? Because American publishers do not like to give up the field. They do not like to change their business and alter their investments. They will "stick to their last" until the last, and hold out in the fight, possibly, until, in the contest (unlike the Kilkenny cats), the foreign publisher will come out of it gorged, while the poor Yankee will not have even a tail (or tale) to evince the vigor of his struggle.

Another view of the question: The Sunday Magazine is not the tallest specimen of religious literature. It may be described, in the words of the late Park Benjamin, in reviewing a book of serious poems, as "poor poetry—albeit its publishers do demand the Federal revenue. This view, put in interrogative form, is: "Do we wish to depreciate the productive literary ability and experience of our country by giving a market to foreign talent and capacity, with all their shades of coloring and prejudice, to the exclusion and extinction of our own? Is it desirable that our market for books, 30 per cent of Mexico, for instance, should be flooded with English or translated French or German "apprecistions" of the country, written from English, French, or German stand-points, and full of English, French, and German prejudices? Do the advance, enterprise, ambition, literary experience, and effort of the country require no recognition from the legislative and executive authorities of the nation?

Now, if the publishers, we will say of the Sunday Magazine—which, according to their pretensions, can be published as cheaply as can be put out the number for sale in New York at two cents a copy—asked only four cents for it, which would be 100 per cent. on their investment, or six cents, which would be 200 per cent., or 25 cents (as in England), which would be 600 per cent—it might be said, "It is true the thing is poor, but cheap, and the public gets cheap reading;" but they want 1,250 per cent., with an injudicious scale of taxation and fraudulent entries render it impossible for an American publisher to compete with them, even at the same prices. The result is simply this; the publishers, in the long run, will be ruined, and their restraining competition no longer keep down foreign prices, while the customs will gain a few paltry dollars, and the internal revenue lose its manifold thousands.

It is a question whether the revenue shall receive at the spigot and discharge at the bung, or vice versa.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

UNPRECEDENTED ATTRACTIONS.
Three Splendid Gift Plates.

WITH NO. 30 OF

FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER,

each purchaser will receive the great National Engraving,

"Great in Peace,"

announced for No. 36, but necessarily delayed, to ensure the highest style of work. No expense has been spared to make this the most exquisite and attractive work of the time.

With this number commences also Abbeyford, a new and highly exciting Story, by one of the most popular Authors of the day. It will be continued through the succeeding numbers, and prove of intense interest.

Every purchaser of Numbers 1 and 2 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER is entitled to receive, without extra charge, the splendid Gift Plate of "President Lincoln's Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1863."

No. 4 contains a careful outline drawing, being the Key to the Presentation Plate.

With Number 33 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER each purchaser is entitled to receive a most elegant Engraving, entitled "His Only Pair," being a full-length copy, by admirable artists and engravers, of the celebrated Painting by THOS. FAED, now in the possession of John Knowles, Esq. It has never before been engraved in this country, and the English prints cost Thirty Dollars.

Subscribers to the CHIMNEY CORNER or FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER (for one year), will receive these three elegant Plates gratis, all adapted for framing:

I. THE NOTABILITIES OF THE NATION AT THE RECEPTION OF PRES. LINCOLN.

II. HIS ONLY PAIR. (From the celebrated Painting by FAED.)

III. GRANT IN PEACE.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent, so that persons wishing to subscribe at any time, by taking the back numbers from the commencement, will be entitled to receive the Presentation Plate.

The Trade supplied by the AMERICAN NEWS Company, New York. Subscriptions should be sent to the Publisher,

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl street, N. Y.

OUR PUBLICATIONS.
NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY—PRICE 10 CENTS, OR $4 A YEAR.

This most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has become the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, forming a perfect pictorial contemporary history of the age. It contains every new and important Invention, Portraits of the Celebrities of all Countries, Sketches of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of the Day, New Buildings, Paintings, Sculptures, &c. Its Literature comprises a continued Story by some distinguished Novelist, Original Tales, Sketches, Civil ctions, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months.....$1 00
One copy, six months.....2 00
One copy, one year.....4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....15 00
Five copies, one year.....20 00
(With an extra copy to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine, to one address, one year.....7 00
Address
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner,

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

Each Number contains a variety of Short Stories from our best American Writers, Sketches of Travel in Society, Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Manners and Customs of all Nations, Records of the Olden Times, Heroic Passages in History, Portraits and Biographies of the Self-Made Men of America, Lectures for Young Folks, Gossip for the Ladies, Parlor Theatricals, Comic Pictures, besides new Inventions of great interest and utility constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and the most complete Household Journal published. It is also the most elaborately Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

Terms:

One copy, three months.....$1 00
One copy, six months.....2 00
One copy, one year.....4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....15 00
Five copies, one year.....20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of FRANK LESLIE'S Chimney Corner and one copy of FRANK LESLIE'S Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) one year.....7 00
Address
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine,

With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Fashion Magazines together.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian painting, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll, with numerous changes of dress and costume, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Baby"—and a doll model in her walking costume. the dress of dress being separate.

The February number contains an exquisitely colored lithograph of "No Peep," and a doll model ball-room costume, the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the March and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, $3 50; four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the names.

Subscriptions to be sent to

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and is the great satirical paper of America.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cents a number, or $1 50 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 50.

Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac—80 Engs.—60 cents, with 4 Lithographic Pictures.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 17, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

THE Commission appointed to investigate our whole system of taxation, and report what changes are proper or necessary, has closed its labors, and the report will be presented to Congress. progress. The document is long and elaborate, but the principal changes suggested may be summed up as follows:

1.—An exemption of all incomes below $1,000 from the Income Tax.

2.—A reduction of the tax on Distilled Liquors from $2 to $1 per gallon.

3.—A reduction of all taxes now levied on Wearing Apparel.

4.—A repeal of the taxes now levied on Pig Iron ($2 40 per ton), Coal (6 cents per ton), and crude Petroleum (35 per gallon).

5.—A repeal of all taxes now levied on Books, Magazines and Periodicals, Printing Paper, Printers' Ink, Paper, Leather, etc., untouched.

6.—A reduction by one-half of the duties now levied on Home Manufactures generally.

7.—A repeal of the taxes now levied on repairs of Engines, Cars, Carriages, Ships, etc.

8.—A repeal of all taxes embodied in schedule A. of the Internal Revenue Act of last session, except those on Bilious Clocks.

9.—A reduction of the tax now levied on Brokers' sales of Stocks from 1 to 1/2 per cent.

10.—An increase of the tax on raw Cotton, from 2 to 3 cents per pound.

These modifications are proposed to take effect on the last day of July next, or at the commencement of the next fiscal year; and their general effect will be a reduction of our present burden of Internal Taxes by about one-fourth.

The report is very severe on the Administration of the New York Custom House, in which it alleges with singular boldness, that the annual frauds range from twelve to twenty-five millions of Dollars. The Commission particularly refers, we presume, to the publication, on the fraudulent introduction, of which we have commented in another column.

"The attention of the Commission has, furthermore, been called to a case which has occurred very recently, concerning which no publication, imposed in addition into New York, for which an American house offered to double his price to them, if they would consent to purchase them as a raw material for the manufacture of printed paper, although the duty on the latter was admitted free of duty. The sheets of the publication in question were invoiced with their covers at three farthings, could be bound for a fraction of a cent each, and are sold in the American market from eighteen to twenty-five cents."

MASSACHUSETTS has a population of 127 persons to the square mile. Texas has less than one person. Virginia has 23, and Kentucky 26 to the square mile. Rhode Island has 95. Of the States, we find that they have a fertile area of 928,894 square miles, and that they do not average 6 persons to a mile. Now in order that the South should have a population equal in density to that of Massachusetts, it requires, in addition to her actual population, white and black, an increase of 108,809,332 persons!

A REPORT is telegraphed all over the country, of a conversation between the President and a "distinguished senator" (said to be Mr. DIXON, of Connecticut), on the Constitutional Amendment proposed by the congressional committee on reconstruction. According to this report, Mr. Johnson recommended a slight variation of the amendment, so as to provide:

"Representation shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of qualified voters in such States, and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to the value of all taxable property in each State."

THE prevailing form of bam-boozle about Mexico is, that the Emperor of France wants to withdraw, but does not wish to be hurried, and that if we will only be patient, he himself off in due season. He is proud and sensitive, and we must be careful not to ruffle his feelings, or—he will not go at all, and will send his troops to conquer the Republics! Only think how careful he was of ours, when, taking advantage of our misfortunes and troubles, he openly violated the leading principle of our continental policy, and insulted the republican system, of which our country is the representative. By all means treat the usurper tenderly! Say nothing to disturb the saintly equanimity of the assassin of a sister republic!

THE latest steamer from Europe assures us that the French are willing and anxious to leave Mexico, upon one—only one—trifling condition: That the United States shall recognize the Empire of Mexico!

Everybody will be gratified to know that we are not also called on to supply Maximilian with troops and money!

CALEB LYON, "of Lyonsdale," Governor of the Territory of Idaho, utilizes his talents to make known the wealth and wonders of that distant and prospectively prodigious region. In his message to the Territorial Legislature, he paints the natural resources of Idaho with a rose-tipped pencil:

"A bird's-eye view of the accumulating discoveries in our mineral resources, reveals that we have no less than 5,000 gold and silver-bearing quartz ledges, greatly attractive values as in their richness, and new discoveries and new locations are being made almost daily. The width of these lodes, or leads, vary from 3 to 50 feet, and they possess from $20 to $200 per ton. Located usually where water-power and timber are in abundance, they offer the highest inducements to the enterprising capitalist, whose investment can rarely fail of being of the most remunerative character. Among the other useful ores which have been discovered within the last year, the copper, copper, lead, silver, and iron forms, are of the first value; yet platina, antimony, nickel, bismuth, zinc, and cobalt, are found in considerable compound with other minerals, are found in various localities. But this is not all; beds of coal, both of anthracite and bituminous, with rock-salt, sulphur, and gypsum (the latter known as plaster-of-Paris or cement), while the most precious of gems, the diamond, has been shown to our publics, all give to our fortunate forefeate of the illimitable extent of Idaho's varied resources, when the hand of man shall have unbosomed her hidden treasures. The wide extent of our auriferous places, only a moiety of which have been well prospected, checkered as they are by auriferous veins, gulches and beds, are revisted with the magnificent mountain-ledges, etched, laminated and foliated with quartz, chalcedony, sulphurets—crystalline, granular, and virgin. This presents a fabulous array of marvelous grandeur, which will require the industry of ages to develop and exhaust."

THE London Saturday Review, referring to Mexico, says:

"The Emperor Napoleon distinctly announced that while he garrisoned Mexico he would not, through his ally, the republic of the Latin race, prevent the United States from exercising their influence in the New World. The occupation of Mexico was a distinct challenge to the American Union, and we think that this challenge was only given because they were then too much involved with their own troubles to be able to notice it. No wonder, therefore, that they resent it, and regard with bitter feelings, now that they are prosperous and powerful."

The Review adds:

"It is no longer sufficient hope of the country prospering under French guidance to make it worth while to quarrel with the United States, and render American protection, and with Americans gratefully seizing on the country, would be the best future choice of Mexico."

DR. RENNIE, connected with the British Embassy in Pekin, China, has published a book recounting his observations and experiences. His judgment on the Chinese is not favorable, but favorable than that of most foreign observers:

"I have left the country" (he says) "with the conviction that the Chinese are not a race of such a loathsome vicious one than—as a consequence of opinions formed in Europe, founded and taken on hearsay—it has become customary to represent it; further, that the lower grades of the people are not the worst conducted, more sober and industrious, and, taken altogether, more highly supplied with the corresponding classes of our own countrymen."

IN 1861 there were nine Catholic Chinese priests in Pekin, and eight more in various parts of the Chinese empire. There are about 5,000 hereditary Christians in Pekin, mostly converts, having inherited their zeal and their religion from the Jesuits. In the old Portuguese cemetery outside the city gates, there are upwards of 3,000 tombs of the descendants of the Jesuits (a proof of Chinese religious moderation) have not been defaced:

"The cemetery is oblong, and all the graves are covered by large, massive marble slabs. They are arranged in eight rows of ten in each, five graves of each row on a similar monumental slab, making in front of every grave a tombstone is placed at a little distance from the new-dug grave. Within the space of distance, in like proportion is the house. The tomb of the Christian Father Ricci stands on the right hand side, at the extreme end of the cemetery, near the altar. It is an enclosure of the same height as the wall, and in front of it there is an oblong monumental stone of white marble, not high, resting on three or four tortoises, the latter indicating it to be an imperial gift. Its inscription in Chinese and Latin. On the left hand side of the extremity of the avenue near the altar there is a still more monumental stone also standing on marble tortoises. The one on the right is in honor of the pious colaborer, Verbiest, and that on the left is to the memory of a Portuguese Jesuit of the name of Pereira. On the same side, a little in front, is the tomb of Adam Shall, a Dutch Jesuit, erected by the Emperor Kan-hsi, who is said to have proved to have been highly appreciated, from the distance in front of the grave that the monument stands in place. Near it is the tomb of another well-known man, Gaubiou, the surgeon, who was employed for some years operating the palace. A dense vegetation surrounds the tombs, the whole of which are completely shaded from the sun by the rich foliage of the numerous trees that grow within the enclosure. Altogether it is a most interesting spot to visit in the neighborhood of Pekin and has become rather a fashion of late years. We form a spectacial illustration of the remarkable influence which the Jesuits must at one time have exercised in this country, and show the tolerant character of the Chinese Government towards religious faiths materially differing from their own."

One of the protexts for French intervention in Mexico, was, and is, the "disordered condition of the country." Now, a country famous for its mining and (pretended) proximate causes of interference, to the extent of overthrowing a regularly constituted government, that has not been at one time made to rob the French Minister. Now European ambition for redress of grievances, and in "order and civilization," has not been more savage and verge enough nearer home. Whatever may have been the license or brigandage of Mexico, it never approached 1/10 of 1 per cent. of the wealth of its territory, and one-half of its population. In 1863 not less than 345 brigands were taken and shot, and 500 killed in battle, at a cost of 259 troops killed in the operation. And still lawlessness goes on. Foreigners are killed daily, or captured and held for ransom. But their governments make no costly interference. They do not undertake to set up architects in Italy. On the contrary, they are keen to think the old world less humanity for crime, which only in the new world receives reprobation and repression.

IT is the experience of all editors, whether of periodical, political, literary or otherwise, that nine-tenths of all articles submitted to them for publication are among what, by a stretch of language, may be called "poetry." Now, why should any one, with certain obvious exceptions, go on writing poetry? The answer is plain; the it is a great amusement to the writers, and, on the whole, after making allowance for certain undeniable evils, it is not a very great annoyance to any one else. We exclude, of course, the possible danger of being called upon to listen to an author's recital of his works, or to give him a candid opinion of their merits. But there is the great advantage about a poem, that it is generally short. If our "myriads" of readers and admirers will persist in the most unprofitable of all occupations, the embodiment of halting rhythm in doubtful rhyme, let them go on, but always make it short. The height of fatuity and infatuation is the notion that any modern periodical will print a column or two of "poems.".

It is simply childish to imagine that the South, which fought to the death for the sake of upholding slavery, has suddenly become enamored of free institutions. Emancipation is accepted as an inevitable necessity, and it is regarded not only as a calamity, but as a symbol of humiliation. The one idea of every Southerner, with scarcely an exception, is, that the free negro must be "kept down," and that such laws must be passed as will secure the legal as well as social supremacy of the superior race. Hence the tenor of legislation in the lately rebellious States, and such will be its course unless the constitution shall be so amended as to make legislation of this kind impossible.

Among remarkable incidents arising out of our civil war, there is one worth notice, which lately took place at a meeting of the Essex Institute, a Natural History Society for Essex County, Mass. One of the members, wishing to refute the assertion that the "Southern rebels" were of better birth and blood than the Northern folk, read a paper, entitled "New England's Heraldry," showing that more of the early Northern colonists were connected with the nobility and gentry of the mother country than the colonists of the South. The roll of the gentlemen of Massachusetts will beat that of Virginia by ten to one; and, yet more, it can be shown that the ancestors of some of the present "chivalry" of Virginia arrived first in that colony as transported criminals. This strikes us as being rather hard on the Old Dominion; something like hitting a man when he is down. But when simple-minded republicans begin to argue about the gentility of their blood, there is no foreseeing whither the argument may lead. There is, perhaps, enough of cavalier blood left in Virginia to furnish a reply.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Amid all the sensations and excitements of a great city, it must be something especially startling or original that can attract notice, even for an hour. This week New York has had a sensation, one that took us from skating and sleighing, that over-sloughed theatres and ran a successful rivalry with all fascinations. We mean the Seventh Regiment Ball; but as we give in another column an account, we shall not discuss it here. Suffice to say that it was the affair of the season, and has elicited more talk than any event of the kind that has taken place this year.

The next sensation in the ball line, will be that of the Arion, which comes off on the 8th of February. The managers promise the dancing world something new and original, and will, without doubt, redeem their promise. So far, all the German Carnivalistic fêtes of this season have been especially good, and the balls of the Singing Clubs in other cities have been wonderful successes, that of Philadelphia especially so, it having been pronounced the greatest ball ever given in that city. The only drawback to those of the Arion and Liederkrantz, in this city, heretofore, has been the want of something new, the whole affair having been simply a repetition one year of that of the past. The promise for this year is, that this fault shall be corrected.

Among the rascalities and enormities of a great metropolis, we do not know one that is so worthy of exposure as that of fortune-telling. If the vile profession were only used to gull a few simpletons out of a dollar or so, it would not matter much; but there is a lower strata of guilt, and a case that has, within a few days past, come to our knowledge, shows the necessity of some punishment that will reach the evil. It is that of a beautiful young girl, who, yielding to the solicitations of a man who was paying her attentions under a promise of marriage, went to one of these harpies "to have her fortune told." On entering the room, which she was obliged to do alone—"no gentlemen being admitted"—she was startled at being addressed by the ancient hag in her own name, and still more startled at being told many incidents of her life and matters connected with herself that she supposed only known to a limited few of her friends. These apparently wonderful things prepared her mind to receive anything that was said as gospel, and the burden of it was, that she was told that she was soon about to be married, the personal appearance of her future husband described, which, of course, corresponded with that of the man who had brought her there, and she was advised to place all confidence in him, and not to cross his inclination or purposes in any way whatever, as by so doing she would only mar her own future happiness. The poor girl listened, believed and trusted, and ruin followed, and at last, to hide her own shame, found eternal forgetfulness in a draught of poison, dying with a denunciation on her lips of the heartless woman who had, for money, lent herself and her vile profession to the purposes of the man who professed to love her. For this crime, though it is murder of the most gross and heartless kind, there is no punishment, the male assassin walking Broadway to-day with a bold front, and looking out for more victims, while the woman still plies her nefarious trade.

What the rogues and thieves of New York don't know is hardly worth knowing. Scarce a week goes by that some new crime is not invented and practiced successfully. The last dodge is styled by the fraternity, "muzzling," and is practiced in this way: The victim is quietly walking along the street at night, and perhaps notices, standing on a corner, three or four men. As he approaches, a little squabble, or skylark, arises among them, and suddenly one falls, rolling, in his fall, against the victim's legs, and, as a matter of course, bringing him to the pavement with him. Once down, a brawny hand is clapped upon his mouth and nose, and all chance of a noise and alarm cut off, while one of the confederates, under the show of assisting him to rise, soon goes through his pockets, and leaves him minus his valuables. After this muzzling operation, the victim takes some seconds to regain his breath, and get upon his feet, time enough for the muzzlers to mizzle. This thing has actually been done when a policeman was within half a block, and people passing every minute, and yet so quietly would it be perpetrated, and so much would it look like a skylarking affair between two or three roughs, that no notice would be taken of it.

In this column we have several times made mention of murders outside the pale of law, or of which the law would not take cognizance. Scarce a week goes by that we could not report two or three such. Here we have an example, the record of which we take from the daily press:

"A Child Killed by a Butcher's Cart.—Coroner Wildey held an inquest on the body of Johanna Moore, a girl eight years of age, who died from injuries received on Wednesday afternoon, by having been run over at the corner of Chatham Square and Tryon Row, by a butcher's cart, driven by Michael Mitchell. The jury found a verdict that the girl came to her death by being run over by the carelessness of Michael Mitchell, and the jury censured said Mitchell for driving at so rapid a rate through the streets of the city. Coroner Wildey required the accused to give $1,000 bail to await the action of the Grand Jury."

One thousand dollars bail for killing a little girl! Think of it, fathers and mothers—think of what your little ones are worth! One thousand dollars bail is the valuation that Coroner Wildey sets on the life of a child, butchered under the wheels of a madly-driven cart, by a possibly drunken wretch, who cared as little for human life as he did for the animals he slaughtered daily. And then he was "censured!" Indeed, it was too bad for that jury to "censure" the gentle Michael. They should have commended him, and sent him to the world with the advice to try his hand next time on some infirm or aged person.

Which brings to our mind another instance, illustrating kindness and humanity forcibly: A man, named Edes, a Swede, it is believed, while crossing Chatham street, on Monday last, fell, and broke his leg. The captain of the nearest Precinct immediately detailed one of his men to take the injured man to the City Hospital. He did so; but, on arrival, the man was refused admission, and the officer was directed to take him to Bellevue. Here he was also refused admission, the authorities there saying they had nothing to do with him, as he was not over four weeks in the country. The Commissioners of Emigration, they said, were the proper parties to take him, and to the Commissioners of Emigration the poor fellow was conveyed. But here, again, he was doomed to disappointment—his name was not on their books; he had "worked his passage" out here, and, therefore, was not an emigrant, but it was suggested that he would probably be admitted to the Sailors' Hospital. Thither was he taken, but could not be admitted, as he was not registered as a sailor. Three hours had now elapsed, and this unfortunate man's leg became dreadfully swollen, and he suffered the most the terrible pain. At length the officer thought of the Sailors' Home, on Staten Island, whither he conveyed the unfortunate man at once, and thus, five hours after the accident, was poor Edes first placed where he could be treated. What a lovely thing is it to live in a great city, where, by the liberality of its citizens, hospitals and refuges for the sick, maimed and poverty-stricken, abound! Had this poor fellow committed a crime, rather than an accident, he would not have had to wait five hours until he found an asylum.

Once more we have the opera, and night after night houses full, to say nothing of the matinées, which are really the sensations of the week. It is wonderful to see, without puffing or extra advertisement, an audience of 3,000 or 4,000 people, the greater part of whom are ladies, gather, of a Saturday afternoon, at the Academy, and show, by their quiet appreciation, that they come for music, and not for fashion. We will venture to say that such a scene cannot be found in any European city.

Another of the quiet and meritorious entertainments of the day are the musical and dramatic readings of Mrs. Henry C. Watson, at Dodworth's Rooms. Mrs. Watson has, without ostentation, offered her evenings to the public, and the public have appreciated by filling the room every night. We venture to say that the rendering, by the fair elocutionist and musician, of the scenes from the "Tempest," with Ariel's songs of "Come Unto These Yellow Sands," "Full Fathom Five," and "Where the Bee Sucks," is an intellectual treat that has not been surpassed in New York, and must be remembered. "How they Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix," Robert Browning's famous poem, is also given, with a force and understanding that marks it, and adds a laurel to the already great reputation of the poet. The third of these musical readings will take place on Wednesday, February 7th, at the same place.

BOOK NOTICES.

Social Life of the Chinese; with Some Account of their Religious, Governmental, Educational, and Business Customs and Opinions, etc., etc. By the Rev. Justus Doolittle. New York: Harper & Brothers, 2 vols., 12mo.

Since the publication of Mr. G. T. Lay's book, "The Chinese as They Are," now a quarter of a century old, we have had nothing of such general and instructive interest and value on China as this new work of Mr. Doolittle. Without pretension, simple, direct, and exhaustive, it is eminently a book for average Americans, who really seek to know about China, and care little about historical and philosophical disquisitions, involving, in order to their comprehension, a knowledge of Oriental history and Asiatic modes of thought. Mr. Doolittle writes to no system; his work is laid out according to no rule whatever; but he plunges at once into his subject, and leaves his facts and observations to stratify themselves in the minds of his readers as best they may. His book, in fact, may be described as "pitch-forked together," but is not without value on that account— although, if the sequences had been better preserved, it cannot be denied, it would have been more useful. However, whatever its faults of style or arrangement, Mr. Doolittle's book is far superior to such inflated, pompous, and pretentious tomes as Hawks' version of "Perry's Japan Expedition."

We cannot say much in praise of the engravings, which are eminently archaic, but which, nevertheless, do good service in illustrating the text. In other respects, typographically, and especially in binding, the volumes are unexceptionable.

There are some curious coincidences between Chinese and American symbolism, which our reverend author inadvertantly illustrates; such, for instance as "Fighting the Tiger," a euphemism for gambling in this western world. In China the god of gambling is represented as a tiger of ferocious aspect and large capacity, rampant, holding a cash or coin in his fore-paws, and is usually labeled, "His Excellency, the Grasping Cash Tiger!" Sometimes, says the Rev. Mr. Doolittle, the figure of a tiger, in the attitude described above, is placed over the doors of gambling saloons or dens. What a zoological display the streets of Washington would make if this were the practice in our national capitol!

"At full tide, the bridges across the Min, at Fuhchau, may often be seen crowded with men, viewing the feats of the tame fishing cormorants. These birds look, at a distance, about the size of a goose, and are of a dark, dirty color. The fisherman, who has charge of them, stands upon a raft, about two and a half feet wide and fifteen or twenty feet long, made out of five large bamboos, of similar size and shape, firmly fastened together. It is very light, and is propelled by a paddle. A basket is placed on it to contain the fish, when caught. Each raft has three or four cormorants connected with it. When not fishing, they crouch down stupidly on the raft.

"The fisherman, when he wishes to make a cormorant fish, pushes or throws it off the raft into the water. If it is not disposed at once to dive and seek for a fish, he beats the water with his paddle, or sometimes strikes the bird, so that it is glad to dive and get out of his reach. When it has caught a fish, it rises to the surface, holding it in its mouth, and, apparently, striving to swallow it. A string tied loosely around its neck, or a metallic ring, effectually prevents swallowing, except, perhaps, in the case of a very small fish.

"It usually swims directly for the raft, and the fisherman, on seeing the prize, paddles toward it with all speed, lest it should escape from the bird. Sometimes the fish is a large one, and there is evidently a struggle between it and the cormorant. The fisherman, when near enough, dexterously passes a net-like bag, fastened to the end of a pole, over the two, and draws them both on the raft. He then forces the fish from the grasp of the bird, and, as if to reward the latter for its success, gives it a mouthful of food, which it is enabled to swallow on his raising the ring from the lower part of its neck. The bird, if apparently tired out, is allowed to rest awhile on the raft, and then is pushed off again into the water, and made to dive and hunt for fish as before.

"Sometimes the cormorant, from imperfect training, swims away from the raft with the fish it has caught. In such a case the fisherman speedily overtakes the truant. Sometimes, it is reported, two or three cormorants assist in securing a large and powerful fish. Oftentimes two quarrel together for the fish one has taken, or one pursues the other for the fish in its mouth. At such times the interest of the spectators on the bridge increases to noisy shouting."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The commercial travelers of Chicago have organized themselves into a society under the name of "The Commercial Travelers' Association for Mutual Protection." The following are among the objects stated at the preliminary meeting: To compel hotel-keepers to give them clean beds, clean towels, and good substantial food, and also sample rooms for the display of their goods; and in turn that they pledge themselves, as a body, to support and patronize such landlords alone.

—— The water drinkers of Chicago are disgusted by the invasion of myriads of little fishes in the water-pipes. Tons of them are collected about the inlet, and cannot be driven away. At times they are drawn by the pumps in such masses against the screens that the supply of water is stopped, when it becomes necessary to hoist the screens, and the minnows rush in by the barrel full.

—— An intelligent white lad, who had been stolen by Indians so long ago that he cannot remember the time, recently escaped from them, and reached Mound Station, Colorado Territory, after riding a pony to death and three days' travel on foot, with scarcely any food. He could speak little English, but is fast learning.

—— A Southern exchange says that if, owing to causes beyond control, short supplies of cotton may be the order of events for the next year, or two, after that period, and with white labor made honorable, the world will never know what it is to experience a scanty supply again.

—— It is stated at the Treasury that at our present ratio of income the national debt may be easily reduced $100,000,000 the present year, after providing for all current and contingent liabilities.

—— The Washington Star says that on Wednesday the President received several letters from insane persons; one of whom, living in New York, writes to him, every week, on political topics, filling four pages of foolscap, and signing himself "Emperor of the World." Another man at Fall River, Massachusetts, writes every day concerning his imaginary possessions, amounting to many millions, and importunes the President not to allow certain persons to share in the distribution of the property. A woman writes that she has had a spiritual visitation by her son, who died in Salisbury prison, and asks the President to send her some money.

—— In the United States Court at Albany, one day last week, Sarah Brown, indicted for opening and divulging the contents of a letter directed to Betsey Raymond, in Syracuse, plead guilty, was fined $1, and sentenced to three months in the Penitentiary.

—— The Sage Ammunition Works at Middletown, Conn., in which percussion caps were filled with the fulminate of mercury, was destroyed by an explosion of this dangerous compound, and a fire which resulted from the explosion. The shock shook the houses around.

—— When the petition signed by Gov. Baker and the State officers of Indiana, and 10,000 citizens of that State, against the pardon of Jeff Davis, was presented to the President, a few days ago, by Speaker Colfax, Mr. Johnson took the petition, smiled, and said: "I'll lay it beside this bundle," pointing to an immense pile of manuscript, "which is just as large a petition for his pardon."

—— A Southern traveler says in a letter: "I was gratified to meet with gentlemen from the North investing large amounts of money in cotton plantations in all directions, within a radius of 50 miles of Jackson, the capital of Mississippi. Many of the finest plantations have recently passed into Northern hands."

—— The late convention of colored people at Augusta, Ga., passed resolutions opposing universal suffrage, but favoring the voting of colored men who can read and write; discountenancing crime and laziness among the freedmen, and opposing the confiscation of Southern property.

—— A firm in New Orleans received, lately, an order for 1,000 plows from a single county in Texas. Agriculture is said to be "looking up" in the Lone Star State.

—— There are some unpardoned, unreconstructed rebels in the South yet, as may be inferred from the following reply of Mr. T. Yancy, of Desoto county, Miss., to Gen. Fisk, respecting a colored girl that had been sold away from her parents: "As for recognizing the right of freedmen to their children, I can say that not one Southern man nor woman in the whole South recognizes the negro as a freedman, but as stolen property forced by the bayonet of the damnable United States Government."

—— The Charleston Courier says that $120,000 have been subscribed in that city for the purpose of securing white laborers for South Carolina.

—— The Legislature of Maryland has appropriated $8,000, making in all $15,000, to complete the work of enclosing, grading and ornamenting the Antietam Cemetery, which will be ready early in the spring to receive the bodies of the heroes who fell in that memorable battle. Their remains, to the number 8,000, are now buried in the mountains, roadsides and fields in that region.

—— The officers attached to the Mississippi squadron during the war have organized a "Mississippi Squadron Association" at Cincinnati. Two-thirds of the receipts are to be set apart for the benefit of sailors' widows and orphans. Admiral Porter is honorary president.

—— It is currently stated among military men high in rank that Lieut.-Gen. Grant will visit Europe during the present season, and will remain there several months.

—— The commerce of the Mississippi river employs 910 steamers, with a capacity of 272,144 tuns, valued at $24,556,600. St. Louis has 210 steamers, with a capacity of 110,769 tuns, valued at $8,830,000. The next principal ports are Cincinnati, 150 steamers; New Orleans, 81; Pittsburg, 78 steamers and 81 tugs; Louisville, 68; Memphis, 60; Wheeling, 44; St. Paul, 39.

—— The Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, communicates a list of the cities of the United States with the statistics of their manufactures, including those having 10,000 inhabitants and upward. It includes 102 cities, beginning with New York and ending with Newport, Ky. The total capital employed is $417,129,234; hands employed, males, 410,020; females, 147,000; value of products, $874,934,827. New York stands first in the list. Capital, $61,212,757; males employed, 65,483; females, 24,721; value of products, $159,107,369. Philadelphia employs a capital of $73,318,885; male operatives, 68,350; females, 80,033; value of products, $135,-079,777. Cincinnati is third in order: Products, $46,-000,000; capital, $17,000,000 in round numbers. Boston: Products, $36,000,000; capital, $13,000,000. The other principal cities produce as follows: Brooklyn, $34,000,-000; Newark, $22,000,000; St. Louis, $21,000,000; Baltimore, $21,000,000; San Francisco, $19,000,000; Lowell, $18,000,000; Providence, $15,000,000; Louisville, $12,-000,000; Richmond, $12,000,000; Pittsburg, $11,000,000; New Bedford, $11,000,000; Chicago, $11,000,000; New Orleans, $10,000,000; Manchester, $10,000,000; Troy, $10,000,000; Rochester, $10,000,000.

Foreign.—Gen. Prim, Count de Reus, author of the new pronunciamento in Spain, was born in 1811. He was for a long time considered as one of the chiefs of the Christinos. The war in the East, in which he took an active part on the Danube, and the preliminaries of Soledad—when a convention was drawn up between France, Spain, and England, and Juarez, which put an end to the first phase of the Mexican expedition, have made him more especially known in Europe and America. For the last two years he has passed for the director of that fraction of the Progressist party which goes by the name of Iberian, and which meditates the unity of the whole Peninsula under the house of Braganza.

—— The death of Frederica Bremer is announced. She was born at Aura, near Abo, in Finland, about the year 1802. Her father was a merchant at that place, but on Finland being ceded, three years later, to Russia, he removed with his family to Sweden, and usually spent the winter in the capital. Great care was taken with Frederica's education, and when she was old enough, she became a teacher in private families. How long her time and talents were engaged in this laborious métier, we know not; but in the year 1842, the English literary world was agreeably surprised by the publication of "The Neighbors," a picture of domestic life in Sweden, which strongly recommended itself by its quaintness and originality. Encouraged by the favorable reception accorded to this novel, Mrs. Mary Howitt, its translator, introduced to the English reading public "The Home," "The Diary," "The H. Family," "The President's Daughter," and several other tales, which were unusually well received. Miss Bremer's reputation had by this time become European, most of her works having been translated into German, French and Italian, as well as English. Latterly, Miss Bremer traveled a good deal, and visited Germany, France, England, America, Italy and the East. Her transatlantic experiences she gave to the world under the title of "Homes of the New World," which was published in 1853. In 1856 she wrote "Hertha," a romance; and in 1860, "Two Years in Switzerland and Italy." From Italy she went, in 1861, to the Holy Land, returning thence by way of Greece.

—— A petrified tree was recently found in the Golden Horn claim, near Geelong, in Australia, at a depth of 258 feet. Pieces of the tree, examined by the microscope, glisten like diamonds. In the same claim, at a depth of 200 feet, several frogs, imbedded in bluestone, have been disinterred, of a green and yellow color, without any signs of mouth or respiratory organs.

—— A Paris butcher has obtained authority to open a shop for the sale of horse-flesh, on condition that he will construct a special slaughter-house for the horses, to be placed under the superintendence of an inspector. The opening of the shop is to be celebrated by a banquet, at which horse-meat will form the principal dish.

—— A few weeks ago a Mr. Leonard Dufour, residing in London, gave a party on the occasion of the marriage of his daughter, and about 9 o'clock Mrs. Dufour was waltzing with the bridegroom, when she was observed to laugh in a hysterical manner and make for an anteroom, the entrance to which she had just gained when she fell lifeless into the arms of her daughter. Her death is attributed to disease of the heart.

—— A man and woman named Brandon have lately been charged before the Tribunal of Correctional Police in Paris with annoying a neighbor named Fauconnet, by having trained a parrot to repeat the words: "Fauconnet is a thief, a miser, a pig," &c. They were fined 16 francs each, and ordered to pay between them 50 francs damages.

—— A singular accident befell an aged man of 80 years, near Glasgow, Scotland, lately. When within 200 yards of his house he fell, and in the fall he had broken the pair of spectacles he had on, the glass of which inflicted a deep wound in the left eye, and caused death by hemorrhage.

—— A correspondent writes from Havana that a royal decree has been received from Spain, disapproving of the formation of an anti-slavery society in Cuba, and reprimanding the Captain-General for having countenanced it, and ordering that it cease to exist, as well as all documents in relation to it, including, of course, the long list of pledged names already obtained, some of which were of very influential persons. The correspondent adds that there are very many abolitionists on the island, but no opportunity is offered to make themselves known.

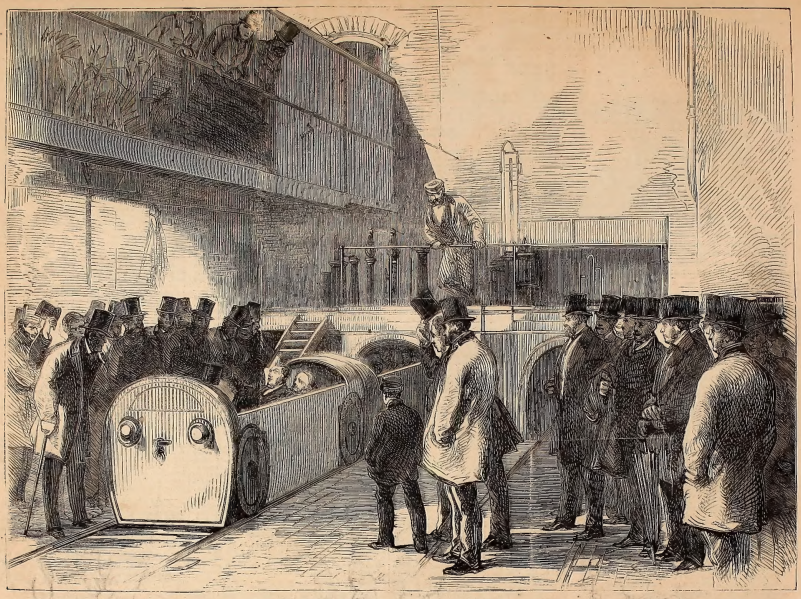
—— The population of Belgium was, at the last census, in 1863, returned at 4,890,000, and is now beyond 5,000,-000.

—— Dr. Paillon, of St. Foy, France, announces a new method of curing a cold in the head. It consists in inhaling through the nose the emanations of ammonia, contained in a smelling-bottle. If the sense of smell is completely obliterated, the bottle should be kept under the nose until the pungency of the volatile alkali is felt. The bottle is then removed, but only to be reapplied after a minute; the second application, however, should not be long, that the patient may bear it. This easy operation being repeated seven or eight times in the course of five minutes, but always very rapidly, except the first time, the nostrils become free, the sense of smell is restored, and the secretion of the irritating mucus is stopped.

The Right Man in the Right Place.—The Brooklyn Daily Times has long been known as one of the most enterprising of our enterprising newspapers. This great success has, in the largest measure, been due to Mr. Daniel Donovan, who has, for the last ten years, been the business manager of that journal. This fact has been practically recognized by the proprietor, Mr. Geo. C. Bennett, and by the public, and Mr. Donovan been taken into partnership, a fact that will warrant renewed energy and excellence in the really first-class journal he conducts.

Sudden riches turn most people's heads. Those people who groan because they are poor, will make others groan when they are rich. Shoddy and petroleum have much to answer for. You can tell the newly rich man by his reading the newspaper upside down, and his wife by the $1,000 shawl spotted with grease, and No. 5 boots outside of No. 7 feet. It is no crime for a family to be rich, but riches could not make a family genteel. Suddenly rich people are like mulattoes; they find themselves above what they started from and below what they started for.

A Pleasant Parlor Pastime.—A favorite play with Dr. Whately was penciling a little tale on paper, and then making his right-hand neighbor read and repeat it in a whisper to the next man, and so on till every man round the room had done the same. But the last man was always required to write what he had heard, and the matter was then compared with the original, retained by his grace. In many instances the matter was hardly recognizable, and Dr. Whately would draw an obvious moral. But the cream of the fun lay in his efforts to ascertain where the alterations took place. His analytical powers of detection proved, as usual, accurate, and the interpolators were playfully pilloried. The play is called "Russian Scandal."



Lucy Stone says: "The cradle is a woman's ballot-box." Then we've known some unlawful voting, where two ballots were deposited at a time.

The following startling threat was made use of the other day by an excited pugilist: "I'll twist you round your own neck, and ram you down your own throat, until there is nothing left of you but the extreme ends of your shirt-collar sticking out of your eyes!"

Table of Interest—The dinner-table.

What is it we all frequently say we will do, and no one has ever yet done? Stop a minute.

Why is Fenianism hot? Because it is '98 in the shade.

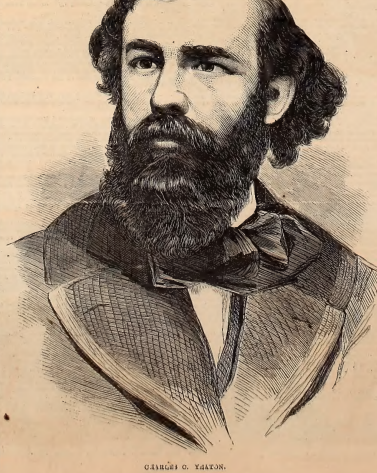
OPENING OF THE PNEUMATIC RAILWAY AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, LONDON, ENGLAND.

THE PNEUMATIC DISPATCH TUBE.

THE system of conveyance by atmospheric propulsion through a tube, which was lately exhibited in the grounds of the Crystal Palace, England, and had previously been tried on the short experimental line at Battersea, as well as in the neighborhood of the Euston square station, in Seymour street and Eversholt street, Camden Town, has now obtained an important practical extension by the opening of the line from Euston square to Holborn—a distance of one mile and three quarters—whence it will be continued another mile eastward to the general Post-Office, St. Martin's-le-Grand. The premises, No. 245, Holborn, which are the present terminus of the line, are well worthy of a visit of inspection.

Entering from the level of the street, the visitor passes along a corridor through a doorway, and emerges upon a gallery of considerable size, from which he looks down on a brick floor, supporting lines of rails, much as he might do from a railway platform down on to the line, but from a greater elevation. Underneath the corridor by which he has just entered he sees some mechanical appliances, suggestive partly of an engine-room and partly of a pointsman's gallery outside a railway station; and below the level, again, on which the white-jacketed engineer in charge is standing, and supporting the platform on which he and these mechanical appliances rest, are a couple of openings, looking like black, polished modern chimneypieces, with the grates withdrawn. These are the mouths of the pneumatic tubes, of which one communicates with the North-Western Railway; the other, idle at present, will soon be drawing in and delivering mail-bags from and to the postal headquarters in London. The mouth of each tube is shut, when the tube is exhausted by air, by iron folding-doors, which meet, not evenly, but at an angle projecting outwards so as to resist the atmospheric pressure from without. These doors are made to fly open on the approach of the train, the bolt which closes them being withdrawn by the action of a spring lever, which underlies the rails, and gives way beneath the weight of the train. The carriages are shaped like a capital D turned over on its straight side and mounted upon wheels. Each end of the carriage has a raised hood, or flange, shaped so as to correspond with the interior of the tube, the dimensions of which are four feet in height by four feet six inches in width. Their ordinary freight is expected to be of the first instance letter-bags, then probably railway parcels, certain descriptions of market produce, and ultimately, it may be, general merchandise.

On the opening day the Duke of Buckingham, Chairman of the Pneumatic Dispatch Company, had invited a number of scientific gentlemen to inspect the apparatus. After the train had made some successful passages to and fro, several of the party expressed a strong desire to pass through the tube themselves. They were warned that the line was "not constructed with a view to passenger traffic," and that they might find the way "a little rough." The spirit of adventure, however, prompted them to take this strange journey, and each of the wagons had soon as many occupants as it could comfortably accommodate in the recumbent posture enforced by circumstances. Tarpaulin coverings were obtained for one or two of the carriages, but the greater number of the excursionists had to fit themselves in as best they could among the bags of shingle, which made up the temporary loading, taking care to keep their heads well below the edge of the carriages.



"The sensation at starting, and still more so upon arriving"—say some of the passengers—"was not agreeable. For about a quarter of a minute in each case there was a pressure upon the ears suggestive of diving-bell experience, a suction like that with which one is drawn under a wave, and a cold draft of wind upon the eyes, having almost the effect of falling water; but, once fairly within the tube, these sensations were got rid of, or left behind, and the motion had little more positive discomfort about it than would be attendant on a riding on a 'lorry' over the worst ballasted line in England."

The air within the tube was by no means foul or disagreeable; here and there a strong flavor of rust was encountered, but this was explained by the fact that, as the tube had to be laid in lengths, through various soils, and encountered in the process a large share of unfavorable weather, the corrosion on the surface of the iron could not be expected wholly to disappear until cleared away by the friction of constantly passing and repassing trains.

On the arrival of the excursionists at the upper or Euston square extremity of the line, they quitted their places for a few moments to inspect the smaller tube, which communicates with the Eversholt street district Post-Office, and then returned by the way they had come to Holborn.

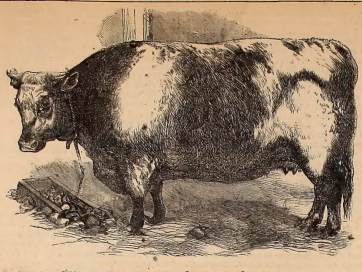
No doubt remained on the mind of any person who witnessed the opening trip as to the facilities which the system, if a sufficient number of stations can be incorporated with it, is calculated to afford, not only to the postal service, but to the requirements of the general public. The scheme of the company, who, it seems, possess under their Act powers to lay down pneumatic tubes at any points within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works, is to construct similar lines to that now opened between the 10 district Post-Offices and the General Post-Office, and between the different railway termini and goods depots in London, connecting with these lines the six principal London markets and other important points.

For these purposes it is calculated that some 35 miles of tubing and a capital of £1,320,000 will be required, the cost per mile roughly estimated being from £30,000 to £35,000. The expenditure of the company hitherto has been probably £150,000, which would be largely in excess of this supposed average; but the sum mentioned includes the cost of preliminary experiments, and also of seeking for two Acts of Parliament. The company expect that great profits will eventually accrue to them from the carriage of goods.

CHARLES C. YEATON.

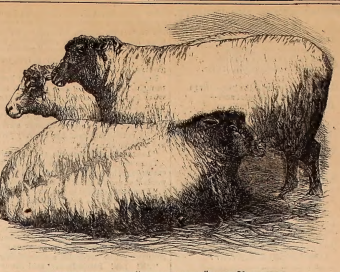
ENGLISH PRIZE ANIMALS.

WE give, this week, a quartet of illustrations, shown animals that are now drawing prizes in England for superiority in their line.



The first is a heifer, which has carried off the highest prize from the Smithfield Club Show. She was bred by Earl Radnor, and is called Octavia. Her portrait speaks for itself.

The next is a Scotch brindle, bred by the Duke of Sutherland, five years and eight months old. It is descended from a race of Highland cattle which have been in that family two hundred years, and shows remarkably what scientific breeding will do for a naturally unpromising race.



The third are wether sheep (Oxfordshire Downs), belonging to the Duke of Marlborough. They are twenty-one months old, and have, so far, surpassed everything in the sheep line ever shown in England.

The fourth are pigs, seventeen months old, bred by Earl Radnor. They were raised upon whey, beans, and roots, and carried off the highest of English prizes this year.

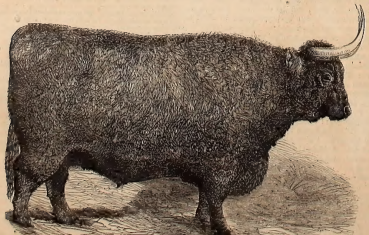
These animals simply show what can be done by cultivation properly encouraged. From the most unpromising natural stock, are, in a few generations, brought animals that surpass all the world in the physical beauty of their species.

ENGLISH PRIZE HEIFER, AGED 3 YEARS AND 3 MONTHS.

ENGLISH PRIZE SHEEP "OXFORD DOWNS," AGED 21 MONTHS.

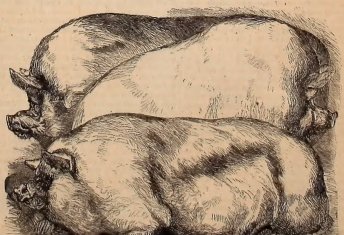
SPEARING SALMON ON THE SHANNON RIVER, IRELAND.

THE salmon is undoubtedly the king of fish, not on account of size, but from its wonderful beauty, its game qualities, affording the highest sport to the angler, the interesting nature of its history, and the delicious flavor and nutritive quality of its flesh.



There was a time when this noble fish was an inhabitant of most of the English rivers, as it was once of most of our own; but before the march of civilization it has disappeared, unable to bear the noise of water travel over its aristocratic head, and the poisoning of the waters by the near dwelling of man. In some of our rivers it still lingers, and the markets of the principal Atlantic cities are supplied at certain seasons with the delicious fish; for those who are willing to pay a dollar a pound to please their palates.

The means adopted in the capture of the salmon are as various as the localities of the fish. Traps, nets, and wires, hooks and lines, shoaling and spearing. Our Illustration is from a sketch by Joseph Becker, our Artist, sent to Ireland at the time of the last attempt to lay the Atlantic cable, and is taken upon the river Shannon, during the process of spearing by torchlight. The way of doing this is simply by one person bearing a torch, which is made from a certain resinous wood, dug from the peat bogs. The spearmen follow the torch with a three-pronged spear. The principle is, that all fish are attracted by light, and the salmon, as they come toward the torch, are seen by the spearmen, who strike, and, as a matter of course, if they are skilful, capture; the captured fish being the property of the owner of the estate.



SPEARING SALMON ON THE SHANNON RIVER, IRELAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.

THE LABOR OF WRITING.—A rapid penman can write thirty words in a minute. To do this, he must draw his quill through the space of one rod—sixteen and one-half feet. In forty minutes his pen travels a furlong; and in five and one-third hours a mile. We make, on an average, sixteen curves or turns of the pen in writing one word. Writing thirty words in a minute, we must make 480 in each minute; in an hour, 28,800; in a day of only five hours, 144,000; in a year, of 300 days 43,200,000. The man who made 1,000,000 strokes with a pen in a month was not at all remarkable. Many men make 4,000,000. Here we have, in the aggregate, a mark 300 miles long, to be traced on paper by each writer in a year. In making each letter of the ordinary alphabet, we must make from three to seven strokes of the pen—on an average, three and a half to four.

SCOTCH HORNED OX, AGED 5 YEARS AND 8 MONTHS.

ENGLISH PRIZE PIGS, AGED 17 MONTHS.

SEARCHING AFTER THE INFINITE.

BY J. B. SWETT.

But an eye to view the beauty
Of the other world, sublime,
And a voice to cry its wonders
Down the echoing aisles of time.

But a hand to strike the harp-strings
Of the hearts of mortal men—
But a beacon light to guide us
Where no other souls have been.

Ah! who can tell these wonders,
Ere the chain of life shall sever?
Or who can tell the meaning
Of that little word, forever?

We are weak, and we are lowly,
Knowing naught beyond us here,
Yet we long to walk the lovely
Pathways of the mystic sphere.

But we cannot, and we will not,
Till the chain of life shall sever,
And we learn the mighty meaning
Of that mighty word, forever!

THE LAND OF THE BLACK VEIL

BY J. WARREN NEWCOMBE, JR.

MR. SAMUEL SHORT, of the jobbing house of Short & Savage, whose unfortunate attempt to pursue the Penguin has been related in a previous number of this periodical, was in the habit of riding down town in a Broadway stage at about one o'clock every morning of six days in the week, on his way to his place of business. Now as any gentleman rides down town in the morning by phases of fashion. In fact it is the habit of most of our merchants, bankers, brokers, etc., who do not reside in Brooklyn or at remote distances from the city. But all do not ride alike, there being, doubtless, as many ways of going to one's work as there are gentlemen to go. Like clouds, all our business belongs to them uppermost in their thoughts, but each carries with him, also, unquestionably, a train of side-thought entirely unconnected with the duties and labors of the day.

Some think of the opera, some of their families, some of the coming summer vacation, some of the last year's trip to Newport or Saratoga, some of this thing, some of that. It was Mr. Short's habit, as one who knew him would have guaranteed, to think of woman, lovely woman, and to be constantly on the look-out for her. Rosy and comfortable little husband he was, the dark-eyed goddess still led him onward, and, though he had never yet succeeded in securing a partner to divide his sorrows and double his joys (which is the pursuit had seen him grow puzzy and gray; though the crow's-feet began to gather about his eyes, and the top of his head was becoming as smooth and shining as a billiard ball; still, with heroic resolution and admirable patience, he followed the phantom, marriage, firmly believing that in the end he should conquer, and no longer pine in solitude, with only his flute for solace.

So much a habit had this pursuit become, that he unconsciously accustomed himself to be ever on the watch for new and pretty faces, and I doubt if so constant a movement could ever be cut down before. Innocently so, however. None of your insolent, shameless starers was Mr. Short. No thought of impropriety ever entered his mind as he continued day after day to scrutinize strange female faces on the side-walk or in the stage. He never caused the least tinge of confusion to rise to the cheek of beauty. Harmless and honorable little gentleman, he looked at ladies ("a cat may look at a king" you know) with such an honest and humble admiration that those who noticed the gaze pardoned it on the spot.

For several consecutive mornings, in one pleasant month of May, Mr. Short had particularly noticed an apparently young and graceful formed lady, who made a practice of entering the stage soon after he had taken his seat, and leaving it at Canal street. I was observed young, because the stranger wore a black veil, which she never raised. It was not a heavy veil, however, and through its meshes he could distinguish a pair of bright eyes, and of a complexion which would have upset the poor man completely, but that he knew her face must be threads intensely red and white of a fair lady's face.

For the rest, the unknown was neatly but rather shabby dressed in black, with dainty white cuffs and collar, and the prettiest, cunningest little hand that ever was kissed. None but a lady, he was sure, could possess such a hand or such a voice. For, one morning, she requested him in most mellifluous accents to hand the driver her fare, and as he hastened to comply, he thought to himself that such sweet tones were never heard before. How he longed to make her acquaintance, and could hit—modest little gentleman that he was—upon no means to accomplish that end, pen cannot tell.

He wondered what could be her position? Her occupation? Was there no strange and thrilling mystery connected with her life? But wondering brought him no nearer to the discovery.

At length, one charming, fatal day, in stepping out of the stage she dropped her handkerchief, and, regardless unconscious of her loss, turned her steps down Canal street. An inspiration seized Mr. Short, and rising hastily, he followed the object of his admiration, handkerchief in hand. As he trotted after her he could not avoid noticing the initials "L. M." in one corner.

"Madam," said he, overtaking her, "allow me to restore your handkerchief."

The lady stopped, turned towards him, held out one little hand for the article, and with the other raised her veil. Mr. Short felt himself, as he afterwards expressed it, positively stunned by the more than human loveliness that beamed upon him. Eyes, mouth, complexion, straying waves of auburn hair—never in his life had he seen anything comparable to the superb and glowing beauty before him.

Perhaps he had allowed himself to become so wrought up by his previous thoughts and surmises regarding the mysterious stranger, that his excited fancy had very much to do with the exalted portrait his mind formed of the woman before him. At all events, whether correctly or not, he certainly deemed her the very perfection and paragon of her sex.

"I am much obliged to you, sir," she said.

There was, as he afterward related in a tone of exquisite pathos and heart-touching sorrow in her words that moved him more than he could tell.

"I am much obliged to you, sir," she said; and then she paused, as in expectation of some further remark from him.

But poor Mr. Short was stricken stupid. His admiration actually drove every particle of sense he possessed clean out of him. He had been troubled this way before in the presence of ladies, but never yet so thoroughly and completely.

"Ah! Yes! Precisely so!" said the cowardly gentleman, and then he trembled, turned and fled.

The lady smiled sadly, dropped her veil, and passed on her way.

When she entered the stage on the following day, her veil fluttered a little to one side, and a sweet smile wreathing her mouth revealed to Mr. Short her visitation, however. Mr. Short had seen her coming, and, saying bitterly to himself: "What an ass I made of myself yesterday!" he had resolved to make her discretion for very shame.

But when lovely woman sets her cap at a man, she is not very apt to let it become unset by trifles. The enemy this time was not.

The next morning she failed to appear in the stage as usual, and Mr. Short, who would have been grieved to see her, was much worried that he did not see her. He wondered if he had not, in some manner, behaved rudely to her, and he resolved to advance matters, if possible, by walking all the way down town, in order to avoid him. This was an unbearable thought; possibly the lovely lady was not well, perhaps was something of the sort when she kept herself out of his sight.

For the two days following he was in a very uneven and unbusiness-like frame of mind.

Now it was one of Mr. Short's eccentricities to glance, after reading the news, at the columns in the Herald headed, "Wanted," "Matrimonial," and "Personal." With the most innocent and unsophisticated intentions in the world, he constantly looked at the various notices under these heads, hoping some day to find a being wanting a mate whom he could suit. Every Friday morning, (a holiday day!) he glanced rapidly through the "Situations Wanted—Females," and, finding nothing of interest, he turned to the "Personal" notices. The hot blood rushed to his very fingers' ends when he read as follows:

"If the gentleman who restored a handkerchief to a lady in the black veil, in the corner of Broadway and Canal street, last Tuesday, will address L. M., Station A, Post Office, he will learn the acquaintance of a sincere friend."

Mr. Short glanced hurriedly about the room. It seemed to him that Mr. Savage, seeing this paragraph, would point it out to the fair female, and would be "down on him." Savage always sneered so at his love affairs, and this case would be an excellent subject for him. Mr. Savage was in the store, engaged with a customer at the moment, and, for the time at least, he was safe.

Presently, when the customer left, the senior of the firm came down. Mr. Short glanced nervously at the Herald every morning (they were methodical at Short & Savage's): "Got through with the Herald, Short?" He replied, with a faint smile: "Yes, sir, here, anywhere; here's a Times I bought as I came down." And Mr. Savage perused the Times, instead.

In the solitude of his chamber that evening, Mr. Short concocted, with much labor, a reply to the notice in the Herald, and despatched it to the post office, where of course resulted. At first they met at sweet eventide, in some shaded part, or at some previously agreed-upon rendezvous, but the natural shyness of both parties had worn off a little, the gentle lady poured, in detached and broken fragments, the sorrowful story into the ever-ready bosom of the too susceptible lover. This was the tale she told:

Born in affluent circumstances, the petted child of an opulent gentleman, in one of the Middle States, reared in the lap of luxury, and accustomed to all the ameliorating circumstances surrounding the aristocracies here in wealth and fashion (I am writing this paragraph, oh, gentle reader, in the same room where the strange woman received milk and watery style of some modern novelist who has described biographies), she had never known a care till she reached that blissful period of feminine existence, "sweet sixteen." Then a story long remembered in the annals of her prosperity, no storm lowered upon the horizon of her life. But now appeared upon the scene a handsome young lover, who was fated to blast this beautiful picture, and render the very name of happiness a hideous mockery.

He was clad in unexceptionable broadcloth, with a white vest and kids for the opera and other state occasions. He wore a lovely black moustache, his hair was black, too, as was his speaking eyes. His voice was a fine baritone, sinking occasionally into deeper bass, when one was reminded of thunder among the Alps. His conversation was sparkling and epigrammatic, his manners perfection. He talked much poetry, quoting freely from Tennyson, the Brownings, Sydney Dobell, and Martin Farquhar Tupper. Also, he was reported wealthy, and, to make a long story short, he wooed and won the lovely and accomplished Louisa Mordaunt, for so was our heroine named.

We will pass over three short years. The husband (Algernon St. Clair—pronounced Sinclair—was his aristocratic name) proved a scoundrel of the deepest dye. His conduct drove her miserable and highly respected papa into an early grave. Then he squandered her money and her mother's. His relations, a Mr. and Mrs. Baker, met with polite language in their presence; but though it all she clung to him with a wife's devotion. Finally, she was brought home, from a fatal affray, on a friendly shutter, his weeping widow attended the coroner's inquest, and there was an end of him.

Then she and her mother removed to the great city of New York, where she earned precarious support for them both by the use of the needle, and where she served a Mr. Brower & Baker (or some other patient) sewing machine from the wreck of her once princely fortune. Her mother had, indeed, some little pieces of property left; a small cottage on the banks of the glorious Hudson, that rented for only fifty dollars a year, and was crowning glory with a fifteen-hundred dollar mortgage. Such is life!

To this harrowing recital, poor, enamored Mr. Short listened with a wrenching heart. He would have liked to choke the scoundrel who had so abused Miss Mordaunt, or to ram his blue cotton umbrella down his dastard's throat. These feats being impossible, he began to make love to the widow with all his soul and might.

It was not long before he became a pretty constant evening visitor at the humble lodgings of the fair victim of man's perfidy. It was all perfectly proper, too, for the victim's mother, naturally pleased old lady, rather snuffy, but beautifully and thoroughly devoted to her daughter—was always present on these occasions.

Soon—the pair were so willing, and everything so favorable—they were "engaged," and Mr. Short was the happiest man in the universe. It never occurred to him to wonder what there could be in his short, puzzy, and somewhat passé little person, to excite the lovely woman to love him. He never imagined that his fat little pink and white pate, his big diamond pin she so often admired, had much to do with it.

Now the gallant gentleman began to shower presents upon the lady of his choice and her mother. Bouquets, fruits, confectionery, costly bottles of all sorts, fairly rained on both sides. Ah! then there was happiness! It was such a joy to the honest soul to purchase these delicacies, and to produced some new toy or garment of great price, and lail it before them!

This rapid style went on till he had ruined himself or married the girl; but there are many people in the world, like the old woman in the story, who, if they have a goose that lays golden eggs, can never be easy till they have killed it.

One evening Mr. Short was shocked to find both mother and daughter in tears. In vain he for some time urged upon his adored Louisa to open her heart to him and tell him all her woes. At length, with a burst of hysterical sobbing, the lovely creature threw herself into his arms, exclaiming:

"The cottage! My mother's beautiful cottage! It is gone from us for ever!"

"How gone? And whither?" cried the astonished Short.

"The three-hundred dollar mortgage," she replied, "is about to be foreclosed! Unless we can have the money by the day after to-morrow, we lose it. All my ready cash consists in seven dollars and thirty-five cents. But," she added, tenderly, "if you, my love, my husband, can lovely creature threw herself into his arms, exclaiming:

"The cottage! My mother's beautiful cottage! It is gone from us for ever!"

"How gone? And whither?" cried the astonished Short.

"The three-hundred dollar mortgage," she replied, "is about to be foreclosed! Unless we can have the money by the day after to-morrow, we lose it. All my ready cash consists in seven dollars and thirty-five cents. But," she added, tenderly, "if you, my love, my husband, can lend me the money, and thus shall also have the cottage," said Samuel.

It was with a prompt step that Mr. Short the next morning ascended the three rickety flights of stairs that led to the rooms of his adored one. In his pocket were "greenbacks" to the specified amount, and his heart was joy supreme.

Perhaps he was pleasantly surprised when he found his Louisa alone; at all events, he did not imagine her anxiety after the old lady.

"Have you brought the money?" cried his idol, with tearful eye, after the kiss of greeting.

"I have, my love," said Mr. Short, seating himself by the table.

"Then it's all right!" quoth she.

As she spoke a door bedroom door opened, and a large and powerfully built man strode past Mr. Short and took a chair between that gentleman and the door.

He was a villainous-looking scoundrel. From the top of his well-oiled head to the soles of his heavy cowhide boots, thief, bully, black-leg, guard, gambler, pickpocket, shone as plainly as though man's hand instead of God's had written the characters upon him.

This threatening and evil figure seated itself between Mr. Short and the door, and, glancing at him with murderous eye, proceeded to light a strong-flavored cigar.

Mr. Short turned, wondering and horrified, to the lovely one by his side.

The figure by the door laughed loudly and brutally. "I've got tired of you; you are such a d——d fool, that I have never liked fifteen cents, and be quick about it! Jim and I are going out of town to-morrow, and we want the money; don't we, Jim?"

"Well, we do, some!" said the man by the door.

Mr. Short gazed in speechless horror, astonishment, shame, from one to the other. He could not realize that this female fiend was the same beautiful woman he had loved ever this fifteen months, and he quick about it! Jim and I are "Come!" cried the woman, again, "hand over the fifteen hundred."

There was no escape. He was in a back room, on the third floor of a tenement-house, of the character of whose inmates he had no means of judging, except from that of the degraded wretches before him. Besides this, the man by the door now produced a revolver, with the hammer of which he significantly played.

"If You make a loud noise," he said, "I'll stop your throat for as long as you live!"

So Mr. Short produced his wallet.

"Hand over, if you please," said the woman. The gave it to her.

"How's your watch, Jim?" she said to the man by the door.

"The last one's up the repleat," he replied.

"Old Short's got a bully one here," she said; "I guess you'd like it!"

"Well, I wouldn't say, Mr. Short drew forth his watch and handed it over.

"Those shirt studs are very good ones," she continued, "and that diamond's worth a small pile. Jim wants those!"

But here Mr. Short did not immediately obey, though he began fumbling at the studs. For the diamond pin had belonged to his father, and he excessively disliked the idea of parting with it.

As he fumbled, there was a cry of "Fire!" in the street.

"Hurry up, there," growled the man by the door. "We can't wait for you all night!"

The cries of "Fire!" redoubled below, and a great clamor broke out in the house.

"Damnation!" shouted the man by the door, "are you going to hand over that property, or ain't you?"

The cries in the house now resounded from attic to cellar, and a general stampede of the inmates seemed to be taking place. It was evident that the building was on fire.

Rodked to sudden energy, hope, and activity, by the sense of a new danger, and the sense of the fire was sweet to Mr. Short, he sprang to his feet, as though to do it struck him, seized a kerosene lamp standing within his reach upon the table, and hurled it with all his might at the door. It flew with sure aim. There was a horrible and sickening crash, a heavy fall, and that was all the remembrance he ever had of the scene in the house.

He had, afterwards, a vague recollection of groping his way down the smoke-filled stairs as rapidly as possible, his valuable mien speedy by the crowds of people pushing hastily in the same direction, and his ears ringing with a series of wild female shrieks, appropriately proceeding from the woman he had left. When he reached the sidewalk and looked up, he saw that the entire building was becoming wrapped in flames, that lighted it from all the lower windows.

He was scorched and singed, and half suffocated with smoke, for he seemed to have been obliged to force his through a curtain of fire that had at one point barred his descent. He reeled homeward, miserable, confounded, drunken with his misery.

The next day he felt too ill to go to his business as usual, and he sent word that were brought to him as he lay in bed. There he read, in the reporters' accounts of the fire in the tenement-house, the statement that two lodgers, a man and a woman, were supposed to have been unable to make their escape, and to have perished in the flames.

And this was the end of that love affair.

He concluded that he had got off very cheaply with the loss of his watch and chain, and fifteen hundred dollars.

One would suppose that this lesson would have entirely cured Mr. Short of romantic pursuits. But it was well written of old: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him."

POPULAR FALLACIES.

THAT warm air must be impure, and that, consequently, it is hurtful to sleep in a comparatively warm room. A warm room is as capable of purification as a cold one, and a close vehicle is less injurious, be it ever so foul, from crowding, than to ride and sit still out of doors in the cold for an hour. The worst that can happen from a crowded conveyance is a healing spell; while, from sitting even half an hour in a still, cold room, there is induced attacks of pneumonia, that is, inflammation of the lungs, which often prove fatal. To those of you, too, who have actively injurious to sleep in a close room where the water freezes, because such a degree of warmth is oppressively enervating, and gets of a sleeping-room to settle near the door, where it is breathed and rebreathed by the sleeper, as it comes in at the key-hole and under the door, in a few hours. Hence there is no apparent advantage, and always danger, especially to weakly persons, in an atmosphere so close as to cause the treasure point.

That it is necessary to the proper and efficient ventilation of a room, even in warm weather, that a window or door should be so left open that a draught of air may be created. Quite as safe a plan of ventilation, and as effectual, is to keep a large fire in a stove or grate, the chimney arranged to set breakfast before leaving the house, and to take the precaution to remove the ashes before the assumption from fever and ague, while the window is left open during the night, and the door is left open during neglected these precautions.

That whatever will cause a cough is good for a cold. This is not true, still once it. On the contrary, all coughs are symptoms of disease, the proceeding and increasing coughs are seasons of cure, and by attempting to relieve a cough it is frequently driven back upon the lungs, and sometimes fatal results follow. Coughs are nature's remedies to remove obstructions, and anything which slightly nauseates, expectorant cures, and anything which slightly nauseates,

THE HAUNTING PAST.

He came to-day. He brought his bride;
And through the wood they went with me:
We passed our ancient trysting tree;
I saw him turn his head aside,

And wondered if his glance would fall
On letters carved by him of yore,
In days that he regrets no more—
That I with burning thoughts recall.

The golden Past, that haunts me yet,
Whose faded glory seems to him
Like twilight distance, cold and dim—
Oh! strange it is how men forget!

Yet through those hours my will was strong
To school my heart to stifle pain—
I could not act that farce again!
But night came, though the day was long.

Night came; they went. His farewell tone
Rings in my ear. 'Twill be the last!
My heart's fierce ordeal is past;
Beneath the stars I stand alone.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A PEN.

A confused sense of being rolled and heated into existence, a disagreeable conviction of prison-like surroundings, accompanied by dull aches through each atom of my system—these were the painful sensations that greeted my earliest moments. But the natural stamina of constitution in which I rejoiced were well calculated to withstand the effects of so cruel a course of treatment. By degrees my depressed spirits rose from their semi-lethargic state, and seemed to approve rather than regret the gloomy circumstances from which their existence had taken origin. I lost no time in cultivating my fellow-prisoners' acquaintance, with that feeling of inherent sociability which ever attends the advent of reason. They, I soon discovered, were fast tiring of the monotony and seclusion our pasteboard walls enclosed, and lamenting, with bitter despair over the prospect of eternal imprisonment. Following the example of these (for no malady is more contagious than low spirits), I chewed the daily cud of discontent.

Providence, in the shape of a pen-seeking customer, relieved our fears. From the shelf in my master's shop, where we had lain so long, the hand of his ever-to-be-blessed clerk transferred us to the smart glass counter. Here, for the first time, we beheld the light of day—breathed for the first time, with joy how inexpressible! the air of delightful freedom. After having undergone an amount of slow manipulation sufficient to distract a Job, we were placed in a customer's pocket, to accompany him homeward.

There had been many whispered remarks while the gentleman was handling us so critically; but it was not till now that the impressions he had created were unreservedly expressed. These impressions, all smacking of eulogy, it would be tedious to singly enumerate. Fearing to intrude my own forebodings among so many cheerful hopes, I remained in a corner, silent, unnoticed. We soon reached our new home, the interior of which I was not long in observing. "Nothing very promising here," I groaned, as, fitted within a pen-holder, I and several companions were placed on a table for immediate use. The sunlight poured into the chamber unimpeded by drapery of any sort; the furniture scarce and plain; the carpet blotched with ink-spots. I cast down my eyes, shuddering.

At this moment a whisper sounded near me, uttered by one of my companions in tones of indescribable disgust:

"Have you seen this vulgar quill on the same table with ourselves?"

I recoiled, shooting indignant glances at the offender thus indicated. To those who have omitted, through indolence or want of time, the study of social grades in Pen society, let me hasten to impart a few momentous facts, viz.: steel-pens abhor quills with a hatred worthy of conscious superiority; if circumstances make an exchange of words necessary, steel-pens use choppy sentences, delivered with the loftiness of a sultan. Briefly, steel-pens are snobs.

My anger soon cooled, and discretion suggested a few questions, put with becoming dignity, of course, to this older occupant of the apartment. After meditating a form of speech for ten minutes, I delivered myself of the following, in which familiarity had been strenuously guarded against:

"I address you with no loquacious motive. Be kind enough to inform me whether the gentleman at our side occupies this entire dwelling."

"Oh, la, no!" gabbled the quill, with a vulgar twang and ill-bred rapidity of utterance. "It ain't only two rooms and a kitching he's got."

"Sufficient!" I interposed, with formidable hauteur. "This information gained, no more will be required."

I had effectually extinguished this blaze of quill-eloquence, and I gloried in the feat. A few hisses were heard, however, of which "stuck up," and "ain't we big," were the unnoticeable purport. This was my first verbal annihilation, and the thought of victory charmed me. But disappointment and chagrin, as I considered the lowness of our situation, was sufficient to stifle every feeling of satisfaction. Two rooms and a kitchen! My worst fears had been realized. A life of drudgery, or, what seemed worse to my proud spirit, obscurity, awaited us!

Next morning I touched paper for the first time, guided by the hand of my new master. For a while I strenuously exerted my naturally fine powers, and skimmed along the paper with a calm, even celerity, that surprised myself. Then gradually, as I discovered the stupid business-letter I had been writing, my pace obstinately slackened. I bent one of my points, and lo! the business letter was but a mass of innumerable ink-spots. From that time I was never used again. My master had evidently become disgusted with my poor abilities, while I rejoiced over the success of so dangerous a stratagem. Dangerous, from the fact of refractory pens generally being thrown in the fire.

But my life of idleness did not last long. A young lady friend of my master, who lodged in the same house as himself, came on a certain morning to borrow a pen. Now, my master, be it known to his discredit, was a notoriously mean man—too mean to lend his pens, even when a pretty young lady asked the favor. His avarice hit upon an excellent ruse. I was kindly bestowed upon his fair visitor, accompanied by many injunctions to keep me for his sake, never to part with me, etc., all of which met, I hope, with their merited appreciation.

I now renounced ambition, and resolved to be happy in my humble home. It is true, for want of better occupation, I had counted every figure in the wall-papering, till I knew the exact number by heart, could tell you the title of each book without the least hesitation, and might have sketched, though no artist, the portrait of my mistress's grandmother, so long had I stared up at it in its dingy frame. But for all this, my simple, staightforward philosophy beat off weariness, till she seldom paid me a visit. I felt I had been born for greater things—to write a second "Paradise Lost," or become the vade mecum of a Byronic genius. Chance—accident—distiny, if you will—had interfered and left me obscure; left me to waste my sweetness on the desert air, though, upon the whole, I argued, perhaps even this were preferable to wasting it in the society of girls, for whom (oh, taste of man!) I hear great characters have a preference.

There was but little work to be done in my new home. An occasional letter to a friend, and now and then the signing of a receipt (my mistress being a school-teacher), formed almost my sole occupation. In the matter of a few delicious little notes, glowing with adjectives, rich in interjections, pink and perfumed, I did my best for the young lady. But these happy events, like most happy events, were few, and time hung very heavily on my hands, notwithstanding my philosophy and resignation.

I cannot tell how I left my mistress's hands. In vain, while lying maimed and ruined in a heap of rubbish, and recounting my history to an aged companion, who, though much disabled, has promised to write it out, have I sought to recall some incident of that unfortunate period. Conjecture, accompanied by long deliberation, has induced me to believe, however, that I must have been stolen during the night from the snug, cosy room, of which I had grown so fond. There can be no other explanation of the mystery.

After what seemed to have been a long sleep, I awoke in a strange, disordered room. Bits of manuscript were flung in every direction. The floor was a sea of foolscap; the table groaning with freshly-written sheets. Near this table sat a wild-looking man, writing rapidly.

I was aware of my position the moment I awoke. A thousand horrors! This man was a newspaper reporter, or what is worse, that notoriously cruel pen-murderer, that enemy to every compassionate mortal, a sensation story writer! Wild, suicidal thoughts whirled through my brain. My blood was ice; my flesh, stone. Meanwhile the man continued his writing vigorously as ever, the room's deep silence only disturbed by scratchings of his pen, as sheet after sheet was filled. Must I stand by and see a fellow-creature suffer? Must I watch his agony (for every scratch was almost a death-groan), and render no assistance? Must I hear his joints crack, see his eye-balls dilating, listen to his panting breath, and—crack!

The unfortunate pen was broken.

In an instant the wild figure rose, and hastily scanned the apartment. Heavens! he was evidently in search of me. My presence in the room was known to him, my fate was sealed. Alas, time was short, even for despair to torture my soul. Before these terrible thoughts had fairly entered my brain, his claw-like hand had seized me. What followed, I find it impossible to describe. Now racked by five successive exclamations—marks made in the space of a second by my unwilling point—now tortured by bone-breaking flourishes, without time to breathe, without strength to cry out, I was hurried over sheet after sheet, till I broke like a reed in his murderous grasp.

"Never mind!" he cried, pitching me into a corner, half senseless; "never mind if it is broken. 'The Remorseless Grandmother; or, The Murdered Innocents,' is finished, and ready for the ———'s columns to-morrow morning!"

THE GREAT BALL OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT.

The night of Wednesday, January 31st, will be long remembered in New York by those who are devoted to saltatorial exercises especially. On that night the wealth and fashion of New York gathered at the Academy of Music to do honor to the first ball of the Seventh Regiment, N. G., S. N. Y., since the breaking out of the great rebellion. To attempt the description of any affair of the kind by the pen, is almost hopeless, nothing but the pencil and the graver giving the slightest chance at an understanding of the brilliancy and crush of so gigantic a gathering of gayety. For weeks before nothing was talked of but the great fête, and the struggle for tickets was in proportion to the hoped-for pleasure.

The members of the regiment were allowed each a certain number, a number which would, with the invited guests, comfortably fill the Academy, besides which none were to be had. Almost immediately the tickets were taken; it was voted in club and parlor the correct thing to do, and of course that settled the question, so that for over a week neither love nor money could procure a ticket of the committee, and the few that have been bought of individuals at rates varying from $25 to $60 premium were quite likely originally purchased by speculators shrewd enough to obtain them through a friend. The greatest care was taken by those who had the disposal of the tickets to keep them from improper hands, and we are convinced that the care was well rewarded, for a more entirely correct and orderly assemblage was never seen at the Academy of Music.

The invited guests comprised all the names that have, within the past few years, become famous in the history of the country, a large portion of whom accepted and attended.

Availing themselves of the good taste, sound judgment and great experience of Mr. L. F. Harrison, of Irving Hall, the committee made the decoration of the Academy a feature of the reception. The whole affair was placed in the hands of Mr. Harrison, who transformed the stately dimensions of the Academy and the spacious auditorium of his own chaste and beautiful Hall into one vast area of splendor and magnificence, fit for the scenes which were therein enacted on this grand occasion.

From the Academy to Irving Hall, on the opposite side of the street, an archway was built, the latter building being used as a supper-room.

The flooring of the Academy extended from the front of the balcony flush with the circle to the extreme rear of the stage. Over the stage was a triangular tent-cover; at its back a picture of Fort Federal Hill where the Seventh was stationed during the earlier days of the war; the proscenium boxes were wreathed with evergreens and decked with flowers; while from the mouth of an immense eagle, perched at the top of the boxes on either side, depended the flag of the nation in graceful folds; the front of the dress and family circles and of the amphitheatre were decorated with shields, tapestries and banners, bearing the names of the more distinguished members of the regiment, those in front of the dress circle being on a red ground, of the family circle in white, and of the amphitheatre in blue. Behind the "little plaster boys" who perch so uncomfortable on the gas brackets about the front of the circles, were superb bouquets, while the knapsacks, muskets, caps and colors of the regiment were arranged in a tasteful manner, giving a light and airy appearance to the Academy, in marked contrast with the lugubrious affairs which from time to time drape and darken the festive hall. Between the pillars were immense pieces of armor, on which hung great tapestries bearing the names of such members of the regiment as are known to have died in battle, while at the extreme rear of the stage was a peculiar and exceedingly appropriate arrangement of cannon, musket-balls and standards, surmounted by an eagle and the national flag; and stretched across the full front of the stage from side to side, was an immense piece of crimson tapestry, on which was the motto:

"Pro Gloria et Patria."

The archway connecting the two buildings was a miracle of light and beauty. The ceiling and walls were hung with white and gold, decorated with bunting and national colors; while at regular intervals were cages with singing canaries, whose little throats seemed flush with song and melody. The front of the hall was elegantly draped with the American flag, the steps being covered with a brilliant carpet; these led into a little green-room, beautifully decorated, and exhibiting pictures of President Lincoln, Gens. Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Washington, Clay and Webster. Beyond this was a second room, a perfect boudoir, chaste in its decorations, and patriotic in its mottoes and pictures. This opened directly upon a scene of fairy-land, upon the hall itself, which was a perfect mirror of light and beauty, a very picture of elegance and taste. Around three sides of the room stood the tables loaded and groaning with the good things of life, the comforts of the internal, the delights of the stomach, which, with many is larger and of much more importance than the heart itself. Birds without number, sang continually; flags of our own color swung gracefully above the galleries; and in front of the tables, flowers, fresh from the stem, made gay and redolent the very air; a superb fountain, decorated "within an inch of its ironic life," threw up cologne and jets of perfume, which sprayed about an immense basin, and scared the very fish that sported in its waters; canopies of red, white and blue, arched the area, and an air of simple "psualligasture" reigned universal.

So much for the decorations, and now for the ball itself. There were "fair women and brave men" by the thousand; and still they came, glorious galaxies of beauty, unrivaled by any stars in the constellations of loveliness, which poets celebrate as the fairest of Circassia. The number of tickets issued having been about 1,600 (double), of course the number of guests was not less than 3,000, among whom might have been mentioned every queen of fashion in the metropolis, and a multitude of social stars from Washington and elsewhere.

Of toilets separate, among so many of brilliancy, of course it would be superfluous to speak. To say that in a majority of cases the toilets were unexceptionable, would be simply faint praise, and to say that a multitude among them would pass unscathed the severest test of a criticism by Eugenie, the Empress of Fashion, would only be what has been said a hundred times before, on a hundred lesser occasions, the éclat of which would have paled before the fuller blaze of last night's splendor, as the moon pales in the heavens at sunrise. Then, too, from floor to ceiling, the galleries were simply ablaze with constellations of loveliness, the flashing of whose diamonds was only rivaled by the flashing of their still more radiant eyes; and again, the effect of all this was vastly heightened by the glamor of gas jets, whose fiery splendors lit up the Academy with a weird brilliancy, and, combined with the profusion of gold displayed in the ornamentation, made the scene one to be remembered, even by him who stood amid the airy and gorgeous grandeurs of the palaces of Ispahan.

At midnight the carnival was at its height, and from thence until late at night, the revelry of dance and wine ruled the Academy, and reigned with undisputed sway over the fashionable assemblage which constituted, to an unlimited extent, the esprit of the social life of New York.

But finally the revelers grew weary, and one by one they ceased from the mazes of the dance—one by one the roll of the carriages was heard as the guests departed from the Academy—one by one the lights of the edifice went out in darkness—and the grandest and most splendid carnival of dance and wine which has occurred in the annals of New York was over.

Such was the glory of the Seventh Regiment Reception, and as such we leave it to be remembered by the happy guests who graced the occasion.

CHARLES C. YEATON.

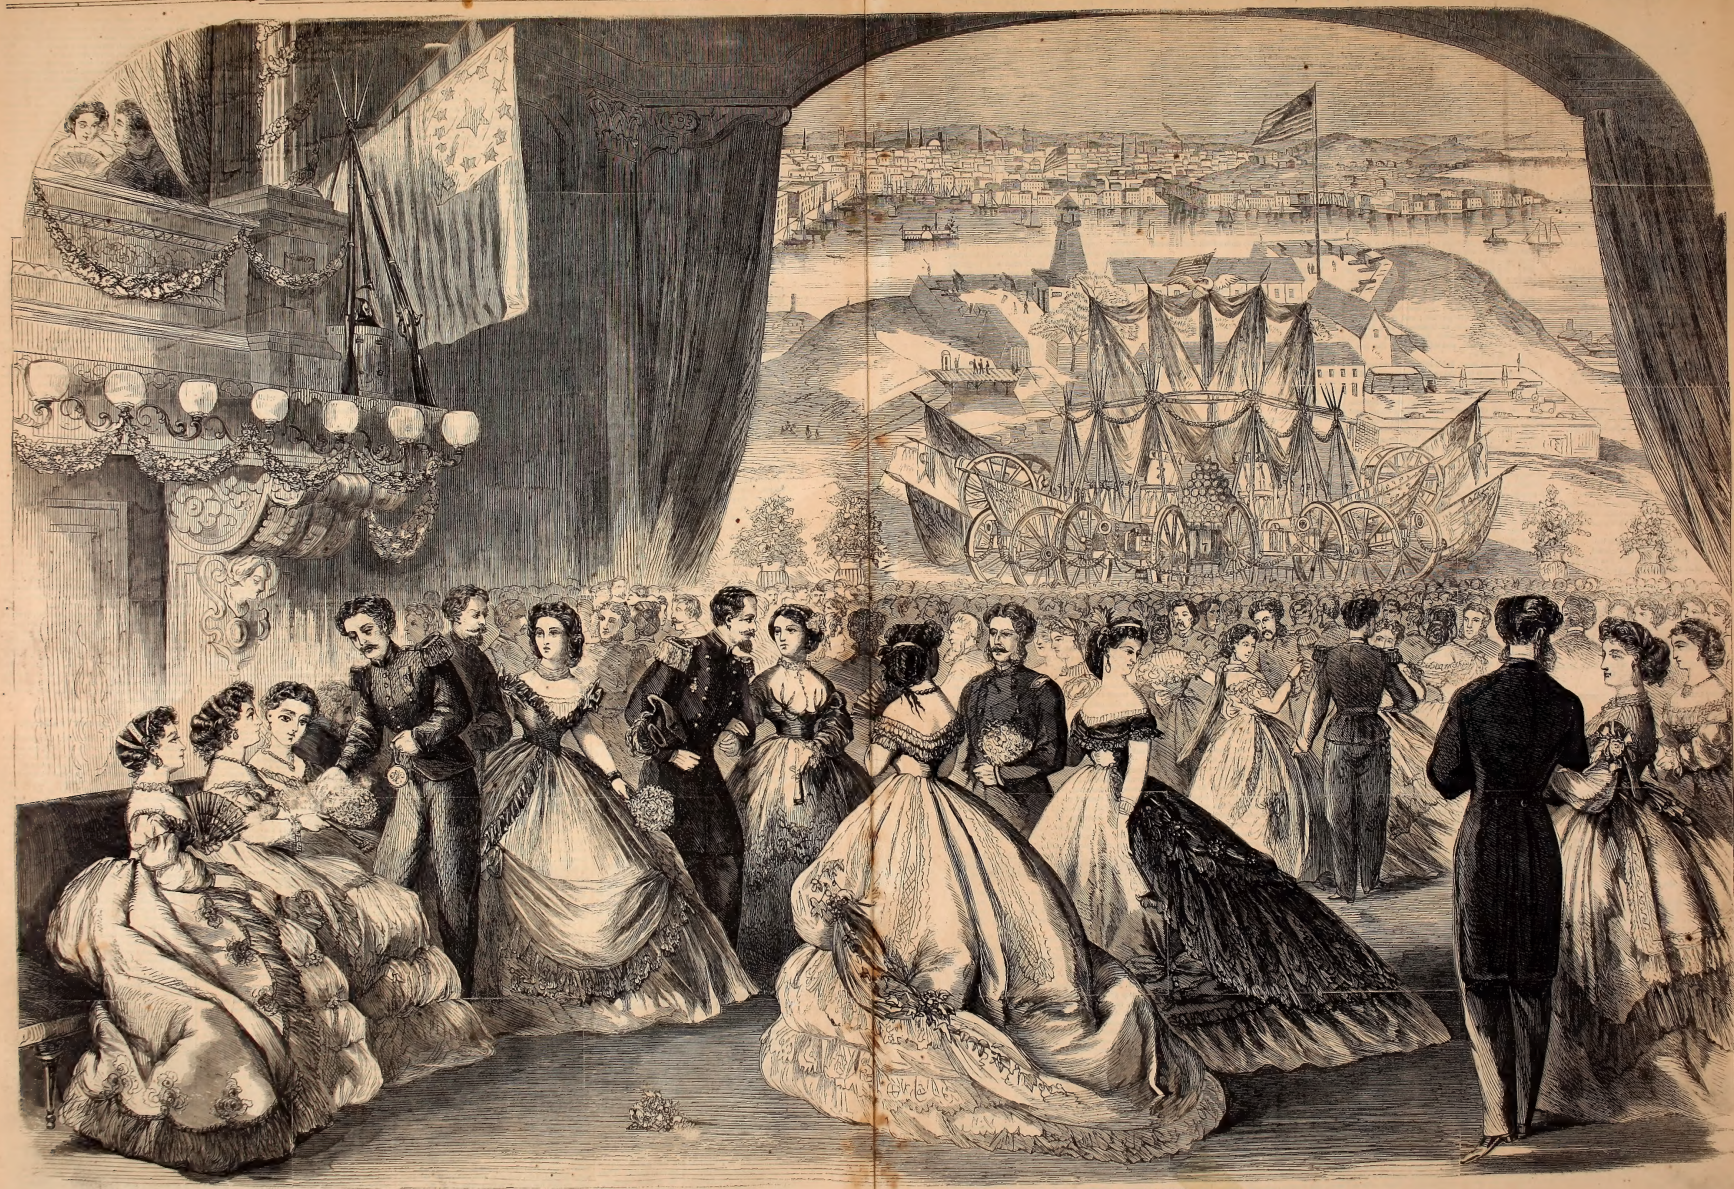
Charles C. Yeaton, of whom the accompanying portrait is an excellent likeness, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., on the 17th of January, 1835, being descended, on the mother's side, from Gen. Sullivan, one of the illustrious names of the Revolutionary War, and on the father's side from one of the oldest and most respectable families of the early New England settlement. From earliest youth, young Yeaton's mechanical and business genius asserted itself and attracted the attention of all competent judges. When but 16, he came to New York, and entered one of our largest wholesale dry-goods establishments, wherein he remained three years; thence graduating into the insurance business, in connection with the Boston Insurance Companies, and when but 22 or 23 years of age, embarking with a partner about as young as himself in the general banking business. In 1859 he became associated with Mr. Horace H. Day, in the India-rubber business; and between that time and his taking up the Alden Machine for Setting and Distributing Type, he had a varied experience and education in connection with the manufacture and sale of rubber goods, sewing-machines, and other enterprises—calling out and cultivating his mechanical and financial abilities—in all of which he was successful. And certainly this Alden Machine, as Yeaton found it, might well have discouraged any less far-seeing and courageous mind.

It had taken twenty years, and all the means of its first inventor, sending him to the grave, from over-labor, while his work was of no merchantable value—a curious and beautiful, but not then practical toy. Between that period and its introduction to Mr. Yeaton's notice, it had been muddled over and made more complex by experimental alterations, not carrying it much, if any, nearer to success; and there were numerous liens upon it, from small investments of capital spent to no purpose. The quick, mechanical genius, and perfectly-trained business habits of the mind now brought to bear upon it, at once appreciated the full value of Alden's discovery, saw the existing defects, and that they could be remedied; but realized, also, that to make the machines what they should be, and to produce them, both in quantity and quality, of a merchantable value, no isolated and sporadic experiments or tinkerings of hand labor could avail; but that sufficient capital must be at once collected to start a factory for their production, with such improvements as would be suggested in the course of their manufacture and practical trial. To the task of inspiring confidence and collecting the requisite capital, he at once applied himself, with a zeal and industry only equaled by his devotion to setting right or having set right, under his personal supervision, whatever had been amiss or not perfect in the wonderful semi-automaton which now claimed his attention. The result all know.

It was in organizing the factory by which this triumph of labor-saving ingenuity has been achieved, that Mr. Yeaton conceived the idea of writing and publishing his "Manual for the Guidance of the Alden Machine Company and Factory," a book which, with its thousand illustrations, and statistical tables of every part of the machine, and tool to make it with, giving the exact dimensions and cost of everything in the factory, is, in itself, "a new thing under the sun," and only second in curiosity and importance to the machine it celebrates. As the Scientific American well observes, "This volume is a factory in itself, and in full operation, though only on paper."

By turning to this volume, we can there find, that, for every item of work to be done, and cent of money to be expended, the projector was able to give a definitive statement and account, with a view, more comprehensive and compendious than has ever heretofore been brought to bear in advance upon the organization of any manufacturing business. So perfect, indeed, is this Manual of the Alden Machine, a book costing over $150 per copy, and only printed for the benefit of the stockholders of that concern, and for the future guidance of the various factories to be started in different countries, that by simply following its instructions, a dozen average mechanics, without any previous experience, could start as many Alden factories in as many parts of the world, each producing exactly five perfect machines per diem, and all so exactly similar in their work and results, that the minutest or largest parts of each would be interchangeable with the similar parts of every other machine so manufactured. Such a work is destined to revolutionize our present system of manufactures, which may be said to have grown up accidentally, rather than to be created as one harmonious whole; and on the adoption of its well-considered principles in other factories, and their application to other branches of industry, master manufacturers will both get rid of all experimental and hap-hazard expenses and be relieved from their present dependence on the health, whims and lives of the experienced foremen, who at present have charge of the various sub-branches of production.

Mr. Yeaton has a mechanical and financial genius which crops out in whatever he touches; even in his leisure hours producing rare specimens of invention and workmanship for pastime; and his mind has that peculiar self-poise and ambition which demands to have everything around him as perfect as human art can make it—a temper which might be unfortunate, had he not the patience, industry and perseverance, to accomplish for himself every reasonable wish, and the good judgment to form no desires that cannot by his own hands or means be realized.



RISKS OF GREAT EATERS.

Great eaters never live long. A voracious appetite, so far from being a sign of health, is a certain indication of disease. Some dyspeptics are always hungry; feel best when they are eating, but as soon as they have eaten, they endure torments so distressing in their nature as to make the unhappy victim wish for death. The appetite of health is that which inclines moderately to eat, when eating time comes, and which, when satisfied, leaves no unpleasant reminders. Multitudes measure their health by the amount they can eat; and of any ten persons, nine are gratified at an increase of weight, when in reality, any excess of fatness, s, in proportion, decisive proof of existing disease, showing that the absorbents of the system are too weak to discharge their duty; and the tendency to fatness, to obesity, increases, until existence is a burthen and sudden death closes the history.

Particular inquiry will almost invariably elicit the fact that fat persons, however rubicund and jolly, are never well, and yet they are envied. While great eaters never live to an old age, and are never for a single day, without some "symptom," some feeling sufficiently disagreeable to attract the mind's attention unpleasantly, small eaters, those who eat regularly of plain food usually have no "spare flesh," are wiry and enduring, and live to an active old age. Remarkable exemplifications of these statements are found in the lives of centenarians of a past age. Galen, one of the most distinguished among the ancients, lived very sparingly after the age of 28, and died in his 140th year. Ketigern, who never tasted spirits or wine, and worked hard all his life, reached 185 years.

Jenkins, a poor Yorkshire fisherman, who lived on the coarsest diet, was 169 years old when he died. Old Parr lived to 153; his diet being milk, cheese, whey, small beer and coarse bread. The favorite diet of Henry Francisco, who lived to 140, was tea, bread and butter, and baked apples. Ephraim Pratt, of Shutesbury, Massachusetts, who died aged 117, lived chiefly on milk, and even that in small quantities; his son, Michael, by similar means, lived to be 103 years old. Father Cull, a Methodist clergyman, died last year at the age of 105, the main diet of his life having been salted swine's flesh (bacon) and bread made of Indian meal. From these statements, nine general readers out of ten will jump to the conclusion that milk is "healthy," as are baked apples and bacon.

These conclusions do not legitimately follow. The only inference that can be safely drawn is from the only fact running through all these cases, that plain food and a life of steady labor tend to a great age. As to the healthfulness and life-protracting qualities of any article of diet named, nothing can be inferred, for no two of the men lived on the same kind of food; all that can be rationally and safely said is either they lived so long in spite of the quality of the food they ate, or that their instinct, instead of its perversion, with a life of steady labor, directly caused healthfulness and great length of days. We must not expect to live long by doing any one thing which an old man did, and omit all the others; but by doing all he did, and that is, work steadily, as well as eat mainly a particular dish.

GRAND BALL OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT, N. Y. S. N. G., AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ON THE NIGHT OF THE 31ST JANUARY.

OF MUSIC, ON THE NIGHT OF THE 31st JANUARY.

A LIFE MOTTO.

BY A. F. IRVING.

I HAVE thought upon a saying
For a motto of the life,
'Gainst the evil of betraying,
'Gainst the scandal, 'gainst the strife.

Now to others I shall give it,
Jeweled like a fiery word,
Having power as I receive it,
All it touches to expand.

Let us find ourselves the winners
In this maxim, old and grand,
And imprint it on our banners:
Let your heart go with your hand.

Take no heed for the to-morrow—
It supplies its own demand—
Whether bringing joy or sorrow,
Let your heart go with your hand.

When you see a friend in trouble,
Cast upon the world's bleak strand,
Pass not by on tracks that double:
Let your heart go with your hand.

If you see a fellow-creature,
Though his failings have no bond—
Suffering stamped on every feature—
Let your heart go with your hand.

If you meet an old acquaintance
Far from home, in foreign lands,
Then remember this small sentence:
Let your heart go with your hand.

If your mind inclines to wrangle,
If your foe before you stand,
And 'tis best your rage to strangle,
Let your heart go with your hand.

If, when charity affording,
And a cent or two you spend,
Always have thou two according—
Let your heart go with your hand.

If the children of the crossings
Seek your largess to command,
Oh! remember, in your tossings,
That your heart go with your hand.

Give no heed to worldly growlers,
Who with gold their hands have tanned,
Empty, heartless, are those howlers:
Let your heart go with your hand.

However deep you stumble
In the desert's shifting sand,
Let those words within you rumble:
Let your heart go with your hand.

However deep you stumble,
There is hope of you, my friend,
You need neither pine nor grumble,
If your heart go with your hand.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LXII.—BOB OPENS A NEW CHAPTER IN MR. SLEUTH'S DESTINY.

WHEN Sleuth left the alderman's worthy son-in-law at the foot of the hill, the latter gazed after the retreating figure with but little moment's hesitation or change of purpose. Probably, on consideration, he had found that things, after all, had only gone just as he had expected. Probably he was too shrewd to rely on mere words when he had solider chances for acts.

Away he trudges, knocking again at the stones he passes; but now it was done viciously—not at all, as before, with the most exuberant good temper that would show itself in such little playful ways. Away he trudges, mile after mile, asking for a certain lodging whenever he meets any person—a question that often provokes a smile, which involves almost another question from the stranger:

"Are you afraid to trust yourself inside of that place?"

What, then, is the place? It is the county jail of Hempton.

Away he trudges, hour after hour; and when he reaches the black, high, forbidding walls, and knocks at the ticket gate, the porter roughly shouts out to him:

"No use you're making a row there. Too late. Come to-morrow."

"Humbly ax pardon," said Bob, in his gentlest of accents. "But might I have just a word with you?"

The porter comes, grumbling all the way, and looks at the applicant.

"Well?"

"I'll come to-morrow—just as you says; but I thought I might tell you my business—not, you see, as business, but just to herpshin, for it's a queer affair, why I come so late. I fancy you'll rather like to hear on it."

"Well?"

"What I'm a-goin' to say to the guv'nor in the morning is as how my father-in-law, a worry rich gentleman, has murdered his wife seven three and four years ago, and I never could come across the suspected murderers till now."

"Where are they?"

"Just where you likes to put 'em! Under your own worry eyes. In your own strong boxes—under your worry own lock and keys—that's where they are."

"You mean the very men that did it are here?"

"No, I don't. No, sir, not lexactly. That's the queer nature of the whole business. But I won't trouble you any more to-night."

"I'm in no hurry."

"But, you see, I've to get lodging, and the village is a long way off."

"Perhaps, if you speak a little more clearly than you do now, I might go in to the governor and let him hear what you say."

"Well, if you wouldn't mind that, it would be worry good on you, and I'll be thankful. And if I might get a bit of straw anywheres for the night —"

"Well, what is it—this wonderful mystery?"

"Why, this: the two men in quod here, named Betsy Baker and Old Johnny—leastways so I'm told they calls them—was brought down in here 'em they were called Ikey Small and his pal Jack—"

"Ay, they are in the prison, and under sentence for transportation, and will be sent off in a day or two."

"Not so soon as that! That won't do. I must see the guv'nor. I must, indeed."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, the halderman—for that was his rank in life—was murdered, and, o' course, everybody, the man's own friends and intimates, swore as the robbers must have fired the pistol; but they didn't—I know they didn't; and that lots o' money and all kinds o' big matters grows out of the question, as—Who did? That's it, my boy—Who did? I'll tell you, only keep you quiet. One as is now a boy of seven years old, and a girl. One as is But there, I daren't say any more even to the guv'nor. Your men don't know as much as that. I do. But as how, if you could ax them, afore you bother the guv'nor; and if they don't convince you they're as hinnocent as a blessed baby of doing anythink worse than robbing, then you come back, and tell me I'm a liar and a fool. Just you try."

Half an hour later, Bob's ingenuity was rewarded by admission into the sacred precincts; and he could not help reminding himself he had not always found admission so difficult.

But to look at his stern, moral, and yet serene face, so full of indignation of wrong-doing, and yet so regretfully expressive of conviction that here things were, at all events, wonderfully set to rights, one might suppose Bob had never, even in thought, been acquainted with evil ways.

He was soon brought to the governor, who, like other great men, loved to unbend, and who had been plied with so skillful a key, his official as the official had been played with by Bob. In consequence, looking at the affair as something out of prison routine, he had vouchsafed the light and comfort of his most inner sanctuary to Bob's wretch-stricken and downcast eyes.

"Well, my man, what is it this cock-and-bull story you've been telling to the porter?"

Bob repeated the story, and the governor grew interested.

Then he went away, and was absent a long time.

When he came back he said to Bob:

"Both the convicts confirm what you say, so far as talk goes. I am free to confess they seem to speak truthfully. And what goes a long way in their favor, they have never, so far as I know, been in custody on account of the robbery and murder at the alderman's; and were they guilty of the murder, their very silence would be a danger. In spite of that, they both—and I have seen them separately—readily acknowledge the robbery, but stoutly deny having fired the shot. So it they had but a single-barreled pistol a-piece, and that both were fired after they had left the house, and when they were so far off as to be quiet. If that be true, the shot that killed the alderman must have come from some other quarter."

"Didn't I say so, guv'nor? Ain't I come all the way from Australy to see justice on the wilian as has made away with my own wife's father? Of course I have!"

"Well, what do you wish me to do?"

"Your honor's worship can tell me that better than I can tell you. But, guv'nor, if I may make so bold as to ax if a letter might'n't be writ to some gentleman in the neighborhood as was well beknown to the halderman—"

"It ought to be a magistrate."

"Dr. Thompson, guv'nor, 'd be the worry gentleman."

"Yes, he would do. I know him sufficiently. Shall I write to him?"

"I'm the only one as can stand up—leastways, at this present—for my murdered kinsman; but I may say, in the name of my wife, gentle and simple —guv'nor, we thanks you."

The governor was amused with Bob's grandiloquence, but he immediately wrote the following letter:

"—— Jail.

"SIR—I have two men here, convicted of burglary, who are under sentence of transportation, and almost presently to be sent off. They say they were concerned in the robbery of Alderman Maude's house, some three or four years ago, when the poor old gentleman was dying ill in bed. That night he was murdered, as they afterwards heard; but they are positive, from their own protestations of innocence as to the murder. They say they are sure that neither by accident nor through any intention of theirs was he shot, but by some one who took advantage of their presence to covey his own crime.

"It is a mysterious business, and if you think it worth while for me to detain the men, I will make application in the proper quarter for permission to do so."

This letter—duly signed, sealed and posted—sent Bob away from the prison next day (for they gave him a bed) in a wonderful lightness of heart; for he was thinking of his next meeting with Mr. Sleuth, in open court, whither Mr. Sleuth had invited him to come.

The doctor got this letter, read it with considerable agitation, called Clarissa, who was in the garden, and then immediately sent off a man to request Mr. Sleuth to favor the doctor with a call, and, if possible, immediately.

Mr. Sleuth went, wondering whether Clarissa had told the doctor of her treatment of him, and whether that worthy, high-minded gentleman had, in consequence, told her she must turn over a new leaf, and treat him (Sleuth) in quite a different way.

Imagine his feelings to have that letter from the governor of a jail put into his hands!

How he got through the next half hour, during which his stay lasted, he could not even slowly explain to himself, when he had got outside the house, and was being driven home, and tried to look back, and judge how he had behaved. He had a vague impression that he had managed to smile at first, as if oppressed by the absurdity of the idea; then that he had said something sonorous about the fear of man's memory; and, lastly, that he had, with some not unnatural hesitations and mortal inward panics, kept a tolerable front while he said the matter must be immediately gone into; and that, if the doctor approved, he would himself go over next day to the jail, and see the governor.

On the whole, he fancied that, in spite of his alarm, whenever he saw, or fancied he saw, either the doctor's or Clarissa's eyes look into his at all peculiarly, he had got away with as little self-exposure as was possible under such horrible conditions.

What did it all mean?

"Would it—could it be the handiwork of Master Bob?

If so, he would probably soon be favored with another meeting. Why not?

He did not need to ask the question twice. Again he stopped, as before, at the foot of the little hill. Again he sent on the carriage, watched it over the ridge, looked back, and then, in his own wonder and admiration—for he had only been ironically pretending to expect the ruffian there—he fairly burst out laughing. There he had actually planned to be, when next Sleuth should pass that road, that he might the better drive home to Sleuth's mind the lesson of his folly on the preceding day.

CHAPTER LXIII.—BOB STUDIES A SPHINX—MENTAL CHAOS.

THE Eastern potentate who dipped his head into a bowl of water, and found his fortune in it again, passed through a long and terrible life history, was a type of the large class of men who, at certain periods, go through the most violent mental experiences; when the before and the after of life are, perhaps, concentrated into a few days, or hours, or minutes; and when character itself may possibly undergo all the pangs and convulsions of revolutionary change. So was it now with Sleuth in the brief space that elapsed between his seeing Bob at the top of the hill, and his seeing him at his side, with the triumphant though subdued look of conscious victory—victory so conscious that it could afford to be magnanimous in its display.

It was not, however, Bob's own doings that created this fearful upheaving of Sleuth's hidden nature. It was the blow dealt by Phillis's hand that first opened Sleuth quite new worlds of fear and vivid speculation. When she struck him, not in his soul, which he could have very well endured, but in his flesh—when she then brought home to him that the true issues with which he had been so willing to make sport for his own selfish might return to plague their inventor where alone he was vulnerable—when he had to learn that the cosy, comfortable feeling of life which had once really enjoyed, had not only been exchanged for splendor, but for a splendor that also involved the possibility of ugly pieces of work being impelled into his dearly cherished flesh—he not only saw new views of a dream, and take quite new views of the duties and responsibilities of existence, and especially of the future aims of one particular man—Bob Sleuth, Esquire, of Eddington Hall, J. P.

For indeed, he had now been for full three years and more culminating the society of Dr. Pompeus, and of the gentry of the neighborhood, and, by dint of hard work, much humiliation, and general self-sacrifice to the real taste, habit, and feeling of his own, had managed to obtain a footing, at last, that accorded with his wealth and ambition. Suddenly have almost all, and almost the whole position to the dust in an instant, by making Sleuth feel, through that one touch of reality, precisely what the only woman he really cared for in his heart, how he must sicken of his own success when, instead of kind words and personal admiration, such as he needed, he had only society to look to for solace in his great trouble—the very society that, if it only once suspected the whole truth, would shrink from him with subdued ferocity for having dared, being what he was, to break into its charmed circle.

He had tried to destroy all this, as his wound grew well. He had tried to persuade himself that, on the whole, he could not have got rid of Phillis on better terms. Now he was, in fact, uninjured. He tried to believe he loved Clarissa, not Phillis; and that when he should have won Clarissa, and have got her to bend down to him—he would look back, and laugh at all these foolish hesitations, these secret misgivings, these scarcely recognized fears, and the cold, glittering world of ceremony, and settle down with Phillis in his own way and here, and think only of pure every-day enjoyment.

It was a most absurd thing—it was worse than that, it was a most agitating thing—that now, when he and Phillis had so completely done with each other, he should often catch himself reflecting on the sort of life he would have let if he had married her, how much safer he would have felt above all, how much more cosy and comfortable! He could have told her all—ay, even of the murder and the dealings with the cedrick—and yet been sure of her, so long, only, as he did confide, and she knew of his love and trust. But now? Why, she might even yet return, but only again, perhaps, to fly at him, and trouble his heart and mind with sad perplexities and danger. Truly he began to think he ought to have stuck to and trusted Phillis at all hazards.

So great, however, is habit, that habit alone sufficed to keep all these thoughts in subjection, till Bob's re-appearance gave new life and vivacity to every one of them, and produced so deep a disgust of all that had been done, and of all that remained to do, that Sleuth would have just then gladly, gratefully welcomed the offer, if it could have been made to him—"Resign your wealth, take and marry Phillis, and the past shall be as if it had never existed." Yes, the scales fell from his eyes, and he felt he would have given worlds, if he had had them, to have been able to fetch Phillis back, win her, marry her, and then take counsel with her as to this horrible ruffian.

Such was the state of things below the surface with Sleuth during this eventful interview. What was on the scene the dialogue will best show.

"Again, Bob, at this place!"

"Hit it close—ain't I? Deal o' work to do, mind you, Master Sleuth, in a very short time; but, somehow, I said to myself, 'He's a handsome gentleman, that Master Sleuth, though he is a bit hard to me in my interviews, and brings things as ought to be forgotten atween friends. And he's a worry popplar magistrate. Shall I go afore the whole bunch of banks, like beloved brethren, and bexpose him, this good man and popplar magistrate? Not I. 'Taint in me—leastwise, not when I've been paid him the compliment of another visit to ax him what he now thinks.'"

"Why now, Bob?"

"Oh, you don't know? There! See what it is to be too sweet o' your work! I ought to have gev more time."

"Explain, Bob, it is to you I owe the letter from the Governor of Hongston Gaol to Dr. Pompeus?"

"All right! Got the letter! Fire away! We're on the square now. I'm your man, Master Sleuth. Only say how it's to be. Give the word. What's your pleasure?"

"What are your personal wishes in the matter?"

"Justice to my honored, aged, and respectable relative. Ain't I his son-in-law?"

"Is that your only wish?"

"Well, Master Sleuth," said Bob's eye twinkled with an expression of the richest enjoyment, "if so be as I might have a comfortable annuity to sit down upon for a bit, while I collected how well justice had been done to the dear, aimable old gentleman's memory—"

"But if these things did not happen to go together—how then?"

"I think I'd take the annuity, Master Sleuth."

There was a silence after this for full half a minute.

"Where should you live?"

"Lord love you, Master Sleuth! not so long ways from you, you may be sure. Not so near as to make my walleyed and respectable friend ashamed on me; nor so far but I could pay him a visit once in a way, reminding him, on broad sides, to bexpress my joy in his jy, and to show him how down in the mouth I was when things went wrong for him and his, and how I felt as a werry humble and middlin'y distant friend of my benefactor. I wants to let him see Bob has got a new chance in his hands as'll full his 'art ash's far off of being full too."

It is just possible that, had Bob proposed again to go abroad, Sleuth might have accepted without any terms to get rid of him, and have again made clean the pretence for so large an outlay. But Sleuth was in no mood and things were unusually now than of old. Even while he asked these questions, he was secretly pondering, not over Bob's words, but his fearful prospects beyond, out of which he knew not which to choose.

"Bob," he began presently—and with a certain tremulousness of firmness that he was evidently aware of, and at last controlled, "this matter now grows serious, and you compel me to treat it so. Have you spoken to any one but myself and your hand or foot if I could have helped it. I have still some lingering of affection for my cousin. Have you told her?"

"Not a word, Master Sleuth! That's the chief thing—the credit o' the family! Hang wealth, say I, but give me a honorable name and magnificent blood!"

"Listen. I am not ashamed to confess that I have been terribly shaken by this letter from the governor of the jail. Burglars truly, there are only two men who could have killed the alderman —my cousin Anthony—"

"Your father, Sleuth! That's the true ticket. I likes to hear you lay down the laws of logic. Go on, Master Sleuth."

"For me, Bob, as I was going to say, if you had waited to let me say it. Well, I cannot forget what I once unwillingly let out to you—you forgive the confession from me, Bob—about my fears about Anthony's guilt. And now, if I am driven to speak the whole truth, or sacrifice my own character—"

"Besides your blessed neck, Master Sleuth."

Sleuth went on, a little paler in face, perhaps, but still quite equably in even tone and manner—

"If I am so driven—bitter as it will be to see my cousin so hold up, and to see the family name bespattered—I can have no choice but to extricate my own character, and I shall do so, regardless of every other consideration."

Apparently, Bob did not at all approve of the turn the conversation was taking. So he said in his most brutal fashion—and it was wonderful how brutal he could be when not afraid, and when he saw his interest lay in brutality—

"Explain all that 'ere to your jolly gang o' beaks to-morrow, will yer? And much good may it do yer, Master Sleuth! Good-morning, Master Sleuth. This is the last time o' axing, Master Sleuth. T'other wasn't! Good-morning, Master Sleuth!"

Bob turned, and actually began to walk away;

but hearing Sleuth's rapid step following, he faced quickly round.

"What now?" he demanded; and Sleuth saw that deep, bitter disappointment rankled in the ruffian's soul, and that he would assuredly risk everything that there could be to risk—which for him was not much—in order to damage his intended victim.

What a bitter moment it was! He really wanted just then to go no further. He shrank, with a repugnance that he could not himself understand, from the very crime so long prepared for to cover his own crime—shrank from it now, when it was his only refuge.

"Bob," he said, "think a bit calmly and sensibly. I am willing to help you; but you must consider how I am to do it. Put yourself in my position. Don't ask for what you do not really want, and what a man in my position cannot grant; but ask only for that which is necessary to you. Then we might get on. Perhaps—"

He paused, and there was again a prolonged silence, during which both were considering the same problem without acknowledging it—How could Sleuth satisfy at once Bob and Dr. Pompess, and yet let Anthony alone?

During this pause Sleuth said, suddenly:

"Do you know where my cousin is, and what he is doing!"

"Trust me! Bin over the ground before starting for the race. He ain't many miles hoff; and he's got lots o' money; makes plows, and farmers' machines, and contracts, and has a partner."

Sleuth had heard something of this, but had always refused to discourse on the subject of his cousin, so that he was not sure of the truth of Anthony's prosperity. But even this fact had its significance now. If Anthony were in possession of a large business, he must have money, character, and friends. What if he were to hear of this statement of the burglars, and be the first to proceed? Sleuth's soul seemed to dissolve as to a jelly at the thought of seeing such an avenger of blood on his track, added to all the rest. Dr. Pompess, and the governor's letter, Bob, Phillis, and now Anthony! Why should he hesitate?

The envy or jealousy that formed so large a part of Sleuth's character, suggested additional tortures. Anthony would come back, rich, to Clarissa, win her, and so deprive him (Sleuth) of the one friend he had, and through whom he had obtained all his other friends and acquaintances—Dr. Pompess. Oddly did the two discordant visions mingle in Sleuth's busy brain—Anthony in delightful converse with Clarissa, and the two sneering at him (for so he pictured them); Anthony in full possession of the doctor's ear and favor, hearing how the doctor had condescended to take the druggist's assistant in hand.

He made up his mind. Yes. On the one hand, he saw no possibility of extricating himself, even with Bob's utmost help; on the other, he saw the moral certainty of final relief if he allowed things to take their natural course against Anthony. It was not he now, it was Fate that struck the blow. Besides, if the worst came to the worst, he could and would save his cousin. It was wonderful how his countenance lightened as he saw that solution. True, he didn't at present perceive how such relief from the gallows was to be managed, after a trial and conviction; but he felt great fortitude in bearing the doubt till the hour of action should come, and then—why, then he might even win Anthony's gratitude, smuggle him out of the country with plenty of money, face it out, if necessary, at home, by boldly avowing he wasn't going to let his own kinsman die by the hangman, and then—— He need not see further at present. Yes, he was decided.

"Bob, I have considered, and I can't consent to appear wanting in respect to the memory of the dead, in order to save the reputation of the living, if the living be guilty. Knowing what I know, I cannot say to you, 'Stop!—you are wrong.' I fear, Bob, you are right, and that you must proceed."

As this did not in the least illumine the lowering gloom of that hideous face, Sleuth proceeded to add:

"I shall, through my friend Dr. Pompess, offer a reward of a thousand pounds for the discovery of the murderer; and I grieve to tell you, Bob, that I fear that that reward will have to be very promptly paid."

"Think so?" said Bob, with a villainous roll and leer of his eye sideways in Sleuth's direction, as he began to understand the cue now given. "And if he were to 'appen to go off the hooks afore——"

"Before conviction? Then I will tell my friend to pay it to the man who is the instrument of the discovery."

"And if your friend were 'ard to please—some folks is, you know—when it comes to legal pints, and a poor man demanding lots o' money——"

"I will tell him not to stand upon legal niceties."

"Will you pay yourself, Mister Sleuth?"

"Bob, reflect! You may have to appear! You may be asked questions about motives, and so on. You see?"

Bob did reflect, and looked viciously—now at Sleuth, now at the ground—as he did so. He had already seen and appreciated the fact that, whether Sleuth was or was not the real murderer, it would be much easier to get Anthony convicted for the crime, not only on account of certain ugly facts bearing heavily against him, but because Sleuth was ready to render, either openly or covertly, aid and sustenance while the work was being performed. Bob might have even owned, if compelled to speak, that he was not at all sure but that Anthony was the murderer; though, if so, then he was quite certain that Sleuth had had his own secret reasons for fear, which Bob concluded was about the property.

Sleuth saw his state, and at last said:

"Besides what I have told you, I will place at once in my friend's hands a thousand pounds, to help you in your inquiries, whether about this or about Esau, whose history I shall myself make known to the doctor. So you will only have to go to him in a sober state, and looking as respectable as you can make yourself, and you will find yourself liberally dealt with. These are arrangements, Bob, which will rather improve your case on the trial, if it should come out——"

"And yours, too, Mister Sleuth! By the Lord, you're a deep 'un!"

"Bob, you mistake the conscious dignity of innocence for——"

"Can you give us summat to go on with?" demanded Bob, rudely interrupting an eloquent sentence.

"Yes, if you will tell the doctor I have given it merely for present necessities."

"Mister Sleuth ain't artful—not a bit on it! What a pal you'd a bin, Mister Sleuth, if I'd only had the luck to have got hold on yer afore you left that medical shop!"

"I repeat——" began Sleuth.

"No, don't; for sich——gammon always makes me sick."

"How will you proceed?"

"Go to this Doctor Pomp——"

"Doctor Pompess. Right. Be there to-morrow morning at eleven. I will see him in the interim."

Bob wondered now what Sleuth waited for, and why he did not give him the money he had promised. Sleuth had his purse in his hand, and was playing with the gold pieces in it, as if counting them over and over again; in fact he was cogitating over a secret difficulty, that must be cleared up before Bob left."

"Bob, you remember that piece of paper you gave me, fancying it was of such great value?"

"Considering I axed ten thousand pounds for it, and was able to cry, 'Sold agin, and got the money!' I should rather think I do."

"It's very odd," said Sleuth, with a sickly smile, "you should so forget yourself. Didn't you give me a receipt for that ten thousand, saying it was for Esau?"

"Yes, when you axed me to hexchange one receipt for another."

"Bob, I don't remember that."

"No, Mister Sleuth?"

"No," said Sleuth, mildly, and staring Bob full in the face long enough to give the right kind of idea; then the eyelids quivered a little, and the face turned away. "It's a pity, Bob, you are so little alive to the facts of the case, even when they are all in your favor."

"Eh?"

"Are they not so? Suppose you have to appear on the trial, and you are asked if it be true that the burglars gave you a codicil, and that you gave it to me, and received ten thousand pounds for it, and then my receipt is produced—don't you see you'll be convicted out of your own mouth, and that you'll be doing your best to smash your own case in other respects?"

"And yourn, Mister Sleuth! Don't forget that."

"If I acknowledged to have received such a codicil, undoubtedly it would and ought to damage me; but if I say, as I shall, and conscientiously—[Bob whistled]—that the paper you gave me was of no value whatever, and that I destroyed it immediately, it's only you and your character that will be in danger."

"Why, Mister Sleuth, now I remember, you did tear it up; and threw the bits about afore my werry eyes!"

"You remember?"

"O' coorse I do!"

"I am very glad. Here, Bob, here's twenty pounds for you. And as to the date of that paper——"

"Oh, I shan't remember!" Bob interjected.

"But the burglars?"

"They don't remember. I found that out through the guv'nor in the prison."

"What, did he know?" asked the alarmed Sleuth.

"Yes; the men told him they thought as the paper as they gev to me——"

"Told that, too?" asked the now agitated Sleuth.

"Yes; but I didn't want to go too far, ye see, Mister Sleuth, in putting them on the scent agin you; so I made light on it, while keepin' the matter open in my own mind!"

"But now?"

"It's clean done with. I stick to my receipt and to you, Mister Sleuth."

"Don't spare the cash, Bob," said Sleuth, and that was his only reply; "the doctor shall supply you amply."

"All right, Mister Sleuth."

"Anything fresh the matter, Bob?"

"No. I'm only a looking at yer. I never seed sich afore, and never looks to see sich agin!"

"You're going, then, and will, I suppose, soon—soon take measures for—for——"

"Grabbing him! Won't I?"

"No violence, Bob! It would be very unfortunate if, through any mistake of yours, fancying he were going to run, or anything of that sort, you or your companions were to fire and hurt him. It would be a great calamity, Bob, and your conscience would never get over it, if you were hasty for the sake of securing the reward, and of having no more questions and difficulties to go through."

"Mister Sleuth, if that's your game, I tell you once for all, I ain't up to it. My pals used to say as I was chicken-hearted when things came to the push. Don't know, I'm sure. Somehow, I ain't bin frightened of you. But I won't meddle that way with him. Take your davey o' that!"

"Bob, it is most painful to talk to you. The very things you want to do, you think I don't want. The very things I don't want to do, you persuade yourself I do want to do. No matter. I am thankful, very thankful, if I have elicited from you what I wanted—full security that my cousin shall be sacredly guarded, while my position with him is so equivocal. You won't understand me, Bob; but all I want is to do the right thing, both to myself and to Mr. Anthony Maude."

"Well, I ain't a-goin' to touch him, or let him be touched. You looks forrad, Mister Sleuth, so does I. Others may be hit, and then live, arter all, and make it awkward for yer."

"Don't, I beg you—don't! I keep on begging you to be especially careful he does not receive any injury."

"Oh, I know all about it, and all about you, Mister Sleuth. You'd forgive me now, wouldn't yer, if I did, with the best o' intentions, make a mistake?"

"Bob, I really have no more to say."

"Will yer shake hands?"

"Will I?—certainly. There!"

The two men took hands, and Bob looked harder than ever into Sleuth's eyes, which met his with tolerable equanimity, Sleuth remaining silent.

"Talk of spinxes! They should stick Mister Sleuth o' top of a big stone, and there they just would have a summut to ax questions on, and to get aggrawatin' answers from. Well, good mornin', Mister Sleuth. We'd best not appear too friendly, I suppose?"

"I rely on your prudence and sagacity, Bob, in everything, and you may rely on me."

And so they parted; and so Anthony's fate was decided on.

CHAPTER LXIV.—A DEPRESSED MOOD.

CLARISSA was again at the river bank, and wondered at her own dejection of spirit. The scene was as beautiful as ever; the flow of the water as suggestive of the eternal freshness of natural life, where the bubbles seemed to come dancing out of the current, make a circling tour to reach her feet, and whisper to her, "Come! come!" and then reluctantly pass away at last into the flow as before.

It was so long that she had watched and waited. The measure of weeks had slowly changed into the measure of months, and then of years, and still was inadequate. Anthony was living at no great distance, she had heard, was doing well as a man of business, and that was all she knew—for he did not come to tell her any more.

It was true that she had herself, in a compromise with her father, caused all correspondence and personal communication to cease; but then she and Anthony had alike understood that the cessation was for a time only, and till he could create new claims to her father's favor.

But to-day some not altogether inexplicable presentiment of evil overhangs her, and makes her wonder at her own childish tears and folly. That letter from the governor—what does it portend? If the burglars did not kill the old man, who did? She shrinks, even in thought, from pressing home that question. But she cannot avoid thinking of the grave looks of her father, who has cautiously maintained the deepest silence ever since the receipt of the letter; and Clarissa cannot but fancy he means that in kindness to her. But why? She almost passionately resents the answer that at times will spring up. It is because he thinks Anthony compromised.

The matter must go on. She sees that. Anthony, like Sleuth, will have to appear and see what it means. Will he come here—to her father's house—on such business? How dreadful if that should be the occasion of their first interview after such a separation!

What is it that can affect Anthony? She knows only of the discovery of the codicil which so suddenly deprived him of the estate, and of the pencil marks on the back, said to be Anthony's own, but which he passionately denied. She did not simply believe him with her whole soul, she felt it as an outrage that all other persons were not of the same mind. What if the fact seemed to show he might have had possession of the codicil at the time of the alderman's death, and took advantage of the death to conceal the fatal document? Might not the man who really did kill the alderman, have also fraudulently concealed the codicil where Anthony should find it, being himself afraid of its discovery in any other way?

She started up with an impetuous, agitated gesture, to hurry to her father and suggest this thought to him—though she soon slackened her pace, as she saw that there could but be one man to whom such a remark could apply, and that the doctor would not only esteem her prejudiced against Sleuth if she made it, but possibly resist the thought itself if it came to him in that unpleasant shape.

While she lingered a little in the garden, thinking over how she could best manage him—for she saw too plainly the critical nature of the issue—she saw Sleuth pass along a graveled walk not far off. Slightly drawing back against a tree, she was able to watch him for a few seconds, while herself barely perceptible. She had never seen him look so absorbed. Doubtless he had looked well about him before this, and seeing no one, had given way to the mood. He stopped once abruptly. He stood still. Then, as if he were inventing some excuse for the benefit of casual spectators, he looked at his watch, appeared satisfied, and went on.

"What was he thinking of," Clarissa asked, "when he stopped so suddenly?" And Anthony's fate, by some inscrutable process of her mind, seemed to be henceforth inextricably mingled in her thoughts with that pause of hesitation—as if the actor were on the threshold of a tremendous event which might be yet modified or changed.

When she thought he had got into the house, she herself advanced, and entered by a different door.

Clarissa possessed on the ground-floor a little room, too unambitious to be called a boudoir, but that yet was in itself a charming room, and very dear to its mistress. There was not a handsome piece of furniture, no gilding, no ordinary knickknackeries; but there was a harp, and a piano, and a bird-cage, and a basket of plants in full bloom at the window, and there were low, easy-chairs and couches, covered simply in pure Holland.

This room was just opposite her father's room. She passed rapidly into it, and then, with a quick breath, pushed the door a little to, and listened. Listened for voices in the room opposite. She heard them, low, distant-sounding, mysterious.

Could she go to them? No; she felt that was quite out of the question.

Still she listened, hoping some one word—some one phrase, louder than the rest, would reach her.

No. Only the same low, distant, mysterious sounds, which bore to her excited fancy she knew not what of horrible fear and suggestion.

The door opened. She heard then the doctor saying distinctly, though, she thought, in a voice full of awe and agitation:

"You say you cannot. I will not; but Mr. [she missed the name] will, I dare say, do all that is required."

Suddenly the door was closed, and Clarissa rather guessed than knew it was Sleuth who had shut it—as if conscious of listeners; but that it was only for a moment, while some point was still in debate. Not only was it reopened, but Sleuth came out, called a servant, and gave his orders in a low tone of voice.

Repressing the scorn with which Clarissa ever noticed Mr. Sleuth's little familiarities in this way—for she knew the doctor rather encouraged them, without, perhaps, intending to do so—she determined, if Sleuth gave her an opportunity, to go immediately to the doctor, and learn what was going on.

But Sleuth, as if afraid of her proximity and wishes, kept so near, even while executing the commission the doctor seemed to have given him, that she could only wait in feverish impatience—standing just behind her slightly opened door—feeling that minute by minute something was going on of which she ought to know—which, possibly, she ought to stop; but feeling, also, her utter powerlessness both of will and of the knowledge what it were best to do. The weight of a cruel destiny seemed to press upon her brain with a severity that increased every moment, and yet she knew not how to throw it off.

Sleuth returned to the doctor when he had done the business in hand. And just as she began again painfully to listen for the low, distant, mysterious voices, she also heard the sharper sounds of the clattering of a horse's hoofs in the stable-yard. The man was off somewhere in hot haste.

She must go in, if only to look at their faces, and try if some chance word might not relieve her of this dread oppression. Again and again she lifts her hand to draw back the door, but again and again stops, as if warned by a secret instinct she would at present do harm rather than good—that her time for interference had not come.

What an hour was that which ensued before the return of the servant! As she expected, he returned not alone. Her heart gave a great leap, as it were, as she heard the voice in the hall of her father's poor-law opponent, but brother magistrate, Mr. Macguire.

"They are meeting in council," she murmured to herself. "Yes, I understand. There are now three magistrates. The thing is too serious for one. Ah, no! Child that I was! I see all now. It is against Anthony they move. Oh, my God, Anthony! Sleuth dares not attack thee openly—my father is too kind, in spite of his dislike to do it—and so Mr. Macguire comes to finish the unholy business. But stop! He has no friend here but me. I must be calm, thoughtful, not excited, not agitated, not weeping woman's tears. Oh, Anthony! Anthony! Anthony!"

Again the low, distant, mysterious voices, which had now, through the presence of the new voice, a kind of roll pervading them, which Clarissa could not help likening to the muffled sounds she had heard in the playing of the "Dead March in Saul."

Another half hour of the most exquisite misery before she could hear aright anything to guide her as to the course of events. Then the door opened, and Mr. Macguire and her father came out, the latter very warmly thanking the former for his so promptly answering the appeal, and the former laughing a loud burly laugh at the doctor's allusion to their occasional tussels at the meeting of the overseers for the poor.

Perhaps now she might get a word from her father before he returned. She stood ready, intending to beckon to him, and instantly close the door, so that Sleuth might not notice her action; but he pushed the door of the doctor's room wide, and strode to and fro until the doctor returned to him, and again the two were alone.

She found it impossible to listen now. Sleuth could not long remain. She went to the piano, and sounded a few chords, but they were so wild that she listened to them as she fancied the doctor and Sleuth would listen; but whatever they heard or thought, they took no notice, and she had still to wait.

But at last she heard the exchange of parting salutations, and, though she did control her footsteps until Sleuth's footsteps were crunching down the gravel outside, she then flew across the space between the two doors, and, in an instant after, was confronting the doctor.

Face to face—it was an awful moment. Hardly did either of the two need to speak, so terribly eloquent in their pallid bloodlessness were both countenances.

"It is——" she began.

"Yes, Clarissa, it is a warrant that has been issued for the apprehension of Mr. Anthony Maude for murder."

BARON ROTHSCHILD once complained to Lord Brougham of the hardship of not being allowed to take his seat in parliament. "You know," said he, "I was the choice of the people."

To which the ex-chancellor, with his usual causticity, replied:

"So was Barabbas."

THE GRAVE OF POWHATAN, IN THE GROUNDS OF MR. MAYO, RICHMOND VA.

THE GRAVE OF POWHATAN.

On the grounds of Mr. Mayo, a few miles from Richmond, Va., is a stone, marked by reliable traditions as the grave of the great Indian Chief Powhatan, the father of Pocahontas, she from whose blood the F. F. V's boast that they inherit their aristocracy and fire.

The stone is simply an oval, without inscription, but bearing about it all the marks of having been placed there to mark the grave of a chief by the Indians. Over it has been erected the latticed house represented in the engraving, and to it thousands make their pilgrimages, anxious to see the spot where lie the remains of the great chief who made so prominent a mark in the history of his time, and about whom so much of romance and history clings.

MADAME PFEIFFER AND THE NEGRO.

The honors of successful enterprise have not been entirely monopolized by the male sex; but few women travelers have undertaken distant and perilous journeys on sea and land with such courage and perseverance as were displayed by the heroic Anna Pfeiffer, a Viennese lady. This extraordinary woman appears to have been inspired with an insatiable thirst for visiting foreign lands, and for exploring countries unknown or little civilized. The wife of a Polish advocate, it was not until she had reached the age of forty-five years that she found herself, by the completion of the education of her children and their establishment in life, free to undertake her long-cherished designs. It was then that she began to mature the plan for her first long journey, which she determined to accomplish alone.

Her means were exceedingly small, but she says in her diary: "I resolved to practice the strictest economy. Privation and discomforts had no terrors for me. I had endured them long enough compulsorily, and I reflected that they would be much easier to bear if I encountered them voluntarily, and with an object in view."

When she imparted to her friends her intention of visiting Jerusalem, she was regarded as simply a crazy enthusiast, and few thought her to be in earnest in the matter.

Nevertheless, she kept her resolution, and, in the year 1842, visited Jerusalem and other principal cities of the Holy Land; and, having journeyed as far as the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea, returned by way of Egypt, the Mediterranean, and Italy, to Vienna, where she was induced to publish her diary, under the title of "Journey of a Viennese Lady to the Holy Land." Though as yet Madame Pfeiffer's travels related only to well-trodden paths, the work attracted much attention, and, what was more important to her, provided her with a moderate sum with which to undertake new journeys.

Madame Pfeiffer now began to study languages, and to endeavor to obtain such an acquaintance with botany as would render her observations of foreign countries useful to the world. In 1845 she landed on the coast of Iceland, and traversed the island in every direction, visiting the Geysers and other hot springs, and ascending Mount Hecla, which shortly afterward broke out into eruption. Her narrative of this journey was published in two volumes, under the title of "A Voyage to the Scandinavian North and the Island of Iceland;" and the copies of the copyright, and of the sale of the geological and botanical specimens collected during this tour, again furnishing her with funds, she resolved to make a voyage round the world, a feat probably never before undertaken by a European lady alone.

"Greater privations and fatigues than I had encountered in Syria and Iceland," she remarks in her diary, "I could scarcely have to encounter. The expense did not alarm me, for I knew from experience how little is necessary if the traveler will but practice the strictest economy. My savings amounted to a sum barely sufficient, perhaps, to serve such travelers as Chateaubriand or Lamartine for a fortnight's excursion; but it appeared to me ample for a journey of two or three years, and the result showed that I had calculated correctly."

Madame Pfeiffer embarked from Hamburg in a sailing-vessel, in June, 1846, and reached Rio Janeiro after a voyage of three months. From that port, she made many excursions into the interior of the country, on one of which she met with an adventure which had nearly brought her wanderings to a premature close. Having arrived at Porta d'Estrella, she was anxious to visit Petropolis, a colony founded by Germans, of which she had heard much, and which was situated at only twenty-seven leagues' distance. The journey was generally performed upon mules, but, as she had been informed in Rio that the roads afforded a beautiful walk, traversing magnificent woods, she determined to go on foot, accompanied by Count Berchtold, a traveling companion who had taken a part in these excursions, particularly as the count was desirous of collecting botanical specimens, while Madame Pfeiffer was equally bent upon collecting insects. The first eight miles lay through a broad valley, covered with thick brambles and shrubs and surrounded with lofty mountains.

After passing through this valley they reached the serra, as the Brazilians term the summit of each mountain that they cross, the present one being three thousand feet high. They now entered the luxuriant virgin forest, where they obtained an abundant harvest of flowers, plants, and insects, and loitered along, enchanted with the magnificent woods and not less beautiful views which stretched over hill and dale toward the sea and its innumerable bays. Frequent troops of mules driven by blacks, as well as occasional pedestrians, which they met, eased their minds of every fear, and prevented their regarding it as all remarkable that they were being continually followed by a negro. Suddenly, however, as they arrived at a lonely spot the man sprang forward, holding in one hand a long knife and in the other a lasso, or cord, with which the South Americans are in the habit of catching wild cattle, and, by gestures and words, made the travelers understand that he intended to murder, and then drag them into the forest.

Unfortunately the two travelers had no arms, for they had been assured that the road was perfectly safe; and the only weapons they possessed were their carmen-sun-shades or parasols, and a small clasp-knife, which Madame Pfeiffer instantly drew out of her pocket and opened, fully determined to sell her life as dearly as possible. They parried their adversary's blows as long as they could. In the struggle he dropped his knife, which rolled a few steps from him. Madame Pfeiffer instantly made a dash and thought she had grasped it, when the negro, more quick than her, thrust her away with his feet and hands, and once more obtained possession of the weapon. He then waved it furiously over his head, and dealt her two wounds, a thrust and a deep gash, both in the upper part of the left arm. She now thought she was lost; despair alone gave her the courage to use her own knife. She made a thrust at her adversary's breast, which he warded off, and she only succeeded in wounding him severely in the hand, but at the same time falling herself to the ground. At this point the count, who was entirely unarmed, sprang forward, and seizing the man from behind, afforded his companion an opportunity of rising.

The affair had occupied but a few seconds, and the fury of their assailant was now roused to the highest pitch by the wounds he had received. He gnashed his teeth at them like a wild beast, and flourished his knife with terrible rapidity. Meanwhile the count had received a serious cut across the hand, and the travelers were beginning to regard themselves as lost, when happily the tramp of horses' hoofs met their ear, and the negro left them, and sprang into the wood.

Immediately afterwards two horsemen turned a corner of the road, and hastened toward them. Their wounds, which were bleeding freely, and the hacked and broken condition of their sun-shades, soon made them understand the position of affairs. They asked which direction the fugitive had taken, and, springing to their horses, hurried after him. The man was soon captured though not without a struggle, and carried home to Petropolis, where his crime met its due punishment. Madame Pfeiffer and her companion were enabled, by the assistance of their deliverers, to get their wounds dressed, and afterward continued their journey.

From Rio the adventurous lady sailed round Cape Horn, and landed at Valparaiso. From thence she visited the island of Otaheite, and was presented to the celebrated Queen Pomare. While here she made excursions over the entire island, and ascended some of its loftiest mountains, being attired for her journeys in men's shoes without any stockings, trowsers, and a blouse fastened up at the hips. From Otaheite, or Tahiti, as it is now called, she sailed for Canton, and spent much time in observing the manners of the Chinese, into whose country she penetrated with a daring, perhaps, never before displayed by a European lady.

Her next places of visit were the island of Ceylon and Bombay, from which latter country she set out on an arduous journey through Persia and Mesopotamia, an account of which was published in her third work, entitled "A Woman's Journey Round the World." She had now determined to settle down in Vienna; but the sale of her journal and collections, and a grant of about £150 from the Austrian Government, having furnished her again with funds, her restless love of adventure soon revived, and she set out on a third ocean journey. This time she visited the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, and Singapore, and landed on the coast of Borneo, where she made an excursion among the savage Dyaks. Subsequently she visited a number of islands in the Indian Archipelago, and once more traversed the Pacific for more than ten thousand miles, to California.

Her next travels were in Peru, the United States, and Canada. The experiences of this great tour were narrated in her "Second Journey Round the World," published in Vienna in 1856. Her last journey was to Madagascar, where she met with some singular adventures, having become accidentally involved in a conspiracy to overthrow the power of the infamous Queen Ranavola, for which she was banished from the island. This journey unfortunately proved fatal to her, for the Madagascan intermittent fever, which she caught in the island, pursued her after her return to Vienna, in which city she died, on the 27th of October, 1858.

MADAME PFEIFFER AND THE NEGRO.

THE LATE JACOB STRAWN, OF JACKSONVILLE, ILL.

JACOB STRAWN,

The Illinois Farmer.

JACOB STRAWN, of Jacksonville, Illinois, died lately, at his home, in that place. Starting in farming and cattle buying at an early age, with a capital of 50 cents in silver, Mr. Strawn came to be the king farmer of the West. His acres spread over almost whole counties, and it was no unusual thing for him to sow a field of wheat or plant corn over a space twice the size of a German kingdom. He had sheep and kine upon a thousand hills—or would have had, if the hills had been there. He built pretty much the whole of the village of Jacksonville; he represented his district in the Legislature, where he was noted for direct and available good sense, and in all positions filled the ideas of a good citizen. His "little garden patch," at the time of his death, embraced nearly 35,000 acres, worth at least $1,500,000, without improvements. He was twice married, and leaves seven sons and one daughter. In person he was a Daniel Lambert, weighing about 350 pounds. During the war he was an active and liberal friend and supporter of the Union cause.

Many interesting incidents have been related respecting him, among which are the following: He began life for himself by raising 16 acres of wheat, which he traded for 16 steers, which he sold at a profit. After this he dealt mainly in cattle. He was a rapid talker, and a keen judge of human nature, a prompt actor, knew how to drive a bargain, and always made money. He seldom came to town, was busy every moment, and was always in the field or in the saddle, going from place to place.

Until within a few years he was his own accountant and his own banker; and, strange as it may seem, kept no books, trusting entirely to his memory, which never failed him. In physical labor he excelled in every department. With a cradle on hand sickle he has been known to reap, bind and shock 60 dozen bundles of wheat in a day. Farmers will understand this to be what not more than one man in a thousand could perform. In earlier days he carried large sums of money upon his person, and on several occasions his life was attempted as he rode alone through the country. At one time, near Alton, he was attacked by three robbers, whom he thrashed and put to flight with his cattle whip. He was a man of wonderful muscle and activity. He could spring over the highest fence by merely placing one hand on the top rail, and on one occasion he caught an infuriated bull by the horns, who was charging on him in an open field, and, throwing him down by mere force, completely subdued the animal.

THE WEB AND WEAVER OF NYASSA.

DR. LIVINGSTONE who, without doubt, was strongly influenced in his African travels by the desire to find cotton, thus writes of the cotton and weavers of Nyassa, on the Zambesi: "It makes stronger cloth; many of the people prefer it to the foreign cotton; the third variety is not found here. It was remarked to a number of men near the Shire Lakelet, a little further on toward Nyassa, 'You should plant plenty of cotton, and probably the English will come and buy it.' 'Truly,' replied a far-traveled Babisa leader to his fellows, 'the country is full of cotton, and if these people come to buy, they will enrich us.' Our own observation on the cotton cultivated, convinced us that this was no empty flourish, but a fact. Everywhere we met with it, and scarcely ever entered a village, without finding a number of men cleaning, spinning, and weaving. It is first carefully separated from the seed by the fingers, or by an iron cylinder, on a little block of wood, and rove out into long soft bands without twist. Then it receives its first twist on the spindle, and becomes about the thickness of coarse candle-wick; after being taken off and wound into a large ball, it is given the final hard twist, and spun into a firm cop on the spindle again; all the processes being painfully slow."

NATIVE WEB, AND WEAVER SMOKING THE HUGE TOBACCO PIPE OF NYASSA, AFRICA.

THE VOLCANO OF KILAUEA.

THE volcano of Kilauea, situated on the Hawaiian Islands, is the largest in the world. Its crater is about three miles in diameter, or nine miles in circumference, and varies in depth from eight to ten hundred feet. Unlike other craters, it is not on the summit of a mountain, but is on the slope of Mouna Loa, at an elevation of 4,000 feet, the mountain itself being nearly 14,000 feet in height, its summit crowned with perpetual snow, although within the torrid zone.

The crater is on a kind of high table-land, or plateau. A black ledge of hardened lava, from 600 to 2,000 feet in width, surrounds it, at a depth of 660 feet, and the bottom is occupied by a surging lake of liquid fire, over which hangs a cloud, silvery by day and glowing red by night.

Vapors and steam escape from numerous apertures; and even in times, when the fires are comparatively at rest, masses of red-hot matter are every now and then cast up to the height of 60 or 70 feet. The crater, though surrounded by huge fissures and steam cracks, can easily be approached to its very edge on horseback. The traveler suddenly finds himself upon the brink of a yawning abyss 1,000 feet deep, where he looks down, as it were, into the very mouth of hell. In 1840 the whole bottom of the crater was one mass of molten lava—a lake of fire nine miles in circumference! But, usually, the bottom of the crater is solid black lava, with the exception of two or three lakes, varying in size from 100 to 500 feet in diameter. The surfaces of these minor craters, within the mammoth crater, are constantly changing; sometimes being 200 or 300 feet below the general level, and sometimes building up miniature mountains, cones from 100 to 200 feet high.

On the edge of the large crater, a small native hut, called the Volcano House, has been erected, for the convenience of travelers, where they usually spend a night, watching the volcanic fires beneath them. They obtain their drinking water from the drippings of the steam-cracks near by, and cook their victuals, as represented in our engraving, by simply placing them over the heated steam as it issues from the fissures. The width of some of these chasms is 40 or 50 feet, and an idea of their immense depth can be obtained from the experiments, often tried by travelers, of rolling large stones into them. The boulders will be heard to bound, crashing from side to side, for some minutes, till the reverberations die away in the distance, the stone never seeming to reach bottom.

CRATER OF THE VOLCANO KILAUEA, SANDWICH ISLANDS, WITH NATIVES COOKING BY THE STEAM FROM THE FISSURES OF THE ROCK.

Having spent a night upon the brink of the crater, travelers usually start early the next morning, and, by the help of Hawaiian guides, pick their perilous way down the steep ascent into the crater, passing on their road the Sulphur Banks (where may be seen the most magnificent crystals, some of them two or three feet long, but far too fragile to be preserved), till at length they reach the solid bottom. They then walk over the jagged floor of lava, now hard and cold, for about two miles, when they come to

The Lake of Liquid Fire.

This crater within a crater is represented in our second engraving. It is about 200 feet in diameter, and 150 feet deep. The surface of the lake within is in a constant state of agitation, sometimes bubbling and boiling like a caldron, sometimes building up small cones, which spit out volcanic glass, spun into filaments fine as the soldier's web, and called by the Hawaiians "Pele's hair"—Ana'a pele. At other times, the whole surface of the lake, having become solid to the depth of three or four feet, will suddenly be broken up by the violence of subterranean fires, which cause the whole region to tremble, and the huge slabs of lava, like cakes of ice, being rolled over by the waves of fire, will melt away as snow-flakes vanish on the water. The grandeur of the scene beggars description.

There was an eruption on another part of Mouna Loa in 1855, which, in thirteen months, sent its fiery streams of desolation over an area estimated at 300 square miles. In 1859 another eruption broke out on the south-western slope of the mountain, near the edge of the snow. From this the molten stream ran down into the ocean, 40 miles distant, in eight days, destroying a fishing village, which happened to be in its path. The waters were so greatly heated, that the fishes were cooked for miles around.

A PARISIAN STORY.

How an English Woman Married a French Marquis.

A CORRESPONDENCE Paris correspondent relates the annexed French story of a recent marriage in Paris:

Nobody talks about anything now, except the strange marriage of the Marquis of C—— to an English woman, somewhat ripe, it is true, but we add, par parenthèse, possessed of a fortune sufficient to change into lilies and roses her somewhat passé face, and convert her into a dulcina not less charming than she of the knight of La Mancha.

But that which gives piquancy to the affair is a little history connected with their antecedents, and of which the following is an epitome:

It appears that the rich Anglaise came to Paris last winter, in regal style, and with a determination to give away her hand and heart to a gentleman, young and titled—an idea that had been ripening in her mind for a long time, on account of the lack of a powerful ally, money, in the shape of an enormous heritage which ought to have arrived from the East Indies, but which did not.

It is easy to say that when it did come, there was no lack of suitors for the hand of the grand (although passé) Anglaise. She soon had numerous lovers, but she had already given her heart to young Marquis C——, whom she had seen in the "grand monde." Unhappily for her flame, he paid no regard to the attentions of the rich quadragenarian—pretty women and cards taking up all his time and attention.

The Marquis was about twenty-five years old, and possessed of a fortune of somewhat over a half million of francs, which enabled him to live handsomely without hunting for her millions. But nothing is so tenacious as an old English woman, and in order to bring the object of her passion to her feet, she made use of a most singular expedient.

She followed him to a watering-place, where the "game" was going on. She well knew that clubs and spades sometimes "held the age" over the handsomest brunette, or fairest blonde, in a young man's heart; in fact, she knew that the marquis gamed deeply, and on this knowledge built her plans. She let the marquis establish a "table de jeu," without appearing to notice him in any way; then, after he was well into the whirl of "rouge et noir," wishing to attack this "insensible" through his "darling sin," she invited one day, to her house, one of those "Greeks," which are met everywhere at the green table, and who conceal their ignoble calling under a varnish of dandyism, of eloquence, and even instruction, which serves to deceive sometimes even the most suspicious.

"Monsieur," said she, "I know who you are, and your profession; I have found out who you are—no matter how. Here are my proofs of your profession. You know I can ruin you if I wish."

The "Greek" had no need of further proof than the word of l'Anglaise to convince him that he was at her mercy. "Now, I can ruin you," she said, "if I wish, but if you will only serve me in a little affair, I will not do so."

"Speak, madame," answered he; "I am at your service."

"Do you know Monsieur le Marquis de C——?" coolly asked l'Anglaise.

"Yes, madame," answered the Greek, with a low bow.

"I wish you to entrap him into play, (no difficulty about that, you know), and win from him, not only the amount of money he has on him, no small sum, as a general thing, but at least 500,000 francs, which is about his whole fortune."

VOLCANO OF KILAUEA AT NIGHT, HONOLULU, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The "Greek," stupified, reflected an instant, and then a diabolical smile passed over his countenance. "I understand! you wish that I should win 600,000 francs and divide with you?" The proud Anglaise betrayed a movement of indignation, and then said, in the most disdainful tone: "Vi donc! Look out for yourself alone! But understand me, if the Marquis escapes from your hands without being ruined, I ruin you forever, here and elsewhere. In a word, I will publish all that I know of you—now allez!"

She took leave of him with a superb bow.

The gambler took leave of her with a mixed feeling of pleasure and uneasiness. He was uneasy at the idea of those papers being in other hand, and pleased at the idea of a "pigeon." In truth, I cannot begin to describe you our "Greek's" feelings; but before three days, he had succeeded to get on the most intimate terms with the Marquis, and in a couple of days more, the pair spent the night soirée en tapis vert; and then, of course, every succeeding night in the apartments of one or the other. In short, at the end of a month, the fortune dotted to the "Greek" was completely absorbed; and at the end of two months there remained not a shadow of it.

Meanwhile, while this poor fool was being thus fleeced, our Anglaise took good care to show off her riches to the plucked one. She talked to him of the millions that she had inherited, of her rank, and dazzled his eyes with her diamonds, rubies, sapphires, and God knows what. At last she played her game so well, that the poor fool was reduced to extremities, wound up by opening his ears and closing his eyes—accepted the hand of our heroine and all her riches.

The union was determined upon, and soon Le Madeleine received the "happy pair." The Marquis did not wish any invitations. The Anglaise did, and all Paris was invited and went.

HOW TO MAKE COFFEE.

BARON LIEBIG has published a practical essay on coffee-making, in which he asserts roundly that people at large do not get half the amount of essential coffee they ought to do from the bean as generally treated. He affirms that the aroma of coffee depends primarily on the roasting. This operation should be continued only until the bean or berry has lost its horny condition, so that it may be ground, or what is better, pounded to powder. Now as coffee contains a crystalline and volatile matter named coffeine, which gives coffee its flavor and sustaining qualities, care must be taken to retain it. By exposure to the air it escapes. Hence ground coffee rapidly loses its aroma and value, and the porosity of the roasted berries assists on a nice determination. Hence the baron recommends that powdered-white, or brown sugar be strewn over the berries when the roasting is just completed, and while they are still hot. When so strewed, the melted sugar will spread over the berries, forming a coating or varnish impervious to air, which will confine the aroma and retain the caffeine, until the time for the ground for use.

Of the three processes of making coffee, by dittation, infusion, and boiling, the baron inclines to the first, and that about three-fourths of the ground coffee to be used should be boiled for 15 or 20 minutes, and the remaining fourth put in, and the whole allowed to stand, covered, for from five to six minutes. This makes the best coffee.

For journeys and marches, where it is impossible to be burdened with machines for roasting and grinding, coffee may be carried in powder, and the baron recommends preparation prepared by the following process. One pound of the roasted coffee-berries in fine powder add immediately the melted sugar and water obtained by pouring two ounces of sugar in the essence of water, and permitting them to stand for a few minutes. When the powder is thoroughly wetted with the syrup, the cakes of finely-powdered sugar are to be added, mixed well with it, and the whole dried again in the oven. The sugar locks up the volatile parts of the coffee. If coffee is now to be made, cold water is to be poured over a certain quantity of the powder, and made to boil. Prepared this way, the powder may be preserved in perfect condition for a long time.

The traveler and soldier knows the value of good coffee, and any sound hints for its preparation will be welcomed and treasured by connoisseurs.

FACES ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

AFTER the battle of Inkermann the faces of many of the dead still wore a smile, while that of the threatening expression. Some lay stretched on their backs, as if friendly hands had prepared their burial. Some were still resting on one knee, their hands grasping their muskets. In some instances the cartridge remained between the teeth, or the musket was held in one hand, and the other was uplifted, as though to ward off a blow or appealing to heaven. The faces of all were pale as though cut in marble. A wound across the battle-field, it waved the hair, and gave the bodies such an appearance of life that a spectator could hardly help thinking they were about to rise to continue the fight.

Another surprise, describing the appearance of the corpses on the field of Magenta, says that they furnish indisputable proof that man may receive a wound without suffering the least pain. Those struck on the head generally lay with their faces on the ground, their limbs retaining the position they were in at the instant they were struck, and most of these still held their rifles, showing that when a ball strikes the brain it causes such a sudden contraction of the muscles that there is not time for the hand to relax its grasp of the weapon before death.

Another peculiarity observed in the case of those who were wounded in the brain, was the endeavors to withdraw with their dead, even when aware of the risk of danger. During the battle of Solferino, a riflemen was wounded in the head by a ball which passed through the skull and buried itself in the brain. His comrades saw and heard, and he was carried off, but with his head resting on his knapsack, like his wounded companion. He relieved the ball on the road, and fainted and chatted about his wound almost with indifference, as he filled his pipe and lay smoking. A few minutes before he had finished it, death came upon him, and he was found lying in the same attitude, with his head between his teeth. He had never uttered a cry, or given any sign that he was in pain. Those on the field where the ball had entered the heart, nearly the same appearance were presented as in the case of those who had been struck in the brain; death was what we termed instantaneous, but it was not quite so swift as in the former case; there was generally time for a movement in the act of dying.

There was a Zouave, who had been struck full in the breast; he was lying on his side, the bayonet was free, and pointing in such a way as showed that he was in the act of charging when struck. His head was uplifted, and his countenance still bore a threatening appearance, as if he had merely stumbled and fell. His head was in the act of rising again. Close by him lay an Austrian foot-soldier, with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, who had fallen in the act of praying. Another foot-soldier had fallen dead as he was in the act of fighting; his feet were closed, one arm was in the act of warding at a blow, and the other was drawn back in the act of striking. On another battle-field several French soldiers lay in a line, with their bayonets pointing in the direction of the enemy's advance—just as against, when a storm of grape mowed them down.

THE EMPEROR OF FRANCE AND THE HACKMEN.

THE Government has resolved the question raised by the petition presented to the Emperor by the hackdrivers of Paris, and which we noticed at the time. The Company of the Petites Voitures will no longer enjoy a monopoly, and anybody will be henceforth free to set up a hackney-coach. The monopoly, as I have mentioned, is abolished without loss to the Company. The decision of the Emperor has created universal delight with the Parisians. The civil authorities certainly did their best to regulate the monopoly, so that the public should not suffer from it; but nonsense will be nonsense, and in the case of the hackney-carriages it was true to its nonsense. Every coachman who obtained the Licence Lucratif marked the facility with which a cab is procured there in any weather, affording a strong contrast with the difficulty of finding such a vehicle on a rainy day in Paris. The fault was attributed to the authorities, who are reckoned accountable for the bad management of the monopolies they establish. Henceforth the public will know that it has only itself to blame for the arrival of a shower of rain, the Government is not to blame.

There is scarcely a doubt but that the increased facility and convenience will be as remarkable in public cabs, when free trade is established in the trade, as it has proved, moreover, that there will be more vehicles on the streets, and that the drivers will be more ready to accommodate their customers, when there is a smart competition. The necessity of the numbers and the responsibility of establishing public vehicles may be made a pretext for diverting public attention from the attack against the Government; but these fears, real or pretended, have been overruled by the Imperial will.

The encouragement which the superior authorities are about to give by this act to the practical exercise of industrial calling and private initiative, will have the merit of being opportune in the midst of the efforts to serve the acts of many local authorities. Pretexts and mayors, ministers, or supreme chiefs, society, and the public good, frequently cause decrees which destroy even the very shadow of liberty. The municipal authorities of Lodeve, for example, published an ordinance, some time ago, which prohibited the hiring out of a horse or ass, or the hire of a cart during the vintage. The Mayor of Montpellier, by the arrival of a delicate decree, which compels the sellers of incense to declare where it comes from, and the quality of what for what purpose it is intended. The principles of free trade would seem to have made little impression on the normal municipal councilors of country towns if the Government act is necessary to bring them to openly uniting their acts to the principles they profess.

THE TOMB.

THEY are some on epitaphs in Georgia. In cemetery in Bangor, Maine, is a monument to the memory of Tennessee Thompson, Jr. He lived to fourteen the lives of a cat, and died on the 13th day and 23 days; when death tore him from the mountain's side, and he was carried more than 100 miles to be placed him in God's White House, to live and play through all eternity."

HOW TO APPRECIATE WIVES.—According to the laws of the Greek church, its clergy may marry once; but if the wife dies they are forbidden to choose a successor, a strange interpretation of St. Paul's injunction to the Corinthians that they should be "one." It is said, and may safely be believed, that this gains for the lady a eager attention to her every whim than is usually the lot of her sex in the East. A gentleman residing in Athens, on the occasion of a dispute arising over entering the house of a leading priest, of him his engaged in washing down the floor, replied, on the inquiring the reason of such an apparently uncivil proposition, that he was married to the priest's wife, because my wife labor, that she may live the longer, for you know, O Kyrie, that a wife who does not labor cannot permit me to have another, and I wish to keep the one I have as long as I can."

HOW THE CHOLERA THRIVES.—The epidemic has made its appearance at Fromanile, a suburb of Constantinople, England, at present numbers about 1,800 inhabitants, and within a week there have been 24 deaths there, all of which are from cholera. A local correspondent ascribes the visitation to the drinking, repudiate, of the water. The system adopted is that of running the pipes of each house into a dead well, placed about six feet from the house, and sunk into the soil, in ground which is a loose stratum of gravel. These wells are made of brick-work, without any cement or interstices being left within them as in an ordinary well, thus permitting the soil to absorb and filter the liquid matter which may flow into them. All the live wells being surrounded by a ditch, so that from the wells, the liquid percolates from one into the other, the water procurable from the whole series of these dead wells, which may be compared to so many retorts, all depositing of their impurities, is of the most foul description (the pipes) into their several receivers (the cases). Every flush of rain washes the dead matter of the poison into the habitation—a poison as deadly to the human system as prussic acid or corrosive sublimate."

THE Chinese have had a great start over all the nations of the earth in the art of printing, and the art of printing was first introduced. It is known to have been practiced in China before the fifth century at the end of the sixth century of the Christian era. In A. D. 593 there is a decree of the Emperor Wen-ti "designs" and "text," and for their cutting in wood for publication; but it is not known when the art was first practiced. In 932 the canonical books were ordered to be printed, and the work was finished in nine years, and in 952 the work was completed, and the books "were circulated over all the empire." Printing from blocks was employed in the middle of the eleventh century. The earliest specimens of printing from blocks have been carried out in China on a most magnificent scale. The Chinese Encyclopædia, published in 1726, in all 250,000 moveable types, engraved in copper, and printed from them, and the Imperial Library, in 1773, consisted of 10,411 works to be published, covering the whole field of Chinese literature.

THE writing Chinese, the camel-hair pencil is held between the middle and the fourth finger, perpendicularly or nearly so, and the character is formed by character, some fanciful in the extreme. The wee or pencil-case is of bamboo, and the reservoir for ink was the most ancient mode, from the facilities it afforded in engraving the text, and in the printing of numerous inscriptions. The official character, which is about 4,000 in number, is the most simple, the most regular and primary type, and bears something the same reference to it that Roman capitals do to the modern text. It is the most used now in printing, and imitated in writing, is called "the seal character," and is found on the schools. In this "running" hand, the different parts of a character are connected with one another, and the writing is more rapidly performed. The flower or plant character is still more loose and flowing, and is not easily read; it has, however, a graceful and attractive appearance. In the tenth century, the "running" character was introduced; it is stiffer than the "plant," which has superseded them and other varieties; the taptsele character, the bamboo character, the bird character, in which resemblances to the objects pervade all the forms. There are many treatises on the art of writing, and many rules for the proper style; and a house are frequently adorned with scrolls of calligraphy.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

AN army chaplain relates the following story: Seeing a sixty-faced nutcracker perform at the fence, in front of a house, the preacher stopped, and said:

"Is your father at home?"

"No; he's gone to church."

"Is your mother at home?"

"No; she's gone, too."

"Then you're all by yourself?"

"No; brother Sam's in that, laughin' the nigger gal."

"That's bad."

"Yes, it's bad; but it's the best he can do!"

BEAUTY is like the rainbow, full of promise but elusive—it comes, it dazzles before, and then after the eye is laid. If a man flatters you, he is a knave to get a fool. If a woman is ashing for fame, go into the graveyard and rub yourself against the stones. A fop is a fool with a capital F, and a fool with a capital fool is a man with one idea is like a goose trying to hatch a porcupine.

JOHN asked Julia if she would have him? "No," said she, "I will not have you!" but before John could recover from the shock, she archly put in—"but you may have me!"

AT a meeting of young girls at Seneca, N. Y., the question was discussed whether, in the absence of Senator Fulls, don't get married during the year to come, according to the Leap Year Law.

A BACHELOR uncle, to whom his neice applied for advice on the question of choosing between two suitors, one a lawyer, was puzzled and the other—the latter, of course, being the most ardent, as well as the richest—he finally recommended the first. Next, the question being stripped of all illusory elements, your bachelor uncle's love knocked and held. Now, love is an idea, while beef is a reality. Love you can get along without, but beef you must have. Therefore, make sure of your beef."

AN orator, in appealing to the bone and sinew of the country, said: "I am proud of the time to-night the hardy yeomanry of the land, for I love their independence, their honesty, their sterling worth. I love them, fellow-citizens, for I was born a farmer; the happiest days of my existence were spent in the peaceful avocations of a son of the soil. If I may be allowed to call the honorable gentleman from Florida, I am sure I am born between two rows of corn." "A pumpkin, by the Lord!" exclaimed an inebriated chap, just in front of the stage.

A PHYSICIAN, who is a truly pious man, was thanking, we suppose, sincerely, at the close of the discourse, the idea of salvation upon those near death, and of the glorious consolations of the Gospel. The use of the following language: "For my own part, I am so calm that I could almost think myself delighted to learn that he is prepared to die."

THEY are getting the fine arts perfectly now. Don Saltero has just received a very fine horse so perfectly that the hair all comes off. Another has painted a fine picture of a gentleman without a head, so that no questions asked.

THERE is a paying love which lives de long as glass-pop; there is love at sight, to which we would add love at ninety days; there is a great deal of pontoon love in all of us; there is love that knows no bar, and lots' existence, it will not hurt anybody but the bar-keep. But there is one species of love especially that would be like seeing a Chinese almanac. He would be the man who would fall in love with a Sandwich Islander, never interested for his latitude. Americans must have sweethearts, and Englishmen must be for a lord, and an old hen who sees her ducklings sailing away on the pond.

A CERTAIN deacon being accustomed to snore while asleep in church, he ordered the following polite notice:

"Deacon —— is requested not to commence snoring in church previous to prayer, as he is the only person in the neighborhood of his pew would like to hear the first."

"My dear," said a lady to a wee child, whose hands were filled with painted candies which she had been eating, "I have been looking for some for you to eat."

"Yes, mamma," responded the child, "if they are not good to eat, may I take some for medicine?"

A CLERGYMAN recently preached to a full asleep in church, from which he was waked up by the pastor's whispering:

"Brother there is a vein for the silver and a place for the gold where they find it."

Jumping to his feet he shook his book at the minister, crying:

"I take five hundred shares."

IS IT not curious that the persons to inherit the property of the late Tom Sayers will be all Tom's Heirs?

A YOUNG lady, who was asked by her friends what was the matter with her, that she was going to a certain gentleman, replied to each one, innocently:

"Nothing."

"TOBY, what did the Israelites do when they came to Canaan?"

"I don't know, ma'am, but I guess they dried themselves."

A CHILD thus defines gossip: It's when nobody don't do nothing and somebody goes and tells of it.

MESSRS. J. SCHUBERTH & CO. have imported a very fine assortment of Musical Merchandise, factory of Grand Pianos. It is a Grand of the celebrated Steinway Scale, Patent, and decidedly the best of imported pianos we have ever seen. It is distinguished for fine and even tone, and by superior workmanship.

FROM Mr. Frederic A. Brady, No. 22 Ann Street, we have received Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio by Robert Mackenzie Daniels, a novel of deep and absorbing interest, and Excelsior Hook and Ladder, by "Ned Musgrave," the last worthy any one's reading. Mr. Brady is the publisher of "Ned Musgrave," and has no equal in his day, and we have often wondered why our publishers did not recognize him.

When you feel a Cough or Bronchial affection coming on, you should use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, and relief is almost instantaneous.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment is now open to the public. See New York Herald. Last Week but one of the Circus. Circus and Drama twice each day, Afternoon, at 2; Evening at 7½. CIRCUS TROUPE, and thoroughbred Horse of the Circus, Mr. Frederick Ashley's Performing Pony, Horned Bull. Splendid Acts of Horsemanship. Drama, Circus, Comedy, the Dramatic Drama of SONS OF THE REPUBLIC. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Vocalist and Ventriloquist. Three immense Aquaria. Three Dwarfs, Two Circassian Girls, Living Skeleton, Albinos, Giants, Dwarfs, the Human Brain, Scenes of Conemaraa, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria, 100,000 curiosities. Admission, 50 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

The Art of imitating Foreign Brandy and Rum Gins from pure spirits, sent on receipt of $1. Address JAMES B. MOUAT, Practical Chemist, Poughkeepsie, New York.

Best Black Ink. Five cents a gallon. Recipe sent for 25 cents. Address Box 14, Hinsdale, N. H.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc., supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYHAM, Esq., Rochester, Monroe County, N. Y.

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 25 cents. Address H. E. MARLIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

Over Fifty Receipts, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, etc., to be found in "THE UNIVERSAL." Sent free for FIVE CENTS.

Address, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Mustaches?

MY OINGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post-free, to any address on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, Nassau St., N. Y.

An Album for 30 Cents!

NEW! BEAUTIFUL! CHEAP!!! EXQUISITE!!!!

A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs, in neat frame, only

HIGHLY PERFUMED.

Opening with a spring clasp. Sent postpaid for 30 cents. Address CALVIN WILLIS & CO., No. 107 Broadway, New York.

The Way to Make from One Dollar to One Dollar and Fifty Cents in an evening, with other Valuable Secrets, sent to any address for two stamps. Address A. WOLCOTT, Cleveland, O.

Guide to Beauty. 100 pages. All should have it. Mailed for 25 cts. Address G. JENNISON, Box 5,014, P. O., New York.

Employment at your own Homes—either sex—suitable for a livelihood, or leisure hours in every city and town. Large profits realized. Business new. Send stamp, for particulars, DU. WARD, NEWARK, 84 East 14th street, New York City. 2t2-3

How to Take Pictures.

I will send, post-paid, for $1, the Art of Copying Photographs on Paper, and a Recipe for making a Fluid a number of copies may be taken without injury to the Negative. Address, with stamp, for reply, inclosed, Address F. J. WARD, Terre Haute, Ind. 2t2-3

10,000 ALREADY SOLD. Eighth Edition now ready. MAGIC MADE EASY: A complete expose of modern Conjuring, Ventriloquism, &c. It tells how to eat fire, to cut off your nose, rope-dying feats, and nearly 200 other astonishing magical performances. Price 50 cents. Sold everywhere, or mailed, free of postage, by HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

A Household Necessity exists for the Use of

DURNO'S CATARRH SNUFF,

Which, in the first stages of a cold, acts like magic—Headache, Hoarseness, Diphtheria, and Bronchitis, Sore Eyes, Deafness, Bad Taste and Smell, being the result of Catarrh. This snuff removes and prevents all these, and insures a speedy cure. Its effects are pleasant to use, even for infants, who suffer from colds.

It has the highest professional testimonials. Sold by druggists, or can be sent by mail for 50 cents in U. S. for 50 cents, for one box, or $1 for four boxes. Address DURNO, P. O. Box 5,323, New York.

Wholesale, by D. BARNES & CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y. 534-6t*ow

A SENSATION BOOK.

THE CONFESSION OF

MARTHA GRINDER, THE POISONER.

Published by JOHN HUNT & CO., 39 Fifth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, Publishers, Etc. For sale in New York by the American News Company, and Hilton & Co., and by Booksellers all over the country. Price 25 cents. Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Nervous Debility,

Loss of Memory, Premature Decay, &c., however caused, Self-Abuse, Mercurial Disease, Impure Blood, and disorders of others. Before commencing any treatment, or despairing of your case in any place, read DR. HOWARD'S Treatise on these subjects. Address Dr. HOWARD 13 Tremont, Lock Box, Boston, Mass.

Views Browser or Life in the Concert Saloons. A book for Sailors and Landsmen. Published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post-Office Box 4,586, New York City. 2t2-3

COLORED CARTES DE VISITE

SIXTY CENTS PER DOZEN.

I will send upon receipt of 60 cents 12 Cartes de Visite of French Gouettes in different positions, or the whole set of 36 Gouettes for $1.75.

541-4 T. ALLEN, 55 Nassau street, New York.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (2 views), $1.25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marbled Back Playing Cards, $1.25 per pack. $12 by mail on receipt of Price. Address

FORWARDING AGENCY, 38 Liberty street, N. Y. 1t2-3

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GORLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be sold for more until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you are to get, and at the same time send for our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

JOE MILLER, JR.

A Book containing Hundreds of Jokes, Conceal Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poems, &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read Secrets Worth Knowing Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelope on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. Also, a certain cure for Itching or Scaly Eruptions on any part. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
637-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, an invention unquestionably needed by everybody. Has a ready sale. Sample by mail for 50 cents. Circular ready for 25, by B. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 637tf

$1,500 PER YEAR! We want Agents everywhere, and will show to all our Grover & Baker $30 Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted 3 years. Any country, or large commission paid. The only machines sold in United States for less than $50, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Matrimony Made Easy!

Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with specimen Love Letters. Price 15 cents. Send orders to Box 3,410 P. O. tf

LADIES DESIRING A SMOOTH CLEAR AND BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION

Should use GEORGE W. LAIRD'S Bloom of Youth. Has no equal in removing and Beautifying the Complexion and Skin. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot 74 Fulton street, New York. 538-41

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865.

No. 14826.....	drew.....	$100,000
No. 25240.....	"	50,000
No. 25389.....	"	25,000
No. 93.....	"	10,000
No. 10139.....	"	5,000
No. 7097.....	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN—Red or Brown, $2.50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE BASS—Red or Brown, $8, $10, $15.
FRENCH—Blocked and Lined, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTER—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $75 to $100.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 308 Bowery.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, Rare Engravings. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
669 FREDERICK BIRDY, 37 Ann St., N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools speedily yield to these purifying remedies. Sores, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

A CURIOSITY!!
Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare illustrations. Sent free to all.

CHARLES E. MACKEY,
tf 37 Broadway, New York.

$5 Something New $5.
For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
B. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

Book of Receipts, 60 pages, with catalogue, free. Address BLAKE & CO., 712 Broadway, N. Y. 4

R. R. R.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF
RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

The Cheapest and Best Medicine for Family Use in the World.

One 50 Cent Bottle

WILL CURE MORE COMPLAINTS, AND PREVENT THE SYSTEM AGAINST SUDDEN ATTACKS OF EPIDEMIC AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES, THAN ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS EXPENDED IN ALL OTHER MEDICINES OR MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

THE MOMENT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF IS APPLIED EXTERNALLY, OR TAKEN INTERNALLY, ACCORDING TO DIRECTIONS, PAIN, FROM WHATEVER CAUSE, CEASES TO EXIST.

1849. Asiatic Cholera. 1849.

IN 1849 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF CURED OVER 10,000 PERSONS SEIZED WITH ASIATIC CHOLERA IN NEW YORK, SIMPLY USE AS A PREVENTIVE SAVED OVER ONE MILLION OF LIVES.

1856. Yellow Fever. 1856.

IN 1856 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF cured thousands of persons seized with Yellow Fever. As a preventive of this terrible disease, Dr. Patrick B. Sage, of Mississippi, urged its use to the Medical Boards of the Southern States; and they recommended it as the most certain safeguard in the world.

During the War

More lives were saved by the use of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF than from the best efforts of the medical staff. We have hundreds of letters proving the fact. We have the evidence to prove that in cases where men, on regimental marches, have been taken sudden, price fields, etc., used RADWAY'S READY RELIEF, invariably with perfect success; have been cured, and attacked with Dysentery, Swamp Fevers, Bilious Fevers, Diarrhœa, Cholera, Rheumatism, Pain in the back, side, or limbs, when these seized, used the READY RELIEF, entirely recovered.

Its Universal Use.

It cures the worst diseases incidental to all climates. It has been tested in Asia, Africa, South America, Europe, and West Indies, and cured the worst forms of Cholera, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Bilious Fevers, Inflammation, Ship, and other Fevers—and never failed in protecting persons who used it as a preventive against such attacks.

Why Not ?

IT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF possesses such remarkable soothing, sustaining, strengthening, operation, sudden and permanent, that pain of any kind, even the most severe, flees at once, and in the most violent attacks it is the first "you may almost cut it with a knife." Not only does it cure at once, but a short series of days or the milder type in our own climate? Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Cholera and Ague, Bilious Fevers, Inflammation, and all the milder and weaker forms of the more terrible diseases to which the worst forms of it they exist in the most sickly climates, it will readily cure the sick as they prevail amongst us.

Ten Years' Rheumatism

CURED BY RUBBING THE SPINE WITH
Radway's Ready Relief.

ROBERT CAPE, Esq., aged 60, has been afflicted with Rheumatism for 10 years. For the past 12 months he was confined to his room, particularly at night. His limbs were distorted, swollen and misshapen. His hands cramped, so that he could not use them. His joints were open sore and his hands; rheumatic pains ran up and over his head, giving him no rest. He was invited to use his pain relieving remedy, and was induced to try RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. The first rubbing gave him relief, and in a few days he was entirely free from pain; one month's application of the RELIEF and a few quarts of RADWAY'S RELIEF restored him to health once more as well and hearty man, and uses the RELIEF and PILLS occasionally only.

As a Family Medicine.

As a family medicine it is the most useful remedy ever known. If any one in the family is taken sick, or threatened with any malignant disease, its use will quickly arrest the progress of the system against attacks. IN A FEW MINUTES after the application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF, even the most violent pains, internally, the patient, seized with the most excruciating pains, CEASE, ACHES, PAINS, NERVOUSNESS, NEURALGIA, GOUT, LUMBAGO, FEVER AND AGUE, RHEUMATISM, DYSPEPSIA, DIFFICULT BREATHING, CONGESTION, or INFLAMMATION will enjoy ease and comfort.

IMPORTANT.—TO FARMERS AND OTHERS residing in localities where the climate is such as to render it insecure the services of a physician, RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is invaluable, as it is always with positive assurance of doing good in all cases where pain or disease exists. RADWAY'S READY RELIEF CURES CHOLERA, DIPTHERIA, SORE THROAT, BAD COUGHS, INFLAMMATION, INFLUENZA, PAIN IN THE SIDE, IN THE BOWELS, STOMACH, LUNGS, LIVER, KIDNEYS; IN SHORT, IN ALL PARTS OF THE BODY, NEURALGIA, HEADACHE, TIC DOLOREUX, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM, LUMBAGO, PAIN IN THE SMALL OF THE BACK, OR RHEUMATISM, OR with DIARRHŒA, CHOLERA MORBUS, or DYSENTERY, or with BOILS, SCALDS, OR BRUISES, or with SPRAINS, CRAMPS, or CHILLS. The application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will cure you of the worst of these complaints in a few minutes.

RHEUMATISM.—This painful disease has baffled the most skilful physicians in every popular country. It is the most difficult of diseases to treat—yet RADWAY'S READY RELIEF has proved itself to be the most immediate relief to the sufferer; and in all cases of Acute, Inflammatory or Nervous Rheumatism, to effect a permanent cure. In Chronic Rheumatism and Gout, RADWAY'S CLEANSING SYRUP, called Sarsaparilla Resolvent, should be taken as an adjunct with the READY RELIEF.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERYWHERE.
Price 50 cents per Bottle.
Dr. JOHN RADWAY & CO., Montreal.
C. E. RADWAY & CO.,
639-42 No. 87 Maiden Lane, New York.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

MUSICAL BOXES, playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $6 50 to $600. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine assortment for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invaded.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers
21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired. 631-42

144 COMIC VALENTINES $1
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.
B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 637-40

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses.
A charming, delicate and permanent natural color for the cheeks "or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1.18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., Perfumers, tf 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple means, within the reach of all, always successful, never fails. Free by mail, with a guide to life and married, of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address
tf T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

10,000 SOLD.
I will send to any address a beautiful Military Album, with 24 assorted portraits of our Union Generals, for 50 cents, or 6 cabinet for dozen to Agents. Address C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

SIAMESE TWINS.
Two men grown together. A Life Photograph sent by mail for 36 cents. Address
541-4 C. BRIGGS,
P. O. Drawer, 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

EVANS' TOILET GEMS.
Consisting of Diamond, Emerald, Ruby, Royal Azure, Gold and Silver Dust, for the toilet, to ornament and color the hair, and present a glittering and brilliant appearance. For Ball and Evening Dress they are unique, elegant and fashionable. Sold only at HUNT & CO.'S, Perfumers, 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia. Sample box of either kind sent by mail for $1.18; sufficient to dress the hair for months.
tf

MAN IMMORTAL!—Arguments from Nature, Revelation, and Spirits; Fore-knowing: The Soul; Immortality; A Christian Life; Shapes of Heads; Crime of a Clergyman; How to Break a Horse; Bad Habits; Dante; General Reinstelmun; 7 Street Mill; Stepping Stones to Fortune; Matrimony; Sexual Physiology; Phrenology—Location, Illustrated; Monkeys of Brazil. Physiognomy—Intellect, Animality, Individuality, Zealousy. Æsop's Fables, with Humorous Beauty to Each; Wonders of Nature; Short Legs; Happy at Home; Work for Women; Kisses old Kissing Bee; Hall's Journal of Phrenology. Journal. $2 a year, or 20 cents a number.
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.
541-2

FUN, "O," FUN.

HURRAH for the new Phunney articles which are now just out; they sell like wild-fire. "The Pocket Pistol Gallery." the most valuable thing on earth; over 1,000 "Phunney Specimens of Wit, Humor, and Eccentric Transformations." Is now only 60 cents. "The Magic Pocket-Book," a rich thing. Price 60 cents. "The Magic Cards," the best trick ever played on earth. Price 50 cents per pack. "The Old Schoolmaster's Joke Book," 60 cents. "The Phunny Album," with 24 assorted Pictures. Price 60 cents. A Rare Book, with Rare Cuts, for Rare Fun. Price 75 cents. A beautiful bound book M. "O." It is this the only book you want? knowing how to win your sweetheart, and make your money like dirt. Price only 75 cents. A NEW BOOK, splendidly bound. Price $1. I will send any of the above articles by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, or I will send the whole lot for $4. These articles are just the thing to make a Present of. Don't forget to hear from you all soon. Address orders to BARNUM,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,086, Chicago, Ill.

$5 Secret.—Agents and others can have for only $5 cents, a great list of secret and other information whereby they can clear $20 a day, or circulars free. Address STEPHENS & CO., 329 Broadway, N. Y.
641-4

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.
Samples and Catalogue for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address tf JAS. P. MANCHES, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 50 cents. Photographs of Rebel Generals for 25 cents; 50 photographs or Statesmen and Generals for 50 cents; 100 photographs of Actresses for 50 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address 626-44 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Rutland, Vt.

CoughNoMore

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-576

Short-Hand Without a Master.
By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, &c., may be obtained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, with SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK.
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS.
War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.
Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties.
tf

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY!
DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"IT was early in the spring of 1855 that the compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an inflam'n of the throat, attended with a distressing cough. I had for months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Connecticut, Mrs. H. Ely, who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had used many remedies without relief. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about two dozen of it and got well. A. B. Clark, Esq., editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same preparation in the case of a severe cold, and was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with the result, and so confident of success in obtaining the sales if placed before the public, that he kindly persuaded me to give it a name and send it abroad to benefit the suffering. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in Manchester over one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the lead of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. There is a reason for all things; it is very soothing and healing in its nature, is warming to the stomach, and pleasant either to the taste, and is exceedingly cheap.

"For the cure of colds and complaints, the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled. It was not originated for any purpose. If a person is using it for a cough, was not only cured of the cough, but was also cured of a chronic debility of ten years' standing. That accidental discovery many thousands have used it for the same complaint, and have been equally cured."

The above was written by Dr. Poland in 1860. Since then, as he remarks, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as preparations for the cure of kidney affections, in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the New England States.

The past year has given great opportunity to test the White Pine Cough Compound. It has been an unusual time for Colds and Coughs, and very large quantities of it have been sold in the Western States, and used with the happiest effects. It speaks well for the medicine, and for the people where it is prepared and high in its praise.

The success of this Compound is generally sufficient to remove a bad cough, and frequently I have known persons to be cured by a fifty cent bottle. Two days by using less than half a bottle. From one to two teaspoonfuls is a large dose for children, and for those while young and hot water with it when taken on going to bed. As the kinds of medicine purposely contained in this circular will not allow of that full expression which I feel to be due to the merits of the White Pine Compound, it is universally admired by all who use it; it has attained a high popularity among those using opinion is valuable indeed, that VANITY may possibly, in part, modify it, the record must be more than high people will have patience to read; so I will stop, by merely recommending to all who need a cough or lung remedy to test the virtues of the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

TESTIMONIALS.

A very large number of important testimonials have already been received from Physicians, Clergymen, Apothecaries, and, indeed, from all classes of society, speaking in the most flattering terms of the White Pine Compound.

Dr. Nichols, of Northfield, Vt., says:

"I find the White Pine Compound to be very effectual, not only in relieving colds and other pulmonic affections, but also in affections of the kidneys, especially of the stomach and those kindred organs."

Rev. J. E. Cluse, of Bunnell, F. H., writes:

"I have for years regarded your White Pine Compound as an excellent remedy. I can truly say that I regard it as even more efficacious and valuable than ever. I have just taken the Compound for a cold, and it works charmingly."

Rev. H. D. Doner,

of West Randolph, Vt., who is a practising physician, as well as preacher, in a letter to Dr. P., dated May 21, 1864, says: "I find it an excellent remedy in kidney disease."

The White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, is not only as to its name inviting, but is a most excellent remedy. Dr. J. W. Poland, the inventor, has the confidence of the many who know him; a confidence which he has enjoyed while residing many years as a Baptist minister. His extensive sale as a physician is also a guarantee which issued in his medical discovery.—Boston Watchman and Reflector.

The editor of the Manchester Daily and Weekly Mirror, in which city Dr. Poland has spread his remedies, says:

"The White Pine Compound is advertised at much length in our columns, and we are happy to learn that the demand for it is increasing beyond all previous expectation. It is for coughs and colds, for lungs and colds we know of, and to testify that he has once used it will join us without a word. We speak from our knowledge; it is sure to kill a Cold, and pleasant as sure. The cracked cold and hoarseness, and we also know that the White Pine Compound, made for Colds and Coughs, should prove to be the greatest boon for kidney difficulties known. But so it is. We cannot doubt but it is a most excellent remedy for all kidney complaints. Besides, the character of Dr. Poland is such that we know he does not recommend it to the public unless he has known it to be worthy. We speak from our knowledge; it is sure to kill a Cold, and pleasant as sure. The cracked cold and hoarseness, and we also know that the White Pine Compound, made for Colds and Coughs, should prove to be the greatest boon for kidney difficulties known. But so it is. We cannot doubt but it is a most excellent remedy for all kidney complaints. Besides, the character of Dr. Poland is such that we know he does not recommend it to the public unless he has known it to be worthy. For years a Baptist clergyman, studying medicine in his leisure hours, and meeting with self-taught experience like book, standing with one foot upon the grave, he has left the pulpit for the practice of medicine, and called out from hundreds of others the strongest testimonials possible. We have known Dr. Poland for years, and never knew a more conscientious, honest, upright man, and we are glad to state that we believe whatever he says about his White Pine Compound."

Should you think favorably of this medicine, be careful, when purchasing, to call for WHITE PINE COMPOUND that is offered to you, as we know that other preparations have been palmed off for it by unprincipled dealers.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is manufactured at the
NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT,
100 Hanover Street, Boston,
by
GEO. W. SWEETZER, M. D., PROPRIETOR
Under the supervision of
REV. J. W. POLAND, M. D.

DR. SWEET will attend to the business department to whom all orders should be addressed.

Sold by wholesale and retail dealers in Medicine everywhere.

BURNHAM & VAN SCHAACK, Chicago, Ill.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.
COLLINS & BROTHERS, St. Louis, Mo.
WARD, RENNEDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.
General Agents for the West.

S. M. WARD & CO.

WORTHY THE ATTENTION OF BOTH MALES AND FEMALES, who are in want of business. The well-known House of S. M. WARD & CO., Manufacturing Jewellers, 208 Broadway, N.Y., wish to establish an AGENCY in every town in the U. S., and in order that the Agent can have a sample to exhibit to their customers, they will send as a sample, on receipt of $2, a genuine Gold Pen (warranted) with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, together with a Wholesale Circular to Agents, and eleven certificates, or a Sample Certificate for 25 cents, or five for $1.

There is no Agent but what can make easily $3 a day, and often $10.

SKATES FOR THE MILLION!

DEPOT FOR

Lovatt's Patent Skates,

WITHOUT STRAPS, AND

NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,

WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.

A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates. Depot for "Lakeside Rink" and "Patent Foot Skate." Wholesale and Retail.

ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway.

Skates Ground and Repaired.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Tenant of different powers for $1. Address

000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND

EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1865; improvements patented June 5, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CRIMPING attachment, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is simple in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and works horizontal, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD of all KINDS. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity; making it sticties to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Braid, Quilt, Shirr, Run up Seams, &c.; the strongest machine made. Warranted not to get out of order for THREE YEARS. It has taken the PREMIUMS at New York and other STATE FAIRS, and received the FULL APPROVAL of ALL the principal Journals, and of those who have used THEM. The GEM LOW PRICE Machine Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others at the same price are WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Tribune.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $5. Sub-Agents wanted. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,

tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Household; Home Tonsing—complete; Hints for Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous substances; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Decoy Cards exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Balms, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc.; how to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Fortune Telling; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 80 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 5410, Post Office, N. Y. 833-5

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish, all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Ointments and Curling Fluids; Amusing Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,097 P. O., New York. tf

CHOLERA! CHOLERA!!

Do not die with the cholera. Save your life. Dr. Charles' European Cholera Remedy has cured the worst cases in from 10 to 60 minutes. Everybody should send at once and receive it by return of mail, for we know not what time it will come upon us. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1 50, or six for $7. Address all orders to the agents.

CHARLES L. BRIGGS, Agent,

541-49 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one of the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

537-49o 505 Broadway, New York.

GOOD ADVICE.

PAPA CHAPATO—"Sare, my little garçon be tres sick—eat shall I give him to cure him?"

YANKEE DOCTOR—"Well, you know best; but I tell you what my treatment will be—a few of these pills taken semi-occasionally, or even oftener. These are warranted to cure or kill. I never knew them to fail."

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER.

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to REMOVE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Timekeeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Answered by Hot Press and all who have used these, introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors, tfo 191 and 193 Broadway, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 609 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $80 each.

o539-45

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, will be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 66 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S

EXTRACT BUCHU.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., Boston. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 838-47o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by REIDY'S CRIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 38 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 838-47o

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S

AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N.Y. Madame PERREGAULT is the seer of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of future fortune instead of wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, &c. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. Shrewd men, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture will it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,

542-51o P. O. Drawer 203, Albany, N. Y.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-45o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

If you want the best fitting, strongest, and most serviceable paper collar ever offered to the public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

The most Economical Collar ever Invented.

Showing the embossed or printed stitch equally well on both sides.

The following styles are now made:

Patent REVERSIBLE Enameled PAPER COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Bank Note Paper COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Printed Stitch PAPER COLLARS

To be obtained all Furnishing Goods Dealers throughout the country.

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO., Agents,

541-53o Winthrop Square, Boston.

Patent Fasteners for Ladies and Gentlemen.—Have you used them? Try the 50 cents, 1000 Books—Guide to Beauty, 25 cts.; Love Oracle, 25 cts.; Laws of Love, 25 cts.; How to Converse, 25 cts.; Rules of the Billiard Table, 50 cts; Guide to the Stage, 25 cts.; How to be an Actor, 25 cts.; Parlor Dramas, male characters only, 50 cts.; female characters, 50 cts.; Burlesque Dramas, 50 cts. Quotations from Shakespeare, 42 cts.; Life of a Showman, 50 cts.; Parlor Pantomimes, set, $1. Mammoth catalogues sent to every lady and gentleman free. Send for them. W. O. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

Old Eyes Made New, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Comfort and Cure for the Ruptured—Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Croup—How it may be easily Prevented; also Cause and Cure. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Confidential Information for the Married.—Sent free in sealed envelope. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Medical Common Sense.—400 pages—100 Illustrations, $1 50. Sent by mail everywhere, postpaid. Contents Table sent free. Address the Author, E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y. ——

DEAFNESS,

Discharges from the Ear, and Noises in the Head, Radically Cured

By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract,

OTITINE.

Price $1 00 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. GEO. C. GOODWIN & CO., 36 Hanover Street, Boston.

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be sown growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $16 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Lesalle Township, New Jersey.

From Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, on an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

$7 Fine Watches at Old Prices. $7

English Silver Watches	$ 6, $8, $10
Pure Silver Hunting Lepines	$15 Each.
Fine 18 Karat Gold-Plated Watches	$16, $18, $20.
Fancy Compass and Thermometer Watches	$13, $20.
Silver Hunting Levers	$30, $35.
Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches	$16 to $75.
Coin Silver American Levers	$30.

All kinds of Good Watches, New.

CATELY BROTHERS, Importers,

tfo 161 Maiden Lane, corner Nassau street, N. Y.

SERPENTS de PHARON,

or

SERPENTS' EGGS.

THE LATEST SCIENTIFIC MIRACLE.

"Truly marvelous, and apparently inexhaustible."—Times. Wholesale and Retail by OLDER & BROTHER, 246 Canal street, New York. 50 cents a Box, free by mail. Liberal discount to the trade. Agents wanted.

Superbly Enameled Reversible Linen Bosom Collars, 50 Cts. ; Stitched, $1. Si.50; Ladies' Collars and Cuffs, $1 50 each. Mailed. Send price & size. Bixby & Powers, 76 Summer St., B. Y.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,097, P. O., New York. tf

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. 0ff

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH.
Salt Rheum. OINTMENT. Salt Rheum.

Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cure Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 Cents; by mailing 60 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists. 541-49o

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. THOMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-49o

MICROSCOPES & 60 CTS.

THE FRENCH TERRESTRIAL MICROSCOPE, a very powerful instrument, mailed for 60 cents; two for $1. Address

GEO. D. WASHBURN & CO., Box 6,093, Boston, Mass. 541-53o

WHISKERS and a MUSTACHE forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SETTON'S RESTAURATEUR. Call PHILADR., the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the Nobility of Paris and London with the most flattering success. Names of all purchasers will be given, and full entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials sent free. Address all orders to DR. SETTON & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 542-54o

ROGERS' FRAGRANT ODONTOLINE FOR THE TEETH.

For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers.

BEAUTY.—Ayer's Hair Dye, and Silken CURLS produced by the use of Professor De Barex's CURLING FLUID. One application warrants a lady to curl her hair straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets of the most massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Sent by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address all orders to DE BAREX & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer, 21, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 542-54o

Just Published.

The New Number of FRANK LESLIE'S BUDGET OF FUN—being No. 96—The Great Comic Paper of America. This Number contains large comic pictures on the backs of the 4to leaves. TIM FINNEGAN'S DREAM, a companion to Tim Finnegan's Wake. Also a splendid Cartoon on the Mexican Question, entitled "JUAREZ ADMITTED!" and the best scene of that grand American Drama, representing the expulsion of the Foreign Intruders. A Page of Valentines. Besides Humorous and Satirical Pictures by the best artists living. In addition to this, it contains numerous Stories, Sketches, Western Yarns, Songs, Anecdotes, &c.; but its admirable articles on the leading virtues and foibles of the day, by the most popular writers.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLICATION OFFICE,

537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 543—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 24, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 12 Weeks $1 00

Napoleonic Trifling.

The text of the speech of the French Emperor to his Legislative Chambers is before us. It, in no degree, justifies the predictions as to its purport, in which the wishy-washy and "inspired" part of the American press has indulged during the past few months. It leaves the Mexican question as far from a solution as ever, and affords no foundation for a hope that the French intervention will be withdrawn until the objects for which it was made are fully realized. We print elsewhere the paragraphs relating to Mexico and the United States, so that our readers may know precisely what the arch-perjurer does say on the matter so nearly concerning our interests and honor. They are full of falsehood and insolence. The impudence of characterizing the government set up in the name of Maximilian as "founded on the will of the people," is simply Napoleonic, and must bring a smile of derision to every lip. It is only paralleled by the falsehood that the "opposition," comprising the entire Mexican people, with the exception of a few traitors, are "conquered and dispersed, and have no longer a chief." The patriot soldiers may be scattered, but they are not yet conquered. And as for President Juarez, he is the head of the Mexican Republic, recognized by every American nation, except the slave-holding Empire of Brazil, and still maintains his position on the soil of his outraged native land, and in the hearts and affections of his countrymen.

But it is not with Louis Napoleon's falsification of facts and imprudent assumptions that we have most to do; what we want most to know, is not so much whether he is going to leave Mexico, but when? Upon this point we are no wiser now than before. Nothing can be more vague than to tell us that he is "coming to an understanding" with his puppet and tool, who is only his alter ego. This is simply trifling. On the slightest hint or suggestion from his master in the Tuileries that the French troops would be recalled, the wretched Hapsburg would be sure to take himself off, with more haste than ceremony. We understand well enough what is meant by "fixing the epoch" of the withdrawal of the French troops. That epoch will arrive, as we have already hinted, when the objects for which those troops were sent to Mexico shall have been accomplished. What those objects were, and are, we all know. The leading object was to create a counterpoise to the United States in tropical America, and check the spread and growth of Republican institutions. When the spirit and strength of the Mexicans shall have been broken, and when the United States, from delay in entering a firm and, if need be, forcible protest against his wanton and hostile intervention, shall have practically recognized the new order of things in Mexico, then will Louis Napoleon be able to "fix the epoch" for the recall of his troops.

The guile and treachery of this man are limitless, and he will amuse and trifle with weak and timid statesmen, who still believe in that remnant of solemn charlatanism called diplomacy, until acquiescence in his acts will be demanded as a right, in default of protest and earnest opposition. He has everything to gain by delay; we have everything to lose by procrastination. To-day it is possible to secure the abandonment of European designs and schemes in Mexico by a simple, manly, and decided requisition on the Emperor of the French to desist, without shrinking from the alternative of war. To-morrow it will be said, "Why did you tacitly accept the consolidation of our power in Mexico, and yield a practical assent to our pretensions, through timorous negations, without weight or significance?" And indignant France will reproach us for lack of frankness and good faith, and tell us we must accept the situation which we have ourselves created. To this our hesitating, halting, undignified and unmanly policy is tending.

THE ENGLISH LIFE-LADDER, FOR SAVING LIFE DURING THE SKATING SEASON.

THE HEN AND CHICKENS—THE DEFENCE.—BY SIR EDWIN LANDSEER.

The sincerity of the pious aspirations for the welfare of the United States, in which the Emperor indulges, may be fairly estimated by recurrence to his repeated and eager efforts to secure the cooperation of Great Britain in the recognition of the rebel Confederacy—the "corner-stone" of which was that very theory over the abolition of which, we are told, the noble sentiments of France are roused, and which stir even in the impassible bosom of the Emperor himself! After such a manifestation of hypocrisy, it is not wonderful that we should be called on to admire the "frankness" of the Emperor's declarations about Mexico. That "nations, equally jealous of their independence ought to avoid every step which might affect their dignity and honor," is about as platitudinous an axiom as ever was put forward by a school-boy in the earliest exercises in composition. May we inquire, "Did the Emperor of the French act up to that excellent rule, when, taking advantage of our apparent weakness and real peril, he ostentatiously violated what he knew to be a cherished and vital principle in our continental policy, and made open war on the system of government of which we were the exponents? Is there respect for our dignity or regard for our honor in his repeated attempts to secure a recognition of nationality for rebel States?

Taken in detail, or as a whole, the speech of the Emperor, as regards this country, is offensive in tone and unsatisfactory in character. We are not satisfied with his unique hints as to his policy in Mexico. We are offended by his lecture as to what may or ought to "pacify" us, as if the United States were some overgrown, wayward and unmanageable child, without the knowledge to perceive its interests, or the courage to sustain its dignity.

The stipendiary press will but echo the speech in a remarkable accession to the skill and vigor of American diplomacy. But the French will remain in Mexico!

OUR PUBLICATIONS.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

SUBSCRIBERS ORDERING FROM TO TIMES, OR PLACES, WILL PLEASE STATE WHICH.

This most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has become the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, forming a perfect pictorial contemporary history of the world. It contains every new and important Invention, Portraits of the Celebrities of all Countries, Sketches of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of the Day, New Buildings, Paintings, Monuments, &c. Its Literature comprises a continued Story by some distinguished Author, Historical Tales, Sketches, Critic isms, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	13 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner,

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

Each Number contains a variety of Short Stories from our best American Writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, National History, Biography, Poetry, Manners and Customs of all Nations, Records of the Olden Times, Heroic Passages in History, Portraits and Biographies of the Self-Made Men of America, Lectures for Young Folks, Gossip for the Ladies, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures, besides new features of great interest and utility constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and the completest Household Journal published. In the course of 1866 the Chimney Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	13 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published Weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine,

With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian painting, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in the different dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The Fast Baby"—and a doll model in her walking costume, the article of dress being separate.

The February number contains an exquisitely colored lithograph of "So Pretty," and a doll model full-dress costume, the articles of dress been separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the March and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, $3 50; four copies to one Post-office, $12; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the names.

Subscriptions to be sent to
FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and has great success and a great circulation.

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining reading. Only 75 cents a number, or $3 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 00.

Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac.—80 Eng....50 cents, with 4 Lithographic Pictures.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

UNPRECEDENTED ATTRACTIONS.

Three Splendid Gift Plates.

WITH NO. 39 OF

FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER

each purchaser is entitled to receive the great National Engraving,

"Grant in Peace,"

The most exquisite and attractive work of the time.

With this number commences Abbeyford, a Romance of Three Women, a new and highly exciting Story, by one of the most popular Authors of the day.

Every person who subscribes NOW to 3 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER is entitled to, gratis, the splendid Gift Plate of the Grand Ball and Supper Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

No. 4 contains a careful outline-drawing, being the Key to the Picture.

With Number 33 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER each purchaser is entitled to receive a most splendid engraving, entitled "His Only Pair," the English prints of which cost Eighty Dollars.

Subscribers to the CHIMNEY CORNER, or FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER for the year '66 can receive the above three elegant Plates, gratis, all adapted for framing.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Monday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same by the week. Agents, or those persons wishing to subscribe at any time, by taking the back numbers from the commencement, will be entitled to receive the Presentation Plates.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Pub-lisher,
FRANK LESLIE,
537, Pearl street, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 24, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

Shall we be Moles or Swallows?

How to facilitate travel between the upper and lower parts of the city, is now the predominant question in New York. Five people have made up their minds to reside in one place and do business in another. The Harpers will not live over their bookstore, as the rents of London did and do not. Mr. Appleton's shop-keeper put his name on a modest door by the side of the window where he displays his wares, and "lives over the shop" in town. It is New York instinct to do so, and a Gothamite greatly prefers to be uncomfortable in a veneered eighteen by sixty and 6f indefinite height, where delicious squares, and three miles from his business, than to live in a substantial and roomy dwelling in St. Mark's Place. The philosophy of this tendency and ambition is not easy to find. We think about. It is enough to know that we all have the instinct, and do so pretty much for the same reason that birds fly and fishes swim.

It is "our nature to," and as we cannot be expected to change our natures, we must adapt ourselves to circumstances, or make circumstances adapt themselves to us. It is clear that we cannot set up our tabernacles above Murray Hill, or overlooking the Park, and yet sell our candles and codfish in South Street. Not unless we can shorten the time between these hemispheres. Time is money, and life is short.

Omnibuses and street cars would do, if we could only live up to good old patriarchal ages. But we can't. So we must get "down town" in less than an hour, and we cannot afford to deprive our Jeminses of another hour in the afternoon.

The practical question of how we shall help ourselves, is now before us. We talk of driving a tunnel right through the island, and practicate ourselves morn and night into a pit, and be then whisked through an elongated cellar to our destination, be it up or down. But the damps—and the odors—and how shall we read our morning and evening papers? and how look out of the windows, and see the shops and the people? It will never do, to say nothing of the cost, water and gas-mains, and pipes and sewers, and endless other things, including the nuisance of ripping up the streets.

Then there is the question of burying a man alive, because he sells candles and whale-oil in South street, and likes to live away from their odors. Why be a mole, when one can be a bird? But one can wait a great long-indefinite road in the air, where there is light and air, and a happy absence of water-mains and gaspipes and (laugh!) of sewers!

We shall all our brains how this may be done, next week. Meantime, let our legislators in Albany practice the great virtue of patience. We are not so badly off in New York but that we can wait a year longer, to get a really rational solution of the problem of how to get down town and back again.

A Standing Wonder.

The Daily Express, the official paper of Easton, Pennsylvania, has a very interesting article, under the above heading, on the progress and power of the press. Our space will only allow us to quote the following:

"It is said that when Benjamin Franklin, our Pennsylvania philosopher, asked his mother's advice as to whether he should start a newspaper or not, the old lady talked to him until he would imagine Mrs. Partington to have done: 'There are two papers now going in the county, and they don't get quite over that they will succeed.' But these feeble beginnings starved, and the printer took proper traffic to the public mind. A spirit of inquiry and thought was excited. Some newspapers, as a matter of course, to be regarded as Bible truth by some, and men had opinions of their own. Even common people never looked upon by the gentler sex, they became champions of morality and virtue. How great have been the results from this mighty their influence! How often do they inspire the timid with courage to speak them to free, and mold legislation! What a mighty subject the liberty of the press is! How great the responsibility of its power! In 1845 it was estimated that there were 1,000 newspapers in the country. Now there are a number now? How enormous is it for one man now to subscribe for three thousand papers, when we think of the time and labor spent when Benny Franklin's mother gave him that anxious lecture! Two of the most prominent, that of FRANK LESLIE, of 537 Pearl street, New York, publishing six periodicals: Illustrated Newspapers, the Chimney Corner, the Illustrirte Zeitung, Budget of Fun, Lady's Magazine, and Monthly, all filled with popular reading and illustrations. We give this as an instance of American enterprise, and success of modern ideas. Truly the world, in all its colors, in its sunny and shady views, is now brought vividly to every man's door, and a schoolmaster is in every house."

While thanking our cotemporary for the compliment embodied in the closing part of his article, we must remind him that he has he gives of our periodicals, though long, is incomplete, he having omitted our Ladies' Illustrated Almanac, our Illustrated Family Almanac, and our Budget of Fun Almanac, as well as our monthly magazine, called Frank Leslie's Children's Friend, saying nothing of our new periodical, now on the eve of publication, an illustrated newspaper in the Spanish language, called Frank Leslie's Ilustracion Americana, calculated for every part of the New World where the Spanish tongue is spoken, which comprises, with one exception, the entire of South America, besides Cuba, St. Domingo, Central America, Mexico, and many parts of California—in all of which the English and German languages are in North America, the Spanish is in South America and the West Indian islands. These periodicals make in all eleven publications, besides our new office, all more or less illustrated, and averaging over 420 engravings expressly prepared for us, and 470 pages of letter-press every issue.

We have had occasion, several times, to allude to the sweeping and radical legislation of Congress. This body was elected in time of war, and reflects the passions of war, and uncompromising hostility that era. A few of its members, looking to possible future combinations and personal preferment, affect a conservatism, but the great preponderation of action, and another larger party, representing what there is left of the "democracy," concur in the radical measures of what is called, although small and without a firm standpoint or rallying centre, an "opposition." This party includes the Cabinet of the President, who avowed purpose "is to support the President." But in what? The President has avowed no policy, but that of acquiescence, or what to appear sent, if we understand his position, the wishes of the people, and waits for their expression through the accredited representatives of the people. We do not understand him as committed to any specific form or process of "reconstruction," and, while sharing in the common wish that this shall be as speedy as possible, is just as ready to yield his individual notions on the subject as the humblest citizen.

Mr. Johnson was elected Vice-President under the same auspices and circumstances as was Congress—in a time of turmoil and excitement. Under other circumstances his nomination would probably never have been made, and we may assume that a very large proportion of both branches of the national legislature would not have reached their present positions in times of peace. They were not elected with reference to the serious questions that now demand attention, and absorb all thoughts. It will be wise on their part not to act as if the people, in their primary capacity, had expressed themselves on these questions, and they will show prudence by avoiding rash and precipitous measures. There is no need of haste in the rehabilitation of the lately rebel States. Time will show what measures are requisite to secure and perpetuate the objects for which the war was fought. Whatever there may be of legislation must be directed to this end, for we cannot afford to have the disturbing questions that are so nearly broke up the Union, left in another shape, to the next generation. Our revolution, for it was a revolution, must be radical and complete. But it need not be precipitate.

The CZAR of Russia has finally ended the independence of the Catholic Church in Poland. By the decree he has seized the whole of the property, real and personal, of the monasteries and regular clergy, and forbidden the legal collection of arrears of tithe. The object of this last measure is to make the payment of tithe voluntary. The clergy will henceforward be paid like other officials, and of course a priest who is refractory will find his salary fall gently into arrear. This last decree will probably complete the breach between St. Petersburg and Rome, already so marked, that, at a recent audience, the Pope ordered the Russian Envoy out of the room, for no less that "Catholicism in Russia meant revolution."

The recent great fire in the London Docks has occasioned a revival of the inquiry whether a quicker means than that at present in use for raising a fire-alarm, could not be found? An answer given by one of our ablest telegraphists makes it appear that nothing could be easier. He would suggest that every room of a warehouse, or any large building, and connect each one by a telegraphic wire with the nearest engine-houses. An electric thermometer, which the slightest warmer behaves in the usual way, but, should a fire break out, the increase of temperature acting on the thermometer, as soon as the mercury reached a certain height, send a signal, or ring a bell at all the stations with which it was connected. Such an instrument as this for giving early warning seems to be particularly suitable for tall buildings, where a fire may gain headway in the upper stories before it is discovered by the watchmen on the ground.

An enthusiastic believer in the theory of development through selection has recently solicited the King of Prussia's pecuniary aid on behalf of degenerate mankind. He hopes to be able to improve the human species of Europe by strictly applying the principle of natural selection, by which he means assure to the types of organic beings are gradually raised into higher. But his Majesty, though ready to admit that there was great room for improvement, declined the proposal, probably considering that his ancestor, Frederick the Great, had completely broken down the principle of certain experiment when trying to found a race of guards, by having all the tall people kidnapped and brought to Berlin.

During the Fenian trials in Ireland, a man, by the name of O'Keefe, who was arraigned for fomenting treason through articles in a newspaper, put in a plea in the mitigation of sentence, on the ground that he only wrote what he could get paid for, and he was especially paid for asserting that the country was oppressed and discontented. He did not see why he should be punished for doing what he was employed to do, nor did he see why he was more guilty than the man who attended the press on which the alleged treasonable newspaper was printed. Court held there was a difference; and, that publishers cannot expect their writers to write outside of their own opinions.

Among the numerous proposed amendments of the Constitution, is one by Mr. Ashley, of Ohio, limits the Presidential office to a single term. It is undoubtedly true that too many of our Presidents have spent their energies and misused their patronage to secure their election for a second term. This has been unfortunately true of all the "accidencies," or Vice-Presidents, who have obtained the high position in the nation through the death of the President. Witness Tyler and Fillmore. If the idea has introduced an amendment, which, as follows:

"ARTICLE 1.—When any State within this Union, or which may be hereafter created and admitted under the forms of law, shall attempt to absolve its citizens from their allegiance to the Government of United States, or shall by force of arms, resist the authority of the Government, and shall be declared in rebellion against the United States to be in a state of rebellion, such State shall thereby be considered as having forfeited all its rights and privileges as a State, and as having reverted to the condition of a territory, subject to the other territories, to the disposition of Congress; And the President of the United States shall, from time to time, by proclamation, close the ports of entry to such State, and shall proceed to occupy and govern the same, and hold such territory by military authority, until Congress shall have provided a government for the same."

A MISS EMMA HARDINGE, an English lady, who has long been a resident of a western community, where, we are told, she "has lectured with a success and influence unprecedented in the history of humanity" (!!!), is now astonishing, or trying to astound, the cockneys of London with her eloquence. The Saturday Review yields two columns to a notice of her performances, and says:

"As to the manner of the orations, it is really worth a visit to St. James's Hall to witness the phenomenon. Two hours of it was, as they would say in America, a caution; but ten minutes of Miss Hardinge is a treat of a sort. Such studied attitudinizing, such melo-dramatic starts and bounces, and solemn stalking about the stage; such a flux of talk—not a cataract, but a solidcontained, never-pausing rush of words; such a phonetic system of emphasis; such a rushing of statistics, and speaking a page of Curtius House returns with the air and accent and deportment of Cousiner or Lamartine at the least; rich impassioned speech on behalf of the grandeur and magnificence of $267,000 worth of dry goods—"all this was never before, in England at least, witnessed, even on a platform."

MR. S. BIRCH writes to the London Athenæum, propounding a new hypothesis regarding the moon, founded on observations of the photographic center of visibility of that luminary. Having as he says, familiarized his eyes to the stereoscopic appearance of snow, he has "come to the conviction that the surface of the moon turned toward the earth is in a glacial condition, and that the greater part of its surface is covered with ice and snow. For not only does the color of the luminous part of the moon's surface correspond to that of Alpine stereoscopes, but the texture of the surface is glacial, and evidently reflected from masses of ice and snow, presenting all the semi-transparent appearance of Alpine scenery where the principal parts are white, or more simply, the rock being only bared here and there. Now, the reason for determining this glacial state, is the whiteness in the undisturbed parts of the elevated portions, especially of the polar regions, and the peaks of the highest lunar mountains. For, if the moon's surface were composed of plutonic rocks, such as granites, traps, basalts, etc., or covered with lavas and cinders, or other volcanic products, these would give, when viewed stereoscopically, only the highest elevations, neutral, not white tints."

AN old story is related of Charles Lamb, but a good one, and may be new to some of our readers. A friend of a certain poet, or, rather, rhymester, submitted some of the verses of the latter to Lamb, for his judgment. He was to meet the gentleman at dinner, and the poems were shown to him a little before the author's arrival. When he came, he proved to be ample and corpulent. During dinner Lamb fell into the delightful drollery of saying, now and again, "That reminds me of some verses I wrote when I was very young," and then quoted a line or two, which he recollected, from the gentleman's book, to the latter's amazement and indignation. Lamb, immensely diverted, capped it all by introducing the first lines of "Paradise Lost"—"Of man's first disobedience," as also written by himself, which naturally brought the gentleman on his feet, bursting with wrath. He said he had sat by and allowed his own "little verses" to be taken without protest, but he could not endure to see Milton pilfered.

THERE is an insane tendency on the part of a certain class of our people to mutilate and destroy every object of art or curiosity within their reach. Not content with penciling their vulgar names on the walls of public edifices, or, worse still, carving them in with knives, they cannot refrain from robbing and defacing the commonest objects of utility which may happen to have some interesting association connected with it. A few days ago two women in Washington were arrested for clipping pieces from the curtains and laces in the White House, and now we learn that a funeral complaint made in Congress that all the more delicate sculptures in the relievo groups on the panels of the bronze doors of the Capitol have been broken off as relics or trophies by stupid hoors or unprincipled vagabonds. A watch should be set for the miserable wretches guilty of such vandalism, and they should be incontinently taken down into the vaults of the Capitol, and there soundly flogged. A few lessons of this kind would stop the evil.

IN a recent terrible gale off the coast of France the London, a fine screw steamship, bound for Australia, was lost, with 220 lives, only one small boat's load of whom and eighteen persons being saved. When, after laborious pumping, it was evident the ship must go down, Captain Martin informed the passengers that there was no further hope. They all met their inevitable fate with cool courage, listening quietly to the exhortations of Mr. Draper, a passenger on board, working strenuously at the pumps, and talking calmly. At last the port pinnace was lowered—the other boats having been washed away. Martin ordering his chief engineer to take the command, as the fires being out he could have no further duty to perform, and the engineer men and three second-class passengers got into her. There was still a vacant place, and a Mr. Richman was asked to take it, but "he pressed his wife to go with her," and refused. Then the captain was implored to go, but, in his own words, "he thought it his duty to go down with his passengers," and the same tone prevailed throughout. Finally several of the passengers loaded revolvers to shoot themselves as the ship went down, and so avoid the painful struggle with the waves, but, mindful of the proof that they used them, though the men in the boat saw the final catastrophe. They put off, and almost before they could get clear of the poop away went the passengers, and the ship immediately settle down, stern foremost, carrying down all on board.

THE cattle plague, which people here expect will reach the United States, with the cholera, in the spring, seems to be preventable in a degree, if not wholly. The disease which the kine-pox itself a safeguard to humanity, derived from the bovine race. According to accounts from England, vaccine virus from a child seems to be the best to begin with, the virus being subsequently communicated from animal to animal. Mr. Tollemache, the High Sheriff of Cheshire, has tried the experiment which, if it had been but a little more extensive, would have set the whole country vaccinating. He kept a vaccinated calf five days, in a small yard, with animals unmistakably sick with the disease, and the calf never even dropped its ears.

MR. DU CHAILLU, the Franco-American gentleman, who made a reputation out of gorillas, has now invented, or rather, discovered a race of dwarfs, the Obongo. There was so much trouble about making people believe his former stories, that he ought to have taken the precaution to add a photographic apparatus to the equipment for his last expedition. He says he met, in the equatorial region of West Africa, a race of little people called Obongos, and usually about a foot shorter than average Europeans and Americans. He only measured one man, the rest running away, and he was small; but he measured a number of women, the tallest of whom was five feet, while others ranged from four feet four and a quarter inches to four feet eight inches. Anything is possible in equatorial Africa, even a race of men, who, if such people seem smaller than the Lapps, and Mr. du Chaillu may one day meet a tribe with tails, the photographic apparatus would be very useful.

SIMPLY THIS, AND NOTHING MORE!

THE following are the passages, relating to the United States, in the speech of the Emperor of France, delivered at the Legislative Chambers, on the 23d January. We have commented on these in another place:

"In Mexico the government founded upon the will of the people is being consolidated. The opposition, reduced daily to impotence, will soon be annihilated, and national troops have displayed valor, and the country has found generals and soldiers in its ranks, which have developed its resources, and raised its commerce with the same ardor that they have displayed on the battle-fields of France.

"As I expressed the hope last year that our expedition was approaching its termination, I am coming to the understanding that I can withdraw my troops before the epoch for the recall of our troops, before their return in obedience to the unanimous desire of all. The American people will comprehend that our expedition, in which we have taken part, was opposed to their interests. Two nations equally jealous of their independence, should not every step which might effect their dignity and their honor."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A Mississippi paper announced that the taxes levied by the Legislature of that State would amount to 15,000 gals." The next paper explained that the amount levied was $15,000 in greenbacks, or $4,000 in gold.

— Lieut.-Gen. Grant has contributed the sum of $1,000 to the fund for the erection of a monument to Bishop Episcopal Church, Washington. Gen. Grant is of Methodist persuasion and confession, which in part explains his munificent contribution.

— According to the report of the Treasurer-General of Rhode Island, the receipts for the year 1867 were $90 81.

— The gross receipts of the three principal theatres of Philadelphia—Chestnut street, Arch street, and Walnut street—in March, 1867, were $470,00, upon which was paid to the amount of $8,389 90.

— The Maryland Legislature of Arizona Territory have adopted resolutions sustaining John N. Goodwin, the newly-elected Governor of the Territory, against misrepresentations by Charles D. Poston, late Governor.

— According to the Bangor Whig, a member of the Penobscot Bar offered to bet a hundred to one that in the verdict was against law and the weight of evidence, and that his client would be "hung higher than the personal beauty of the female plaintiff."

— The Democrats of Ohio will continue to invade the White House. The other day three women were arrested in the front room of the Presidential mansion, for clipping the curtains!

— It has been decided, in Massachusetts, that a regularly-married woman cannot be sued by a female couple in marriage.

— A man named Edmund John Chinaman, in California, purchased some ice, and, finding it very wet, laid it out to dry. When he went to look for it, it was gone. He found it had disappeared, and forthwith accused the whole Chinese population of larceny. A general riot was the consequence.

— Ice has been cut this year in the country in all Albany City, Penn. It comprises seven acres, is seven feet deep, and a half-mile race-course, with buildings and a track, will be made on the ice. Ice-boats, sleighing, etc.

— The first case of a colored man testifying against a white man, in the State of Maine, has occurred. The place on Saturday, in Nashville, at the trial of McGill, for assaulting and robbing Martin ordered by Brigham Young has been made a forlorn widower twenty-eight times. The Mormon prophet has now to witness so many bereavements with the fortitude of a Mormon only can. Hundred and eighty-five corpses are still spared to him.

— A Maine paper says there must either be rain or fish in the State, for the number of persons who visit the Maine law will have to be repealed, so that someone can get a drink.

— The fines, penalties and forfeitures collected in internal revenue cases for the six months last past amounted to $646,000.

— Judge Willey, in a recent speech in the House of Representatives, at Albany, N. Y., made the following statement that in one county in that State there were, in one week, 24 writs of habeas corpus issued, 23 on the complaint of courts, for the crime of larceny—two of the parties charged being women. The cause for the fearful increase in question justifies the hanging. It also contains the remedy, for it will be a terrible example to evil-disposers for stealing potatoes.

— The fine, penalties and forfeitures collected in internal revenue cases for the six months last past amounted to $646,000.

— Judge Willey, in a recent speech in the House of Representatives, at Albany, N. Y., made the following statement that in one county in that State there were, in one week, 24 writs of habeas corpus issued, 23 on the complaint of courts, for the crime of larceny—two of the parties charged being women. The cause for the fearful increase in question justifies the hanging. It also contains the remedy, for it will be a terrible example to evil-disposers for stealing potatoes.

— The Senate has confirmed Mrs. Henrietta Watts, from Dayton, Ohio, accompanied by her children, arrived in Chicago lately, on the cars from Cincinnati, in search of a man, who, after many inquiries as to her husband's whereabouts, found him in a low groggery, and they proceeded to a hotel for that purpose. While here, the man, by the practice of a little gentle persuasion of $250 belonging to Mrs. Watts, and absconded, leaving her entirely destitute of money.

— It is not generally known that soldiers who have been honorably discharged from United States are entitled to artificial substitutes, that can be procured at the expense of the Government, on the production of honorable discharge, and that the wound causing the loss of limb was received in the service. Soldiers are entitled to free of charge, and do not affect any pension or bounty—that is, they are not charged against the pension.

— A sensation was created in an Episcopal church in Rochester, by the sudden death of a lady during the reading of the Psalter, and while the words, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," were being repeated.

— A precocious pair, of fourteen and fifteen summers, respectively, residing in Baltimore, took it into their heads to get married, which they did, and started for the consummation of their happiness. They were followed, and found the youth selling papers, and the girl sewing for a clothing store, both happy as cooing doves. They, however, returned home with their friends.

— An attempt was made a few months ago to steal the corpse of a drowned man from the grave to which it had been consigned in Franklin Cemetery, Philadelphia. The superintendent of the Cemetery, enhanced by the barking of dogs, arose from his bed, and prevented the theft. The body of the man had been excavated from the grave.

— A horrid instance of the fearfulness of the times is recorded in the Louisville Journal, alluding to a recent interview with the President, says: "We expected to find the President weary and worn and haggard. Never was a greater mistake. He was in the finest and most vigorous health, his face as fresh as in earliest manhood, are the 'storms of state' beat upon him, and as calm and serene and cheerful as if only the congratulations of a new-born nation rested upon him. It could have been evident to any one; seeing him at the new levee, that he was a vigorous, self-poised man, confident, but not vainly or arrogantly confident, in his own strength, as firm-seated as a rock or mountain in his own deep and fixed purposes. His will is like his face, full of repose and power."

Foreign.—A funny scene occurred in the streets of Manchester, England, last month. The keepers of an elephant belonging to a traveling show were taking the animal through one of the public thoroughfares at one o'clock in the afternoon, when the passers-by became frightened at the unusual spectacle, and the police attempted to arrest the progress of the keepers, however, stimulated him to rest stance, and the elephant's trunk came in contact with the face of the wife of the officers. He struck the man, and they fled for their lives.

— Dr. Kane, the son of the celebrated Dr. Kane of Hedge's Academy, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, sent to the American consul, at that place, a rock or mountain who board at the hotel, a large bowl of punch, after the German custom. The landlord, in due course presented a large cake mounted with the American flag, and composed of arms, initials and monograms.

— The Chinese in the Colony of Victoria, Australia, are once every two years called upon to convey 500 cubits to China, a custom representing the idea of mortality among a certain class of celestials on the soil. Before they can be sent away the remains to China's soil is specially granted.

— Premiums for the working classes have been introduced into France lately, and have proved a great success. The Emperor personally distributes some of them, and the Minister of Public Instruction has decided to have them annually.

— The Aborigines of Australia are fast dying out, from the same cause which leads to the decay of the American Indians—rum. Only 10 couple are married of a race powerful trite. There has been only one child born among them for the last year.

— Mr. Lloyd, an Englishman, is going to establish a mineral colony in Mexico, near the city of Mexico, and a ship-load of European emigrants have been landed at Vera Cruz, en route for their settlement.

— There are 360 houses to be taken down in the city part of Paris before the 15th of April, which will cause 10,000 families, comprising 40,000 souls, to be displaced, and compel them to look for lodgings.

— Death having made several vacancies of late in the Senate of France, the Duke de Persigny, the present minister, no fewer than 15 scarlet hats to dispose of.

— There were in Paris, in 1865, 187 monasteries including ladies. Of these 92 are American, 77 are English, and 18 are Irish.

— Liszt, the great German composer, has received an official invitation to compose a march and mass for his approaching visit to Pesth, in honor of Emperor Joseph, at Pesth, as King of Hungary.

— The old Hall of Commons, in the English army, named Warren, was committed and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in the House of Correction, and was sent from the Westminster Palace Hotel, London, on the 4th January instant.

— The official statistics of the city of Rome give the number of inhabitants as follows: Men, 100,034; women, 95,597; priests, monks and nunneries, 3,124; military soldiers, 4,722; Jews, 4,495; prisoners, 317. Marriages, 1,000; births, 3,000; deaths, 2,000.

— The English court-martial which tried the captain and lieutenant of the Peiho steamer Bulldog, which destroyed at Cape Haytien, Hayti, found them guilty of "culpable negligence," and sentenced them to loss of service and the latter reprimanded.

— In Japan, in the Japanese sense of a new Roman Catholic cathedral was laid in Yokin. It is to be of massive construction, 100 feet long, and 150 feet in breadth, to the extremes of the transept. The spire will overtop the roof of the palaces of the imperial city.

— It is stated that Prince Christian, of Augustenburg, the future husband of the Princess Helena of England, will be appointed to the rank of Royal Highness. The royal couple are to reside in England, and Augustenburg is to be annexed to Prussia, the price which the assent of Parliament will be asked, is likely to be a dower of £30,000 and £8,000 a year. The marriage will not take place until June next.

— The Moniteur des Soies publishes a list of the prices of silks in France during the month of January, 1867, and the first of the present year, from which it appears that 32 articles of silk have risen in price since during the last year. The quantity of plain silks exported during the year 1866 was one year in equal to that exported during the year 1864, but the production of fancy silks has greatly increased.

— A terrible conflagration, attended with loss of life, occurred in the village of Ste. Anne de Prairie (near Olen), in a large farm-house, to which was attached an enormous storehouse for grain and straw. Many of the persons employed were at work or usual, when suddenly a great explosion occurred, followed immediately afterward the whole building was on fire. The part of the apartment in which the explosion occurred contained alcohol had burst, and the liquid catching fire, spread over a large space, with the above effections, igniting everything in its passage. At the moment of the explosion, a delight workman was engaged in drawing off alcohol. Four perished in the conflagration; the other two managed to escape, but were so severely burned that he died in great torture some hours after.

— A great woman died in Sydney, Australia, aged 107. She was a child with two heads. The baby, five weeks old, is a fine specimen of the "double" family, having been born with a second head attached to the front part of a normal one. The case is one in which the management would cause immediate death. The poor mother is unable to lay it down for a moment, and unable to dress it without the assistance of another person.

— Many railway travelers in England now carry with them a small instrument, by means of which they may let themselves out in cases of great emergency, and lock themselves in at will. The doors of the modern omnibus and gentlemen are made of silver.

— Among the nineteen people in Europe, whose names are known, who have died during the past year, most ever one hundred years, eleven were females. The average ages of women, we believe, are greater than those of men.

— The Neighborly Examiner draws a strange picture of the life of a Mormon in Salt Lake City. His palace is filled with awards of 800 people. There are some 60 wives of his, and about four husbands. Four attendants on each, and the remainder is made up of missionaries, prophesying Brahmins, officers of the Zouaves, etc.

— It is stated that the Viceroy of Egypt has given to the American mission at Cairo a block of houses worth 300,000 francs. His Highness is also said to have given the missionaries free passes for the railways, and to have thanked their religious journals and books shall not be subject to any tax.

— "Bull fights" are going out of fashion in Spain, their only remains are now found in private balls. A short time since an elephant of the name of Pizarro fought with a bull in the public ring. Wounded in the trunk, he at first drew back, hesitated, then rushed on his foe, who, as he came, received a rolling away like a ball, and meanwhile crushed the ribs of the other under his monstrous feet.

— Two youths in Paris were the admirers of an actress at one of the boulevard theatres. One night since they were both at the theatre, and both flung flowers to the fair object of their affection. The lucky took up only one of the bouquets, whereupon the slighted swain drew out and the fairest of the two through the body with a rapier. The wounded man is not expected to recover.

— A Dr. Thompson Whaley has been arrested in London on a charge of destroying Miss Pitman's genital liselium Company, by inclining the lives of some of his patients. In one instance the patient whom he had insured died of a cancer in the rectum, an incurable complaint. The prisoner was committed for trial.

FOUR DAYS WITHOUT SLEEP.

AMONG the punishments practiced by the Chinese, who seem to have a preternatural ingenuity in devising those which are most painful and insidious, is that of inflicting death by depriving the alleged criminal of sleep. In 1830, a Chinese merchant of Amoy was condemned to suffer this process. He was under the care of guards, who were relieved every two hours, that each one might not be prevented from closing his eyes night or day. On the eighth day, his sufferings were so intense that he begged to be strangled, and this boon was granted to relieve him.

We are reminded of this incident by an account, now going the rounds of the newspapers, of a contest of endurance by R., who lately undertook, in a wager, to walk 100 miles in as many consecutive hours. We do not recommend the example, as we do not relish his foolish ambition for notoriety. He undertook his feat in a public hall, a certain number of circuits of which constituted a mile. He started at two o'clock in the afternoon of the first twenty-four hours, he became weary, and felt a longer disposition to sleep, which he resolutely resisted. This was driven off, but the effort produced a severe headache, which continued during the remaining hours. On the fourth day he felt drowsy, but resolved that he would sit down without napping. Every hour the circuits of the mile were forty-two times regularly performed, in three ranging from twenty to thirty minutes. On that morning he began to be discouraged, and expressed a wish to abandon the contest. His advisers persuaded him, and he renewed his efforts, and as he expressed it, with a determined will to succeed.

On the third day he was much wakeful, but nervous excitement kept him up—principally by the aiming tea, which was his only beverage. His head was bandaged, and his temples rubbed with camphor. He stumbled from weariness and weariness, but got up without help. The fourth and last day was one of weariness, sleeping, aching and prostration. He required to be supported as he went his hourly rounds. In his 99th hour he fainted and fell, and in his 100th hour he was lifted up and went with ram and alarm. In the ninty-ninth hour he again fell in darkness. He was then at length carried into his sestarts, he completed his forty-two circuits in twenty-three minutes. He now received from them the idea that he had accomplished his feat, and, gathering his faculties, he walked with assistance across the hall, to show that he was still awake, and amid the cheers of the audience, he retired.

In an hour's time he was at his home and on his pillow. But for him sound sleep was not safe; a watchful attendant was with him through the night, awaking him every hour. He was under an strong nervous excitement that he at times had to be held in bed by his attendants. His gums were loose, his teeth ready to travel, and that his bandages were lost, and that his bathing sponge was lost, and that he could not by his exclamations. Next morning he was better, but he has not yet got rid of the swelling of his limbs, of weariness in his back, and of his headache. He took his meals regularly during the four days, and his appetite as the doctors prepared.

It is hard to say to what extent of human endurance; he has no idea that he could have sustained himself three hours longer. Although he gained nothing by the bet, and $200 as admission fees, yet ten times that amount would not induce him again to make a like effort.

His feat was performed in the course of the two years since. In Baltimore it was attempted by a man who died in the ninty-seventh hour.

DOES THE SPIDER EAT ITS WEB?

FRAUD with emulation, I carefully watched a common garden spider (Epeira diadema), which I found in entire charge of the web, and saw her, after completing the web of a fine, fat spider, and the owner appeared extensively astonished as her web collapsed around her. She then ran to the centre, and commenced eating the web, which she ate with great avidity. Her mouth was in constant motion, and the web disappeared from it, and in an instant the claws of each was shot out with a celerity that I could not follow. The web, which was given in exactly the same manner as a cat strikes her prey with her fore-paws, showing her more accurate than that it would be the height of folly to stop where he was; and, indeed, I found it so, for, in a moment, I found myself down on to a convolvulus leaf. My friend rushed to the spot where Spider No. 2 had descended, and, observing on it the other end of which, he let it remain there, was in consequence of the web. Spider No. 2 by the web, and, in a moment, was in her own body, forcing it in with her two front claws, and in a few moments not a vestige was left.

THE best way to be happy is not to want anything until you have got it, and then be saving of it. Many a man would be a good thing to have, so one has not too much of it.

AN IRISH POST OFFICE AT KERRY, IRELAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.

THE LIFE LADDER FOR ENGLISH ICE SPORTS.

IT will be interesting to such of our readers as are skaters, or who believe in the sports of the ice, to get an idea of the life-saving contrivances of the English. This ladder is the one presented by the Royal Humane Society to Prince Albert, and used by the royal bathing parties at Virginia Water, in Windsor Park. The manner of its use is obvious, and it is calculated to reach 22 feet beyond the reach of the men guiding it.

In this country, so far as we have heard, there are no life-saving ice ladders. On Central Park there is no necessity for such an article, the public not being allowed on the pond until its safety is beyond question, and even should a skater go in, the depth of water would not be above the waist of an ordinary sized man. On other places through the country, such, for instance, as Jamaica Pond, Boston, or the Schuylkill, Philadelphia, its use would be great, and might be the means of saving many lives.

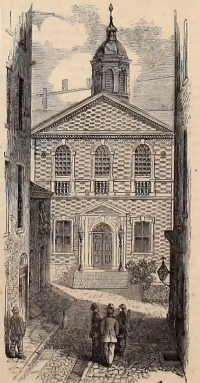
INTERIOR VIEW OF CARPENTERS' HALL, PHILADELPHIA—THE OLD CONGRESS DESK AND CHAIRS. SEE PAGE 365.

HEN AND CHICKENS,
By Sir Edwin Landseer.

WE [illegible]nt this week one of those exquisite works of art, well worthy of being cut from the pages and framed. Sir Edwin Landseer is an artist to whom the world is indebted for more popular pictures than perhaps any that have ever lived. We mention a few of these, which must be familiar to all who have any taste in art, from the fact of their having been multiplied by thousands of engravings: "Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time," "Wellington Visiting the Field of Waterloo," "Laying Down the Law," "War" and "Peace," "Jack in Office," and a hundred others, that will stamp his name highest on the list of eminent painters. Of all his beautiful pictures "The Hen and Chickens" is not the least, either in that perfect expression he gives to everything that comes from under his hand, or purely as a work of art.

OLD CONTINENTAL CONGRESS CHAIR AND BUCKETS, AT CARPENTERS' HALL.

AN IRISH POST OFFICE IN KILLARNEY.



WE give, this week, another of the sketches taken by our special Artist, who went to Valencia Bay to sketch the laying of the Atlantic cable. The scene is a few miles from the town of Killarney, on the road to Cahirciveen. To all the country round the Post Office is a spot of wonderful interest, and about its mud walls, and under its thatch, gathers all the village gossip. The arrival of the American mail is a matter of especial interest, and then comes those who have relatives in every part of this great country, to get letters, or hear those of others read, perhaps to get the remittances of money that aid them in joining the ones they love best on earth.

The Post Office everywhere is a spot of great interest, but the Irish Post Office is especially so, from the fact of its intimate connection with this country, and that through it many of the people get the pittance which will keep them from starvation, and, perhaps, by some hard-working relative in the land of the free and the home of the brave.

AN IMPORTANT LIFE-SAVING INVENTION.

Brown & Level's Safety Boat Tackle

THE United States revenue cutter Cuyahoga, Captain John Faunce, made a trip down the bay, for the purpose of testing a newly-invented apparatus for lowering boats overboard from vessels while under headway, or in a rough sea. It is well-known to seafaring men that great difficulty and danger are often encountered in clearing a boat from its tackle while the vessel is in motion, or when a heavy sea is running; and in many cases of disasters at sea, the boats, which otherwise might have been available in saving the lives of the passengers and crew, are swamped, or crushed alongside, before they can be got clear of the vessel.

EXTERIOR OF CARPENTERS' HALL, PHILA.

THE ENGLISH, ILLUSTRATED BY THEMSELVES—GREENWICH FAIR.

By the use of this new method of attaching the tackle, a boat can be instantly cleared from all attachments to the vessel by one man, either when the boat is resting in the water, or at any height above it.

In the experiments on the 5th of February, an ordinary ship's cutter, with all its crew on board, was repeatedly dropped overboard while the steamer was under full headway, and landed in perfect safety, and without shipping any noticeable amount of water.

The boat was lowered in the usual manner from the davits, and at the word of command from the officer on deck, one of the oarsmen, sitting amidships, instantly disconnected the boat from the tackle, and allowed her to float away. This was done sometimes with the boat resting in the water, and sometimes while she was several feet from it. In case of necessity, as of a person falling overboard, a boat can be dropped directly from the davits, without lowering at all, or checking the headway of the vessel. The cost of the apparatus is comparatively trifling, and there seems no reason why it should not at once be adopted on all sea-going vessels. With the terrible list of lives lost by shipwreck which the last year presents, it cannot be reckoned less than a crime to neglect any attainable means of increased safety for the future. The officers of the Cuyahoga expressed themselves highly gratified with the result of the experiment. We have seen, also, statements from the commanding officers of the United States revenue cutter Shubrick, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamers Colorado and Golden City, on all of which vessels the apparatus has been used, all of whom speak in high terms of its efficiency and usefulness.

Those of our readers who have not forgotten the terrible loss of life on board the ill-fated steamers Golden Gate and Brother Jonathan, on the Pacific coast, will recollect that it was attributed to the inability of detaching the boats. As a late instance, we can cite the steamship London, lost with 200 lives. Had this vessel (as the former-mentioned) been provided with Brown & Level's Tackle, the boats, instead of being swamped or stove, would have carried off all her passengers safely, as the one boat-load did escape. In ordinary cases of foundering at sea, scarcely one boat in ten escapes in the launching. If this is so—and no sailor doubts it—what is the use of boats, except they be provided with some safe and reliable tackle? In recommending this great invention, we are actuated by two motives—one, as a matter of humanity; and the other, a patriotic pride that an American has been the first to promulgate it. The owners and inventors of the apparatus are Messrs. Brown & Level, of San Francisco, Cal.

THE PRESENT MODE OF LAUNCHING A BOAT. WITH ITS DANGERS.

GREENWICH FAIR, ENGLAND.

GREENWICH is a beautiful village, about five miles from London, and situated on the south side of the river Thames. Every reader of Sir Walter Scott must remember it as being the scene of Sir Walter Raleigh's famous cloak adventure with good Queen Bess, as the English delight to call the lion-hearted, hard-fisted daughter of that model Englishman, Henry VIII. Here the sovereigns of England had a palace, which was built, in 1433, by the Duke of Gloucester, father to Richard III. Previously to this, it had been the residence of Edward I. The palace built by Gloucester was enlarged and improved by Edward IV., and Henry VII. lived here most of his time. At Greenwich, Henry VIII., Mary, and Elizabeth were born. But Greenwich now is chiefly remarkable for four things—the royal hospital for aged and disabled sailors of the British navy, the astronomical observatory, the park, and the fair, which is held at Easter.

Greenwich sends two members to Parliament, and has a population of about 130,000 persons. But the event we have most to do with is the fair, which our picture presents a scene from. This lasts three days, and commences on Easter Monday. Hither all the cockneys wend, and regale themselves with gingerbread-nuts, ale, and every conceivable game, from donkey-racing and purse-shows to pitch and toss, and the drama, both tragic and comic—saying nothing about pantomime and single combats, which represent our British Jack-Tar vanquishing half-a-dozen Frenchmen—is always immensely popular.

In order to enjoy a Greenwich fair, you should start at London Bridge, and drive along the road leading to Greenwich. About a mile out of London, every vacant spot from there to Greenwich is occupied with a booth, in which the principal articles for sale are gingerbread of every conceivable shape, from a human heart to a cock in boots, covered with gold leaf; toys, candies, etc., make up the components. On arriving at the fair, which is held in the park, you are greeted with numberless bands of music, all playing different tunes. The booths are given up to the drama—a full-grown tragedy lasting about ten minutes; it abounds in ghosts, murders, trap-doors, and single combats, and defies description.

This scene of riot and debauchery was kept up for three days and three nights with such gusto, that it has lately been abolished by act of Parliament, not without a severe struggle on the part of the old topers, who maintained that it was part and parcel of the British Constitution, and ought to be, like the curfew of the Medes and Persians, immutable! As a relic of the past, and an instance of the manners of an age fast passing away, we have thought it might interest our readers.

BROWN & LEVEL'S, NEW LIFE-SAVING TACKLE, FOR DISENGAGING BOATS FROM DAVITS INSTANTANEOUSLY.

CRAWFORD AND THE NEGRO.

BY J. W. WATSON.

[WHEN Crawford was making his statue of "Freedom" to surmount the dome of the Capitol, the man who had superintended the mechanism of the work from the commencement, left him, after making an excessive demand, declaring that his demand would have to be acceded to, as he was the only man in America who could do the work. A negro slave, who had assisted in the modeling, declared his ability to accomplish the labor, and was entrusted with it. The statue entered the world from under his hands.]

THE sculptor watched the ponderous mass
Grow daily in his hungry eyes,
And dreamed of all his wealth of fame,
When the proud goddess should arise,
And in completeness sweep the skies,
And cry aloud his name.

Upreared before a nation's gaze,
The marble pile in vastness stands,
Crowned by its gorgeous sunlit dome,
Touched by so many misty hands,
And looking forth on many lands,
Is "Freedom's" future home.

Before the stalwart founder's arm,
The molten metal, sound and true,
In wondrous strength and artist will,
And queenly beauty daily grew;
While rapture, dash, and daring, too,
The workmen ply their skill.

Slaves were they all, those dusky men;
They knew of Freedom as a word,
A fable, like some fairy tale,
A something that they once had heard,
And in their pulses wildly stirred,
Their tawny cheeks grew pale.

Meanwhile the glorious work went on;
The bubbling iron filled the mold;
Each bid and trust in its place,
Proves worth its weight in virgin gold,
While limb, and tress, and draping fold,
In fulness grew apace.

At last, when hope was at its height,
The massive workman, strong to greed,
Stood boldly forth—not dusky he—
And said, "Be gold my only meed,
I know no other faith or creed—
The work must stop for me."

The sculptor stood aghast and mute,
Till one among that tawny crew,
His light within, claimed speech with him.
"Trust me, my master, 'tis my due
To bear this burden safely through Am I not strong of limb?"

Something within those earnest eyes
That reached the sculptor's failing heart,
And thus he made the dusky slave:
"Take thou the master-workman's part,
Thine be the strength and mine the art,
And we shall 'Freedom' save!"

Then went the molders bravely on,
While fluid rivet found their place,
The work was one perpetual song
Before this tawny, dusky race,
And thus the statue grew apace,
As grew the nation strong.

Fair "Freedom," clad in beauteous strength,
Has found her future heavenward home;
The master and his dusky horde,
Now freemen free to stay or roam,
Watch their great mother on the dome,
And humbly praise the Lord.

THE SHEPHERD'S HUT;

OR,

'TIS THIRTEEN YEARS SINCE.

IT was a bitter night in June; and, although there was neither snow nor ice, for such phenomena rarely distinguish an Australian winter, yet the fierce wind blew from the south-west-ocean with a hollow roar and a penetrating power that no great-coat could defy. Never had I felt such a chilliness at the very bones as on this, to me, eventful evening in the year 1852, when, issuing from the long, irregularly built wooden structure kept by the name of the "Café de l'Europe" into Bourke street, I made my way through the uneven, rut-wrinkled streets of Melbourne towards the little inn called "The Golden Nugget," where I expected to find my horse and gig.

What magical changes do a few years sometimes produce! Can this princely city that I now behold, with its broad, well-paved, gas-lit streets, that would not disgrace the West End of London, and actually put to shame those of our great manufacturing capitals of Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham; this city, with its glittering shops, its noble public buildings, elegant churches, and charitable institutions, its theatres, concert halls, museums, libraries, giant warehouses and docks, its business and its riches; this city that cries second to few of its century-aged rivals in the old world; can it indeed be the same as the comfortless, dreary spot of almost Siberian wretchedness that I knew fourteen years since?

But most of my readers, if they did not see, have yet been made familiar, in the pages of the colonial or home press, with the aspect of Melbourne at the first breaking out of the gold fever. It is during this stormy period that the incidents of my tale are laid, and that I first set foot on the shores of this great continent.

I did not come, however, as a seeker of the yellow metal. I had no ambition to become a digger. In fact, reason taught me then what experience has since convinced me of—that he who, like Ned toil, finds the gold, makes not so great a profit as he who, keeping to his trade and profession, wins by his brains the wealth secondhand.

I was a detective police-officer, and I quitted the service at home for reasons which my conscience approved of, and on, in a great measure, to an adventure which I have no space to relate here, but which would supply incidents for a more sensational story than the present, in which form I may one day tell it you.

Bound by honor not again to exercise my calling in the old country, I had taken a berth aboard 60 in the new; and when I arrived at Melbourne at the close of the year 1851, I found there was plenty of opening for me. The police arrangements were very ineffective—murders, stabbings, and other outrages were of frequent occurrence in the city, and throughout the country round—prowling ruffians—escaped convicts from Sydney or Van Diemen's Land—were ever ready to waylay and murder the wandering digger, for the sake of the gold they expected to find on his person.

One of the greatest scoundrels of the latter class had, by the number of murders he had committed, earned the cognomen of "Dick the Devil." His outrages had extended to within a quarter of a mile of the town; he was wont to boast that he killed a man a week, and robbed one a day; and no sooner was a new gang for his capture, that one thousand pounds were offered for his body, alive or dead.

This was the very night I was about to seek when I quitted the "Café de l'Europe," and turned my steps down Bourke street on the evening in question.

I had come to the knowledge that he would be at a hut a mile or so off the highway to Dundas, at eleven o'clock that night. This hut was inhabited by a shepherd belonging to a neighboring run, who was evidently, through fear or inclination, an accomplice of the ruffian. I did not, however, fear the odds against me—the reward offered was more than commensurate with the danger incurred. Had I taken an ally, that reward must have been shared, which I did not care for; the entire possession was the honor of the affair would have to be divided also. A revolver and a bowie-knife were my best friends; and the only thing that caused me misgiving was, that a recent kick from a horse prevented my crossing a saddle, or walking very far. I therefore hired a light gig; for I knew the wretch to whom a mile of the spot to be a pretty good one, and I could then hobble my horse, and creep the rest of the distance on foot.

I consulted my watch—it was nine o'clock, and as I had eight miles to drive, and perhaps one to walk, it was time to be off. So, after tossing off a nobbler of rum-punch to keep the cold out, and examining the caps on my revolver, I clambered into my conveyance, whipped behind, gathered up the reins, and whipped the rawboned old mare into a trot.

It should have been a light night, for the moon was nearly at its full; but the heavy masses of cloud only allowed her radiance to appear occasionally, and other times, when its darkness was so intense that I could scarcely see my horse's head. This, however, I did not very much heed. I knew that the old mare knew every inch of the road. I had received information that I could not very well mistake as to the discovery of the shepherd's hut, unlike the peculiar features of which in a long engaged rendered darkness more welcome than light to me.

I had proceeded in this way some three miles or so, when a shrill voice hailed me with:

"Arrah, your honor, will ye be giving a pair lone woman a lift as far as the hill to Bundora, and it's many thanks she'll offer ye for the throuble?"

I drew in my sorry nag at this sudden greeting, and as I did so, the moonlight broke through from a rift in the leaden clouds, and I beheld, standing close to the roadside, a gaunt and decrepid-looking hag of some seventy years of age, in rags and clothes a mere bundle of rags, and filthy-looking in the extreme, whilst from beneath a large mob-cap, which once, doubtless, had been white, but now retained little evidence of the fact, a lock or two of straggling gray hair waved in the wind. In short, the appearance of this strange old woman resembled so closely one of the weird sisterhood in "Macbeth," that a more unattractive companion for a lonely ride I'd've scouted from my thoughts.

"What are you doing here at this time of night, my friend?" I asked.

"Och, faith, your honor, ye may well ask the question. Sure, and it's the market I've been attinding at all day, and then I bided to tak' a dish o' tay wid a neighbor, and the night's crotuk us talking o' old times."

"Why did you not stop at your friend's all night, then? It would save you more than tramping this lonely road at such an hour."

"Ah, I should anger the old man, yer worship, who's a waiting up for me, and he's not a pinny bit of a beating I shall catch as it is, "sho answered, in a shrill voice.

Not wishing to be delayed longer, I bade the old woman jump up, which she did with an alacrity not to be expected in her years, and the journey was resumed. For a mile or so my companion was silent, while I was too much absorbed in my own reflections to open a conversation. Then, however, the two or three wooden houses that then composed the village of Flemington were passed, and the lights that I had noted from the windows of the little inn, known as the Halfway House, had grown like tiny stars in our rear, my strange companion again found her tongue, and gabbled away with such garrulity that I began to grow doubtful whether she was insane, or rather the worse for "a drop of the crather." She continued thus for some miles, and I had begun to wish her at a region at least as remote as Jericho, when the moon again shone forth with a sudden radiance that for a moment quite dazzled my sight.

It was at this moment that, glancing down to see that the small bag, containing handcuffs and a few other little implements of my craft, had not fallen out of my pocket, I observed a strange object sticking out o the pocket of my companion. Could it be? I looked again. Yes, it was—the steel-mounted butt of a pistol—a genuine Colt's revolver. I knew it in an instant by the shape, and could scarcely refrain giving a whistle of surprise. I looked at the face of the hoarer, and now, in the clear moonlight, I could perceive that the deep wrinkles in the cheeks were skillfully put on with burnt cork, and that the straggling locks of gray hair were the fascinations of a wig.

I was clearly in a trap; my own firearms were buckled over in my breast pocket. Were I to drop either rein or whip, the suspicion of the bushranger—for I doubted not the profession of the supposed old woman—would be roused, and I could draw my own weapon, I should have a bullet through my head.

What strategy can't accomplish, skill must, is an old axiom of my profession; so, turning round, I exclaimed:

"I fear my horse has got a stone in his shoe, mother; you won't be afraid to hold the reins a minute, whilst I jump down and see, will you?"

The old woman assented to my request within a quarter of a mile of the town; he was wont to boast that he killed a man a week, and robbed one a day; and no sooner was a new gang for his capture, that one thousand pounds were offered for his body, alive or dead.

This was the very night I was about to seek when I quitted the "Café de l'Europe," and turned my steps down Bourke street on the evening in question.

I had come to the knowledge that he would be at a hut a mile or so off the highway to Dundas, at eleven o'clock that night. This hut was inhabited by a shepherd belonging to a neighboring run, who was evidently, through fear or inclination, an accomplice of the ruffian. I did not, however, fear the odds against me—the reward offered was more than commensurate with the danger incurred. Had I taken an ally, that reward must have been shared, which I did not care for; the entire possession was the honor of the affair would have to be divided also. A revolver and a bowie-knife were my best friends; and the only thing that caused me misgiving was, that a recent kick from a horse prevented my crossing a saddle, or walking very far. I therefore hired a light gig; for I knew the wretch to whom a mile of the spot to be a pretty good one, and I could then hobble my horse, and creep the rest of the distance on foot.

I consulted my watch—it was nine o'clock, and as I had eight miles to drive, and perhaps one to walk, it was time to be off. So, after tossing off a nobbler of rum-punch to keep the cold out, and examining the caps on my revolver, I clambered into my conveyance, whipped behind, gathered up the reins, and whipped the rawboned old mare into a trot.

It should have been a light night, for the moon was nearly at its full; but the heavy masses of cloud only allowed her radiance to appear occasionally, and other times, when its darkness was so intense that I could scarcely see my horse's head. This, however, I did not very much heed. I knew that the old mare knew every inch of the road. I had received information that I could not very well mistake as to the discovery of the shepherd's hut, unlike the peculiar features of which in a long engaged rendered darkness more welcome than light to me.

I had proceeded in this way some three miles or so, when a shrill voice hailed me with:

"Arrah, your honor, will ye be giving a pair lone woman a lift as far as the hill to Bundora, and it's many thanks she'll offer ye for the throuble?"

I drew in my sorry nag at this sudden greeting, and as I did so, the moonlight broke through from a rift in the leaden clouds, and I beheld, standing close to the roadside, a gaunt and decrepid-looking hag of some seventy years of age, in rags and clothes a mere bundle of rags, and filthy-looking in the extreme, whilst from beneath a large mob-cap, which once, doubtless, had been white, but now retained little evidence of the fact, a lock or two of straggling gray hair waved in the wind. In short, the appearance of this strange old woman resembled so closely one of the weird sisterhood in "Macbeth," that a more unattractive companion for a lonely ride I'd've scouted from my thoughts.

"What are you doing here at this time of night, my friend?" I asked.

"Och, faith, your honor, ye may well ask the question. Sure, and it's the market I've been attinding at all day, and then I bided to tak' a dish o' tay wid a neighbor, and the night's crotuk us talking o' old times."

"Why did you not stop at your friend's all night, then? It would save you more than tramping this lonely road at such an hour."

"Ah, I should anger the old man, yer worship, who's a waiting up for me, and he's not a pinny bit of a beating I shall catch as it is," she answered, in a shrill voice.

Not wishing to be delayed longer, I bade the old woman jump up, which she did with an alacrity not to be expected in her years, and the journey was resumed. For a mile or so my companion was silent, while I was too much absorbed in my own reflections to open a conversation. Then, however, the two or three wooden houses that then composed the village of Flemington were passed, and the lights that I had noted from the windows of the little inn, known as the Halfway House, had grown like tiny stars in our rear, my strange companion again found her tongue, and gabbled away with such garrulity that I began to grow doubtful whether she was insane, or rather the worse for "a drop of the crather." She continued thus for some miles, and I had begun to wish her at a region at least as remote as Jericho, when the moon again shone forth with a sudden radiance that for a moment quite dazzled my sight.

As I ceased speaking, the man gave us both a scrutinizing glance, and then said:

"Fairly spoken, Mr. Policeman. I am an honest fellow myself, and so I bids you welcome. Drive that ragamuffin indoors, while I take your horse round to the stables."

I resigned the animal to the master of the house, for he did look an honest fellow, and the nag was not worth stealing; besides, I could not keep an eye on it and my captive, whom I now followed into the dwelling.

The first object that caught my eye on entering the kitchen was an American clock; the hands pointed to eleven. It was the hour appointed for my nabbing "Dick the Devil," at the shepherd's hut. And a sight engaged me as I thought of the thousand pounds reward, and the way it had slipped through my fingers.

My spy-glance had put an end to by the return of our host, accompanied by two young men of about twenty-five and twenty years of age respectively, whom he introduced as sons. They were both strongly built young fellows, but would neither of them attain the almost Herculean proportions of their father, who looked a perfect Samson in the ruddy firelight, which now enabled me to view his countenance, and note the aspect of the apartment. The man had my full attention. He was attired in the ordinary costume of a shepherd, or small farmer; he might have been forty-five years of age, for his short black hair was turning slightly gray, but certainly he was not more; he was upward of six feet in height, and broad-chested and stout sturdy built in proportion —in fact, his well-set muscular figure showed great strength; his face was pleasing and open, save when in perfect repose, then only a kind of half sneer, half scowl rested on it, and seemed as though caused by some malformation of nature, rather than the result of habit.

The room was plainly furnished, as is usual in the bush. A roughly-hewn table, a chair, half-a-dozen three-legged stools, and the usual clock before referred to, formed the greater portion of it. On the mantel-piece of a few logs of wood kindled on the hearth, were a few iron hard scones, resting on a brick at each end, supported the tea-kettle and a saucepan or two, from whence issued a savory aroma, strongly suggestive to an empty stomach. The walls were decked with an atrocious print of "Queen Victoria and Albert," a rifle, fowling-piece, double-barreled gun, and a brace of old flint pistols. As you may imagine, the weapons attracted my attention, the more as they were all save the pistols, oiled and on full half cock. Still, in such a lonely situation, and so far away from the settlements, and the country around swarming with bushrangers, escaped convicts, and rascals of every description, there were very slight grounds for suspicion in all this.

"Come, lads, let's have some supper. I've fed and watered your nag, sir, and now we must attend to ourselves, as I expect going to be at third of the world sit at table with me. I've a rather below will suit him better," added the farmer, contemptuously, as he glanced toward my strangely attired prisoner, who returned the favor with a fierce scowl.

I gratefully availed myself of this offer, and found the cellar a secure place; that it was both damp and dark was not my fault. I unbound the prisoner, said, however, keeping a watchful eye on, and pushed him in. Our host threw him some straw, and giving him some bread and beef, we left him to his reflections.

We now turned our undivided attention to the supper, which, though perhaps wanting in quality, was ample in quantity. A bowl of mutton was fished out of one saucepan, a huge mess of potatoes from another; the bread was taken from the hearth, a large pannikin jug of ale, with a black bottle of whisky, put on the table.

Rendered hungry by my long drive, I did justice to the substantial viands before me, and over a glass of grog, listened to the worthy shepherd's account of the death of his wife from typhus fever. Of the mother-in-law, the only daughter with a curate policeman; of the murrain in the cattle, and the rot in his sheep; of the last great bush fire, and other like matters of small interest, getting drowsy, I proposed to go to bed.

It was time I did so. The fire had long since gone out, the clock pointed to two in the morning, and as I rose to depart, the remains of the candle sunk in its iron socket, and left us in darkness.

"Here is a pretty go," said the shepherd, after a fruitless rummage in every corner of the room. "I've not another dip left, and I've forgot where to light us to pick up nuggets. You must go to bed in the dark."

"Never, not that, my mar," said I; "the moon shines brightly. Lead the way."

"Will you not leave your great-coat and arms here?" suggested the host.

"No, my friend, my pistols and I never part company," I answered, with a laugh; and whistling for my dog, the men good-night, followed their father to my room.

This was, however, no easy matter. I had to grope my way after him along a dark passage, at the end of which he ushered me into an apartment where there was no other light than that given by the moon, which shone through a small window glazed with little panes of coarse glass. Here he bade me good-night, and with apologies for the poor accommodation, left me.

The apartment was small. In one corner stood a bed of that shape commonly called, in the colonies, a stretcher; this, with a coarse basinstand, a broken chair, and a ship locking-glass, made up the furniture. Like an old traveler, I turned to secure the door; but it had only a small thumb latch.

I piled the washing-stand, together with the chair, against it in such a manner that no one could enter without making a noise sufficient to wake me. To make all sure, I felt in my pocket to see that the key of the cellar wherein I had confined my prisoner was there. It was all right. I then examined the charges in mine and the bushranger's revolver, and placing both under my pillow, without undressing, threw myself on the bed, and weary and worn-out by my night's adventures, prepared to sleep.

For a time, a species of nervous wakefulness possessed me; the moaning of the passing wind, the flapping of a loose board on the roof above, the fitful shadows of a gigantic gum-tree thrown by the moonlight on the damp and discolored walls, and above all, the deep bay of dogs in the yard beneath my window, baffled my every endeavor to slumber; and when at length I was about to drop off, a whispering of human voices in the next room again put me on the qui vive. I could not help fancying that I was the subject of their conversation, and I could swear that I heard the voice of my prisoner joining in the discussion. Creeping from my bed, I put my ear to the wall, and thanks to the loose jointing of the boards, could hear what was spoken.

The villains, of whom the bushranger seemed the leader, were coolly discussing a method of my murder—that is, as to what is my bed.

The moment I discovered these amiable intentions, I rose to my feet, and reflected. I had my revolvers—there were twelve lives in the barrels—that was, if neither of the barrels missed a life; but might not these assassins have revolvers also? At all events, I was very near to one, and master of the hut a perfect Hercules of strength. My mind was made up—I would run.

Then rose the question—how?

The rascals were traversing the passage; my feeble barricade would not stop them a minute. I gave a glance around the room, espied a rope in one corner—a long rope. I secured one end of it to a strong iron ring that happened providentially to be in the wall; then I noiselessly opened the casement, and dropped the other end out through the window, following it myself; but I did not intend to descend yet.

My foot found rest on one of the projecting logs of which the house was built; by pulling the rope up through the window, above which half my head and the six barrels of my revolver were alone visible, I had yet to bid my hospitable entertainers farewell.

I had not to wait long. The moonlight presently showed me the handle of the opposite door turn, the door to open half an inch. I waited no longer, bang, bang, bang, went three barrels of my revolver, and exclaiming, "Good-by, dear friends, you won't forget me!" I began descending my rope.

A shriek of pain, and hoarse curses from above, told me that I had not thrown away my powder. I congratulated myself on an escape; when turning to look below, I saw the red, fiery eyes of a ferocious dog looking up at me; his deep muzzle, broad chest, and grayish white coat of wiry hair, showed him to be a bloodhound; and with a thrill of horror, I saw that I must drop right at his feet.

I leveled my pistol at him, and tried to steady myself on the rope to take aim. My first shot missed him, the second gave him only a slight wound that rendered him the more dangerous; when I felt that I must give way; it had been cut above, and I fell some five or six feet, almost into his very jaws.

I beheld the fierce brute about to spring on me; at the same moment, a clattering volley rang out from above, and I heard half a dozen bullets hiss by my head, burying themselves with a dull thud in the earth. Though little intended for the purpose, that volley saved my life; every ball missed me; but one passed through the head of the bloodhound, who was now lying dead across my body. It was a providential escape; but I had not yet out my wood, and there was no time to lose. I could hear the muttered curses of disappointment, and hear ramming of new charges home, as those above saw me move. Throwing off the dead brute, whose weight nearly stifled me, I fired the last barrel of my revolver at the window, and with the satisfaction saw the big shepherd clasp his hand to his face, which, in an instant, became covered with blood; then, springing to my feet, I ran for my life, I knew not whither.

Immediately, however, I was checked by a high fence. At any other time I should have found this an almost difficult fence to surmount; but now a love of life gave me strength and experience; even my sore leg was forgotten, and in an instant I was at the summit. The sharp crack of a rifle rang out on the still night air; I saw my wide-awake fly from my head, and felt a scrape like that of a hot razor across my scalp, but I did not stay to ponder on that. Springing down on the off side, I again took to my heels, loading my revolver as I went, and ramming a bullet home in each barrel.

In about five minutes' time I stopped to regain my breath, and from behind a gum-tree looked at the log house.

It lay a little more than a quarter of a mile distant, clearly defined in the bright light of the moon, which now shone down from an unclouded heaven. The night was so still that even the spring of the bushranger could be heard, and I listened with breathless anxiety for the sound of the pursuit.

Presently, the deep, fierce bay of dogs smote upon my ear, mingled with shoutings and laughter. I saw three figures and two powerful hounds emerge from the shadow of the fence. They were urging the dogs on the trail.

I again commenced my flight. I had not, however, run more than half a mile, when I caught my foot in a hole, and was brought to with a sprained ankle.

I ground my teeth in despair. I glanced around; the dogs were only a hundred yards or so in my rear, running neck and neck, their great tongues lolling out of their mouths, thus displaying their formidable fangs, their eyes flashing fire, too eager for my blood even to give tongue.

I looked wistfully around. A ray of hope dawned upon my soul; a pal from me stood a gum-tree more bushy and thick with foliage than its neighbors.

With great difficulty I clambered up its trunk, got amongst its thickest branches, and with my new revolver in one paw, prepared to sell my life as dearly as possible.

I knew they must come within range to see me; they could not use their rifles now, save at hap-hazard; while from the dogs I was quite safe. And one of the brutes was howling with baffled rage at the foot of the tree.

I did not notice them; my powder was for their masters.

Presently they drew near; not advancing boldly, for they knew I was armed, but dodging from tree to tree. The foremost was a powerful man, with his head tied up in a blood-stained bandage; the bushranger (now attired in male apparel), and one of the women I had before supposed I had shot—which was, in fact, the case.

At last the villains opened fire, but thanks to the shelter afforded by the tree, I was not hit by my marksmanship. I returned the compliment whenever a head showed itself from behind a tree, but I was more than ever sure that I could not carry trunk of the one in which I was concealed. His eyes met mine; I fired two shots at him, and missed; the next moment a ball struck me.

"Hang you!" he muttered; "that shot of yours has won you a thousand pounds. I am 'Dick the Devil;' but you shall have the start of me, my chicken."

His finger was on the trigger, for now he could aim at his leisure; reckless, death's hand was upon him, and he fell at my feet a corpse.

The same moment a rattling volley echoed around me. I saw the bushranger and his son running for their lives, pursued by two of the Melbourne mounted police.

The fugitives were captured, tried, condemned, and hanged. I pocketed the thousand pounds, less some couple of hundred with which I rewarded my brave rescuers, and left Melbourne for Sydney.

TOWN COSSIP

IF we were asked upon what subject the larger part of the people of New York were at this moment thinking most earnestly, we should answer, without going us down to the very material answer, "Where they are to live next May."

To country people, or those of most other cities, this may seem a strange thing to think of, as applied in that way, to this city, with its fearful acres of ruins; but its population once a year—on the 1st of May—the transition is great, the change is universal, the whole over-taxed city, we are to thousand houses short of the requisite number to make its people barely comfortable. Practical facts in this matter are to be made at the worst city in the world for the poor man, or be of moderate means, to live in. Rents go up for a house, or in the shape of the city. It is confined, and can spread but one way. It is like a wedge, and the business is constantly driving it further up. Houses are almost unusually pushing the dwellers upward toward the heavens. They have spread, to some extent, in several small cities on the opposite sides of the water, as Brooklyn, Jersey City, Hoboken, etc., but the great pressure is toward the city, and the rents are the worst of real estate, or rather, the supposed value. It can be seen in the great activity in the erection of flats and tall tenements, for they are really sold. The setting price is too great for investment, and, taking the chances for a cool 20 per cent rent, the owner sells the house on paper to document to the capitalist than real estate. The reason of this is, simply that the present high rent is sure to continue to advance. The purchaser must drive the population to expedient, either crowding them into the smallest space, or building high, that he and his people can live where there is only one now.

Viewing the matter in the favorable light, why do not capitalists do something to encourage the people to go out of town. Within ten miles of this city, there are thousands of acres of land, capable of every whim for that reason. The first point is to make them easy and cheap of access. If the working man can get to and fro in 20 minutes or 1 hour, spending an hour in the journey, and paying seven cents, why would he not go to the suburbs, where he can have a house, garden, and in the same time? On the Erie road, for instance, the ten miles can be run in twenty minutes, and the fare would not be more than seven cents. Hundreds of neat cottages may be built, which, with half an acre of ground attached, may be rented to such mechanic or the working-man his four rooms, at a rental of $60 per annum, and by breathing fresh air, and a change of life, would be worth to him double that sum.

The subject is a great one, and worthy the attention of capitalists. A company could be formed to build up small towns within hailing distance, and the rise on the value of the property, as soon as it is properly done, is a fortune in a few years. Only think of the change in a short time would make the company one of the most prosperous and popular ones up.

The great sensation of the week has been the Arion ball, given in honor of the members of the Arion Society, attended by all the world and his wife. They met on the 22nd ult., and the ball was given on the following night, from the hour of 9 P. M. to 4 A. M., the hour was unbroken by the most positive pause, and the dancing went on for the most hilarious moments. Surely such a night was never seen, and to those who are unacquainted with the vast preparation, the great amount of money spent, and the long previous discussion of the matter in every circle, there can really be no imagination of the thing as it occurs.

At 9 o'clock the people begin to arrive, the large main hall packed and in fancy dress. Every character is there, and all description is useless. The brain of the whole city is at work to invent something new and startling in the dress line, and it succeeds tolerably. The spectator who walks about the room, can have but a small idea of the variety of costume; but let him be seated, and watch the figures moving past for an hour or two, and there will, in that time, be change enough to give him material in front of him for days of life. We have all heard of the grand mask balls of the opera at Paris, but the most prejudiced who have seen both, declare that our mask balls of the Arion and Lyceum surpass in splendor and variety those of Paris.

At this ball the decorations of the room alone cost $8,000, and they were in the style. From every picture hung long draperies, elegantly pinned, and tipped off with a golden star, and the walls were garlanded in massive star, executed in color and gold, beautifully effective. Into the centre of which hung a gigantic bouquet, into which was worked the letters: "Arion," and the whole presented a rich look of gold and color. At the extreme end of the room a stage was erected, having for its centre piece a representation of a Thirty Avenue car. On this stage, through the evening, were performances of a character to suit the general character, and each creating for itself a laugh. These little interludes were very amusing. In the middle of the evening came the great feature, the procession. This represented a ball at the Tuileries, in the days of Louis, surpassed the old days of the invincibles. It was under the same name with the ball, John G. Heath, Secretary of the Arions, and on its march was applauded to a degree that would have astonished the management. Just below the stage a company of gymnasts went through a performance that would rival the Blondins—and what can we say better?—while on every side the floor was crowded with the gay promenaders, as knights, were busily at work doing all they could to enhance the pleasure of the hour. Here and there about the room were small fountains of cologne or perfumed waters, which were sprinkled occasionally in silken streams.

The supper rooms were bountifully served, and after midnight, were a scene not easily forgotten. There was dressed at a long counter, the long-necked Rhine wine bottles glistening before them, or the long-necked champagne bottles in every direction, while the edibles disappeared by cart-loads. In the commissariat department, we noticed that the fine appreciation of all that tempts the eye or taste, that was from time and dinner-table memories. The bouquets, jellies, wild, etc., and so forth.

In two rooms Dutch Ball is a sensation. It can never goes to ball, let them go once to an Arion. Or they be a newcomer to the city, and would once walk in a phase that cannot be shown elsewhere in this world, let them go to the Arion. It is a grand ball, and stay till it's closed. We say till 12, because then, by invitation, we all go to Delmonico's, and dinner with breakfast as well as gymnasts must stand revealed in the picture above, and which half my head and the six barrels of my revolver were alone visible. I had yet to bid my hospitable entertainers farewell.

I had not to wait long. The moonlight presently showed me the handle of the opposite door turn, the door to open half an inch. I waited no longer, bang, bang, bang, went three barrels of my revolver, and exclaiming, "Good-by, dear friends, you won't forget me!" I began descending my rope.

A shriek of pain, and hoarse curses from above, told me that I had not thrown away my powder. I congratulated myself on an escape; when turning to look below, I saw the red, fiery eyes of a ferocious dog looking up at me; his deep muzzle, broad chest, and grayish white coat of wiry hair, showed him to be a bloodhound; and with a thrill of horror, I saw that I must drop right at his feet.

I leveled my pistol at him, and tried to steady myself on the rope to take aim. My first shot missed him, the second gave him only a slight wound that rendered him the more dangerous; when I felt that I must give way; it had been cut above, and I fell some five or six feet, almost into his very jaws.

I beheld the fierce brute about to spring on me; at the same moment, a clattering volley rang out from above, and I heard half a dozen bullets hiss by my head, burying themselves with a dull thud in the earth. Though little intended for the purpose, that volley saved my life; every ball missed me; but one passed through the head of the bloodhound, who was now lying dead across my body. It was a providential escape; but I had not yet out my wood, and there was no time to lose. I could hear the muttered curses of disappointment, and hear ramming of new charges home, as those above saw me move. Throwing off the dead brute, whose weight nearly stifled me, I fired the last barrel of my revolver at the window, and with the satisfaction saw the big shepherd clasp his hand to his face, which, in an instant, became covered with blood; then, springing to my feet, I ran for my life, I knew not whither.

Immediately, however, I was checked by a high fence. At any other time I should have found this an almost difficult fence to surmount; but now a love of life gave me strength and experience; even my sore leg was forgotten, and in an instant I was at the summit. The sharp crack of a rifle rang out on the still night air; I saw my wide-awake fly from my head, and felt a scrape like that of a hot razor across my scalp, but I did not stay to ponder on that. Springing down on the off side, I again took to my heels, loading my revolver as I went, and ramming a bullet home in each barrel.

In about five minutes' time I stopped to regain my breath, and from behind a gum-tree looked at the log house.

It lay a little more than a quarter of a mile distant, clearly defined in the bright light of the moon, which now shone down from an unclouded heaven. The night was so still that even the spring of the bushranger could be heard, and I listened with breathless anxiety for the sound of the pursuit.

Presently, the deep, fierce bay of dogs smote upon my ear, mingled with shoutings and laughter. I saw three figures and two powerful hounds emerge from the shadow of the fence. They were urging the dogs on the trail.

I again commenced my flight. I had not, however, run more than half a mile, when I caught my foot in a hole, and was brought to with a sprained ankle.

I ground my teeth in despair. I glanced around; the dogs were only a hundred yards or so in my rear, running neck and neck, their great tongues lolling out of their mouths, thus displaying their formidable fangs, their eyes flashing fire, too eager for my blood even to give tongue.

I looked wistfully around. A ray of hope dawned upon my soul; a pal from me stood a gum-tree more bushy and thick with foliage than its neighbors.

With great difficulty I clambered up its trunk, got amongst its thickest branches, and with my new revolver in one paw, prepared to sell my life as dearly as possible.

I knew they must come within range to see me; they could not use their rifles now, save at hap-hazard; while from the dogs I was quite safe. And one of the brutes was howling with baffled rage at the foot of the tree.

I did not notice them; my powder was for their masters.

Presently they drew near; not advancing boldly, for they knew I was armed, but dodging from tree to tree. The foremost was a powerful man, with his head tied up in a blood-stained bandage; the bushranger (now attired in male apparel), and one of the women I had before supposed I had shot—which was, in fact, the case.

At last the villains opened fire, but thanks to the shelter afforded by the tree, I was not hit by my marksmanship. I returned the compliment whenever a head showed itself from behind a tree, but I was more than ever sure that I could not carry trunk of the one in which I was concealed. His eyes met mine; I fired two shots at him, and missed; the next moment a ball struck me.

"Hang you!" he muttered; "that shot of yours has won you a thousand pounds. I am 'Dick the Devil;' but you shall have the start of me, my chicken."

His finger was on the trigger, for now he could aim at his leisure; reckless, death's hand was upon him, and he fell at my feet a corpse.

The same moment a rattling volley echoed around me. I saw the bushranger and his son running for their lives, pursued by two of the Melbourne mounted police.

The fugitives were captured, tried, condemned, and hanged. I pocketed the thousand pounds, less some couple of hundred with which I rewarded my brave rescuers, and left Melbourne for Sydney.

TOWN COSSIP

IF we were asked upon what subject the larger part of the people of New York were at this moment thinking most earnestly, we should answer, without going us down to the very material answer, "Where they are to live next May."

To country people, or those of most other cities, this may seem a strange thing to think of, as applied in that way, to this city, with its fearful acres of ruins; but its population once a year—on the 1st of May—the transition is great, the change is universal, the whole over-taxed city, we are to thousand houses short of the requisite number to make its people barely comfortable. Practical facts in this matter are to be made at the worst city in the world for the poor man, or be of moderate means, to live in. Rents go up for a house, or in the shape of the city. It is confined, and can spread but one way. It is like a wedge, and the business is constantly driving it further up. Houses are almost unusually pushing the dwellers upward toward the heavens. They have spread, to some extent, in several small cities on the opposite sides of the water, as Brooklyn, Jersey City, Hoboken, etc., but the great pressure is toward the city, and the rents are the worst of real estate, or rather, the supposed value. It can be seen in the great activity in the erection of flats and tall tenements, for they are really sold. The setting price is too great for investment, and, taking the chances for a cool 20 per cent rent, the owner sells the house on paper to document to the capitalist than real estate. The reason of this is, simply that the present high rent is sure to continue to advance. The purchaser must drive the population to expedient, either crowding them into the smallest space, or building high, that he and his people can live where there is only one now.

Viewing the matter in the favorable light, why do not capitalists do something to encourage the people to go out of town. Within ten miles of this city, there are thousands of acres of land, capable of every whim for that reason. The first point is to make them easy and cheap of access. If the working man can get to and fro in 20 minutes or 1 hour, spending an hour in the journey, and paying seven cents, why would he not go to the suburbs, where he can have a house, garden, and in the same time? On the Erie road, for instance, the ten miles can be run in twenty minutes, and the fare would not be more than seven cents. Hundreds of neat cottages may be built, which, with half an acre of ground attached, may be rented to such mechanic or the working-man his four rooms, at a rental of $60 per annum, and by breathing fresh air, and a change of life, would be worth to him double that sum.

The subject is a great one, and worthy the attention of capitalists. A company could be formed to build up small towns within hailing distance, and the rise on the value of the property, as soon as it is properly done, is a fortune in a few years. Only think of the change in a short time would make the company one of the most prosperous and popular ones up.

The great sensation of the week has been the Arion ball, given in honor of the members of the Arion Society, attended by all the world and his wife. They met on the 22nd ult., and the ball was given on the following night, from the hour of 9 P. M. to 4 A. M., the hour was unbroken by the most positive pause, and the dancing went on for the most hilarious moments. Surely such a night was never seen, and to those who are unacquainted with the vast preparation, the great amount of money spent, and the long previous discussion of the matter in every circle, there can really be no imagination of the thing as it occurs.

At 9 o'clock the people begin to arrive, the large main hall packed and in fancy dress. Every character is there, and all description is useless. The brain of the whole city is at work to invent something new and startling in the dress line, and it succeeds tolerably. The spectator who walks about the room, can have but a small idea of the variety of costume; but let him be seated, and watch the figures moving past for an hour or two, and there will, in that time, be change enough to give him material in front of him for days of life. We have all heard of the grand mask balls of the opera at Paris, but the most prejudiced who have seen both, declare that our mask balls of the Arion and Lyceum surpass in splendor and variety those of Paris.

At this ball the decorations of the room alone cost $8,000, and they were in the style. From every picture hung long draperies, elegantly pinned, and tipped off with a golden star, and the walls were garlanded in massive star, executed in color and gold, beautifully effective. Into the centre of which hung a gigantic bouquet, into which was worked the letters: "Arion," and the whole presented a rich look of gold and color. At the extreme end of the room a stage was erected, having for its centre piece a representation of a Thirty Avenue car. On this stage, through the evening, were performances of a character to suit the general character, and each creating for itself a laugh. These little interludes were very amusing. In the middle of the evening came the great feature, the procession. This represented a ball at the Tuileries, in the days of Louis, surpassed the old days of the invincibles. It was under the same name with the ball, John G. Heath, Secretary of the Arions, and on its march was applauded to a degree that would have astonished the management. Just below the stage a company of gymnasts went through a performance that would rival the Blondins—and what can we say better?—while on every side the floor was crowded with the gay promenaders, as knights, were busily at work doing all they could to enhance the pleasure of the hour. Here and there about the room were small fountains of cologne or perfumed waters, which were sprinkled occasionally in silken streams.

The supper rooms were bountifully served, and after midnight, were a scene not easily forgotten. There was dressed at a long counter, the long-necked Rhine wine bottles glistening before them, or the long-necked champagne bottles in every direction, while the edibles disappeared by cart-loads. In the commissariat department, we noticed that the fine appreciation of all that tempts the eye or taste, that was from time and dinner-table memories. The bouquets, jellies, wild, etc., and so forth.

In two rooms Dutch Ball is a sensation. It can never goes to ball, let them go once to an Arion. Or they be a newcomer to the city, and would once walk in a phase that cannot be shown elsewhere in this world, let them go to the Arion. It is a grand ball, and stay till it's closed. We say till 12, because then, by invitation, we all go to Delmonico's, and dinner with breakfast as well as gymnasts must stand revealed in the picture above, and which half my head and the six barrels of my revolver were alone visible. I had yet to bid my hospitable entertainers farewell.

I had not to wait long. The moonlight presently showed me the handle of the opposite door turn, the door to open half an inch. I waited no longer, bang, bang, bang, went three barrels of my revolver, and exclaiming, "Good-by, dear friends, you won't forget me!" I began descending my rope.

A shriek of pain, and hoarse curses from above, told me that I had not thrown away my powder. I congratulated myself on an escape; when turning to look below, I saw the red, fiery eyes of a ferocious dog looking up at me; his deep muzzle, broad chest, and grayish white coat of wiry hair, showed him to be a bloodhound; and with a thrill of horror, I saw that I must drop right at his feet.

I leveled my pistol at him, and tried to steady myself on the rope to take aim. My first shot missed him, the second gave him only a slight wound that rendered him the more dangerous; when I felt that I must give way; it had been cut above, and I fell some five or six feet, almost into his very jaws.

I beheld the fierce brute about to spring on me; at the same moment, a clattering volley rang out from above, and I heard half a dozen bullets hiss by my head, burying themselves with a dull thud in the earth. Though little intended for the purpose, that volley saved my life; every ball missed me; but one passed through the head of the bloodhound, who was now lying dead across my body. It was a providential escape; but I had not yet out my wood, and there was no time to lose. I could hear the muttered curses of disappointment, and hear ramming of new charges home, as those above saw me move. Throwing off the dead brute, whose weight nearly stifled me, I fired the last barrel of my revolver at the window, and with the satisfaction saw the big shepherd clasp his hand to his face, which, in an instant, became covered with blood; then, springing to my feet, I ran for my life, I knew not whither.

Immediately, however, I was checked by a high fence. At any other time I should have found this an almost difficult fence to surmount; but now a love of life gave me strength and experience; even my sore leg was forgotten, and in an instant I was at the summit. The sharp crack of a rifle rang out on the still night air; I saw my wide-awake fly from my head, and felt a scrape like that of a hot razor across my scalp, but I did not stay to ponder on that. Springing down on the off side, I again took to my heels, loading my revolver as I went, and ramming a bullet home in each barrel.

In about five minutes' time I stopped to regain my breath, and from behind a gum-tree looked at the log house.

It lay a little more than a quarter of a mile distant, clearly defined in the bright light of the moon, which now shone down from an unclouded heaven. The night was so still that even the spring of the bushranger could be heard, and I listened with breathless anxiety for the sound of the pursuit.

Presently, the deep, fierce bay of dogs smote upon my ear, mingled with shoutings and laughter. I saw three figures and two powerful hounds emerge from the shadow of the fence. They were urging the dogs on the trail.

I again commenced my flight. I had not, however, run more than half a mile, when I caught my foot in a hole, and was brought to with a sprained ankle.

I ground my teeth in despair. I glanced around; the dogs were only a hundred yards or so in my rear, running neck and neck, their great tongues lolling out of their mouths, thus displaying their formidable fangs, their eyes flashing fire, too eager for my blood even to give tongue.

I looked wistfully around. A ray of hope dawned upon my soul; a pal from me stood a gum-tree more bushy and thick with foliage than its neighbors.

With great difficulty I clambered up its trunk, got amongst its thickest branches, and with my new revolver in one paw, prepared to sell my life as dearly as possible.

I knew they must come within range to see me; they could not use their rifles now, save at hap-hazard; while from the dogs I was quite safe. And one of the brutes was howling with baffled rage at the foot of the tree.

I did not notice them; my powder was for their masters.

Presently they drew near; not advancing boldly, for they knew I was armed, but dodging from tree to tree. The foremost was a powerful man, with his head tied up in a blood-stained bandage; the bushranger (now attired in male apparel), and one of the women I had before supposed I had shot—which was, in fact, the case.

At last the villains opened fire, but thanks to the shelter afforded by the tree, I was not hit by my marksmanship. I returned the compliment whenever a head showed itself from behind a tree, but I was more than ever sure that I could not carry trunk of the one in which I was concealed. His eyes met mine; I fired two shots at him, and missed; the next moment a ball struck me.

"Hang you!" he muttered; "that shot of yours has won you a thousand pounds. I am 'Dick the Devil;' but you shall have the start of me, my chicken."

His finger was on the trigger, for now he could aim at his leisure; reckless, death's hand was upon him, and he fell at my feet a corpse.

The same moment a rattling volley echoed around me. I saw the bushranger and his son running for their lives, pursued by two of the Melbourne mounted police.

The fugitives were captured, tried, condemned, and hanged. I pocketed the thousand pounds, less some couple of hundred with which I rewarded my brave rescuers, and left Melbourne for Sydney.

TOWN COSSIP

IF we were asked upon what subject the larger part of the people of New York were at this moment thinking most earnestly, we should answer, without going us down to the very material answer, "Where they are to live next May."

To country people, or those of most other cities, this may seem a strange thing to think of, as applied in that way, to this city, with its fearful acres of ruins; but its population once a year—on the 1st of May—the transition is great, the change is universal, the whole over-taxed city, we are to thousand houses short of the requisite number to make its people barely comfortable. Practical facts in this matter are to be made at the worst city in the world for the poor man, or be of moderate means, to live in. Rents go up for a house, or in the shape of the city. It is confined, and can spread but one way. It is like a wedge, and the business is constantly driving it further up. Houses are almost unusually pushing the dwellers upward toward the heavens. They have spread, to some extent, in several small cities on the opposite sides of the water, as Brooklyn, Jersey City, Hoboken, etc., but the great pressure is toward the city, and the rents are the worst of real estate, or rather, the supposed value. It can be seen in the great activity in the erection of flats and tall tenements, for they are really sold. The setting price is too great for investment, and, taking the chances for a cool 20 per cent rent, the owner sells the house on paper to document to the capitalist than real estate. The reason of this is, simply that the present high rent is sure to continue to advance. The purchaser must drive the population to expedient, either crowding them into the smallest space, or building high, that he and his people can live where there is only one now.

Viewing the matter in the favorable light, why do not capitalists do something to encourage the people to go out of town. Within ten miles of this city, there are thousands of acres of land, capable of every whim for that reason. The first point is to make them easy and cheap of access. If the working man can get to and fro in 20 minutes or 1 hour, spending an hour in the journey, and paying seven cents, why would he not go to the suburbs, where he can have a house, garden, and in the same time? On the Erie road, for instance, the ten miles can be run in twenty minutes, and the fare would not be more than seven cents. Hundreds of neat cottages may be built, which, with half an acre of ground attached, may be rented to such mechanic or the working-man his four rooms, at a rental of $60 per annum, and by breathing fresh air, and a change of life, would be worth to him double that sum.

The subject is a great one, and worthy the attention of capitalists. A company could be formed to build up small towns within hailing distance, and the rise on the value of the property, as soon as it is properly done, is a fortune in a few years. Only think of the change in a short time would make the company one of the most prosperous and popular ones up.

The great sensation of the week has been the Arion ball, given in honor of the members of the Arion Society, attended by all the world and his wife. They met on the 22nd ult., and the ball was given on the following night, from the hour of 9 P. M. to 4 A. M., the hour was unbroken by the most positive pause, and the dancing went on for the most hilarious moments. Surely such a night was never seen, and to those who are unacquainted with the vast preparation, the great amount of money spent, and the long previous discussion of the matter in every circle, there can really be no imagination of the thing as it occurs.

At 9 o'clock the people begin to arrive, the large main hall packed and in fancy dress. Every character is there, and all description is useless. The brain of the whole city is at work to invent something new and startling in the dress line, and it succeeds tolerably. The spectator who walks about the room, can

The only joke that Lieut.-Gen Grant was ever known to perpetrate, was one day during his campaigning in Mississippi, when the rebel General Wheeler was coming up to attack one of the wings of his army, where the Commander-in-Chief happened to be himself present. Gentlemen," said Grant, quickly knocking the ashes from his cigar, and looking around at the officers near him, "you see severe Winter approaching, and I advise you to have the boys keep up a good fire!"

INTERESTING OLD DOCUMEN..

A LATE Fredericksburg Ledger contains the will of the mother of Washington, as written by herself, and recorded in the Clerk's office of Spotsylvania county. Such a venerable document, which carries us back to the days and scenes of the infancy of this now mighty republic, cannot be otherwise than interesting to every reader, and we therefore hasten to hand up to it! By what extraordinary events has American progress, since the date of this will to the present time, been distinguished!

"IN THE WASHINGTON'S WILL.

"We publish below this rare and curious document. The original is in possession of our worthy Clerk, J. J. Lewis, Esq., who kindly placed it at our disposal.

"The elegant terms in which she attends to several private transactions of African 'scrub,' 'fee simple,' 'mulatto,' which shows one of our 'Northern brethren.'

"Her Esq., who kindly placed it at our disposal.

"In the name of God. Amen. I, Mary Washington, in the state of Virginia, and county of Spotsylvania, being in good health, but calling to mind the uncertainty of this life, and being desirous of settling matters of my worldly estate, do make and publish this my last will, hereby revoking all wills and testaments by me heretofore, hoping for a remission of my sins, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of mankind. I dispose of all my worldly estates as follows:

"Item. I give and devise to my daughter, George Washington, all my lands on Accokeek run, in the county of Stafford, and also my negro boy George, Sam and his heirs for ever; also my best bed, bedstead, and Virginia rug, my quilted blue and white quilt, and my best dressing-case.

"Item. I give and devise to my son, Charles Washington, my negro boy Lewis, to him, and his heirs for ever.

"Item. I give and devise to my daughter, Betty Lewis, my plantation and devise to my daughter-in-law, Hannah Washington, my purple cloth cloak, lined with fur.

"Item. I give and devise to my grandson, Corbin Washington, my negro woman Ann, her daughter Chloe, and two black horses, to him and his assigns for ever.

"Item. I give and devise to my grandson, Fielding Lewis, my negro man Frederick, to him and his assigns for ever; also my great looking-glass, my walnut desk and drawers, a square dining-table, one bed, bedstead, bolster, pillows, blankets, one chest, one bedstead, one sheets, one pr. blankets, and white cotton counterpane, two pr. sheets, one pr. blankets, one bolster, and one pillow, one half of my iron kitchen furniture.

"Item. I give and devise to my grandson, Lawrence Lewis, my negro wench Lydia, to him and his assigns for ever.

"Item. I give and devise to my grand-daughter, Betty Lewis, my negro woman Ilitt and her future increase, to her and her assigns for ever; also, my looking-glass, my walnut dressing-table and drawers, a square dining-table, one bed, bedstead, bolster, pillows, one chest, one bedstead, one sheets, one pr. blankets, and white cotton counterpane, two pr. sheets, one pr. blankets, one bolster, and one pillow, one half of my iron kitchen furniture.

"Item. I give and devise to my grandson, Lawrence Lewis, my negro wench Lydia, to him and his assigns for ever.

"Item. I give and devise to my grand-daughter, Betty Lewis, my negro woman Ilitt and her future increase, to her and her assigns for ever; also, my looking-glass, my walnut dressing-table and drawers, a square dining-table, one bed, bedstead, bolster, pillows, one chest, one bedstead, one sheets, one pr. blankets, and white cotton counterpane, two pr. sheets, one pr. blankets, one bolster, and one pillow, one half of my iron kitchen furniture.

"Item. I give to my grandson, George Washington, my best silver waiter, and to my grandson, Lawrence, one pillow, one pair sheets, one blanket, and counterpane.

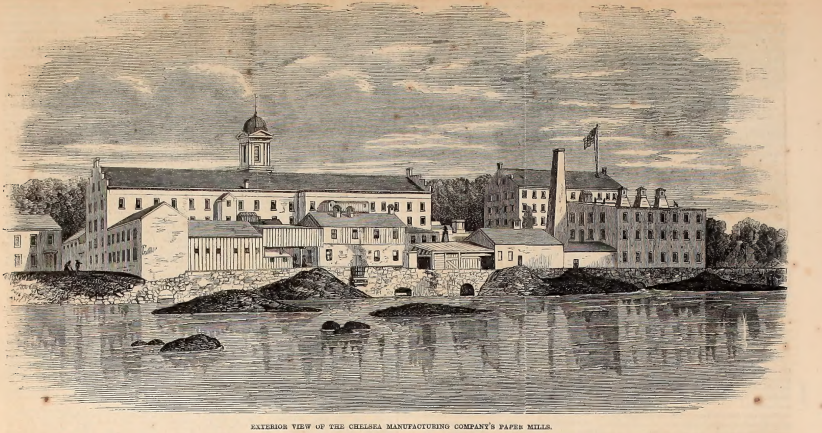
"Item. I devise all my remaining apparel to be equally divided between my grand-daughters, Betty Lewis, Fanny Ball, and Milly Washington; but should my daughter-in-law, Betty Lewis, fancy any of these articles thereof, she is to have them before a division is made.

"Item. Inasmuch and appoint my said son, General George Washington, executor of this my will, and a owe few or no debts, I direct my executor to give no security, nor to render an account of my estate; but may be allotted to my devisees with as little trouble and as much dispatch as attending their successors thereof as the token I now have to give them of my love for them.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 20th day of May, 1788.

"MARY WASHINGTON (seal).

"Signed, sealed, and published in our presence, and we have set our hands thereto, this 2nd May Washington, at her desire.



"JAMES MERCER,
"Witnesses, JOSEPH WALKER, JOHN FERNEYHOUGH."

A PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR FOR THE UNION, by Mrs. ANN S. Stephens, containing nearly 1,000 pages, beautifully embellished with engravings, by some of our best artists, has just been published by Mr. J. E. Tilton, of this city, publisher. This work is calculated to attract more attention than any book of the kind that has yet got up, owing to the fulness and the absence of all bias, from its careful and truthful detail of facts, from which every reader can from its general reliableness. The price is also an inducement to purchase, how well a book can be got up without extravagance of charge. We predict for it a great sale and popularity.

A PASSION FOR WATCHES.—In the city of Boston there is an individual who may be said to have a passion for watches. He has at the present time seventeen hundred watches. He has them of every size from an inch to a foot in diameter. Some of the finest gold, and others of the coarsest workmanship, but very costly and valuable from their rarity. Some are in pearls, another in diamonds, and another in all sorts of precious stones; and he has a watch for every character of man from high to the others. One strikes like a miniature clock every hour, another plays a tune, and another sings a song, another seems to sing like a little bird. One or two are unincumbered by cases, and massive gold ones are nearly a quarter of an inch in thickness; others are as small as a dime. Each possesses some peculiar and singular key, chain and seal. Some are kept wound up, and the hour and minute hands of each is wound up and cared for every day by the hand of the owner. He has a room for them in his dwelling, and their appendages is a great as that of other people in their parlors, or libraries, or bedrooms.

HOW THE OPERA OF MARITANA CAME TO BE WRITTEN.—Howard St. Leger, a friend of W. V. Wallace, was dining with him one night at Paris, when Maritana: "I think it must have been early in the month of August, 1844, for the sun had not yet retired behind the horizon like a ball of gold, when my late friend (the author of the opera) came to Dublin. We met, by appointment, in the drawing-room window of 87 Piccadilly, "St. Leger," said Wallace, "I have determined to write an opera." I answered immediately: 'Of course you could; and I should be very glad to assist you.' I remember," said Wallace, 'what has it to do for a libretto?' I answered: 'Oh, that is quite easy.' I then started to read some celebrated opera books for my friend Balfe, and,' added I, 'as it is a subject that interests me, as it is a new country, and as Pitt-Ball lives in the Portland Road, let us start from there.' Wallace agreed, and we started for Pitt-Ball's residence. Arrived there, I knocked at the door, and waited for it to be opened. It was opened by a genteel looking man, and Pitt-Ball was at home. I then introduced Wallace to Pitt-Ball, told him he was a compatriot of mine, and Pitt-Ball was so enchanted with the exquisite melodies my dear friend played, that he gave him the first act of Maritana just before we left."

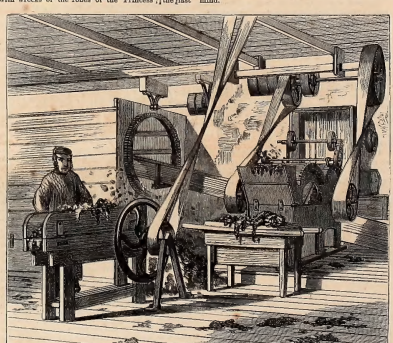
CHELSEA MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S PAPER MILLS, NORWICH, CONNECTICUT.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE CHELSEA MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S PAPER MILLS.

THE CHELSEA PAPER MILLS.

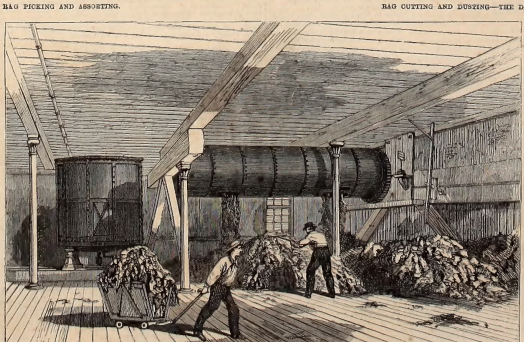
In early times the materials used for writing upon were chiefly those that required only some little mechanical fashioning to fit them for that purpose. Stones, flat surfaces of clay baked, bricks, plates of metal, leaves and bark of trees, skins of animals, papyrus, and finally parchment, were all used.

The art of making paper from pulp, or fibrous matter, is attributed to the Chinese as first discoverers, and is put down as in 95 A.D. Before that they wrote with a stylus on the inner bark of the bamboo. They made their paper first from the bamboo, but now, though sticking to the original material, use rags and straw.



In the sixteenth century a paper mill was first built in England by a Mr. Tate at Hertford, a second by a German in Kent in 1588; but the manufacture took no great advance until the year 1713, when a Mr. Thomas Watson introduced many improvements, and turned out the first tolerable paper in the world.

At Norwich, in Connecticut, are the Chelsea Paper (No. 1) Mills, perhaps the largest of their kind in the world. They were established thirty years ago, and have been, until lately, owned by an incorporated company, but now belong to Campbell, Hall & Co., of this city. These mills employ over 200 people, and have a capacity for turning out over 14,000 pounds of paper per day, the value of which, when fit for market, runs from twenty to thirty cents per pound. On this paper most of the first class journals of this and other cities are printed; and so high is the reputation of their manufacture, that the mills are not able to supply the immense demand upon them, even though their capacity is so great.

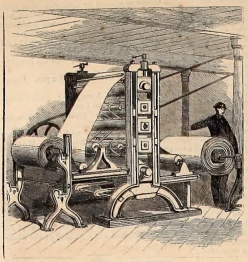


To trace the manufacture from the beginning: The rags from which this paper is made are mostly imported, the point from which the article is brought being the Mediterranean. In these dusty bales come the cast-off rags of the Neapolitan bazaroni, mixed with wrecks of the robes of the Princess; the last remnant of the Spanish beggar's—and where can there be a more ragged beggar—shirt, and the handkerchief that has wiped the face of royalty.—all finally forming food for Yankee machines, and final food for the world's mind.

RAG PICKING AND ASSORTING.

RAG CUTTING AND DUSTING—THE DEVIL.

BOILING RAGS.



These rags are rated according to quality and color, and firstly go into the rag-room (No. 1), where the bales are opened, and by women are assorted into barrels according to their quality. Even this simple employment requires a certain skill and quickness of eye, the one who has the latter having the ability to do twice the work of one whose eye is not as quick as her hands. These women live in an atmosphere of dust and dirt, but seem to thrive under it, and if bright countenances and lively chat can be taken as a criterion, are happy.

From the rag-room they go the cutting-room (No. 3), where also is the "duster," or "devil." Here all the dirt is beaten out of them, and they are cut into shreds for the purpose of reaching the fibre easier with water. This process, though dirty, is a very simple one, and from it the rags go to the boiler (No. 4), where for twelve hours they go through the purification of fire and water, and at the end of that time are turned out in such a state of cleanliness that we wager that the same Spanish beggar, who had contributed his shirt, would be unable to identify it, though it had been his faithful companion for half a score of years. In this boiler room, the boiler being on the left in the engraving, is also the drier, a long iron cylinder, through which hot air is forced, and which, continually revolving, soon turns out the rags without a particle of moisture, and ready for the washing and beating room (No. 5).

THE CHELSEA MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S PAPER MILLS, NORWICH, CONNECTICUT.

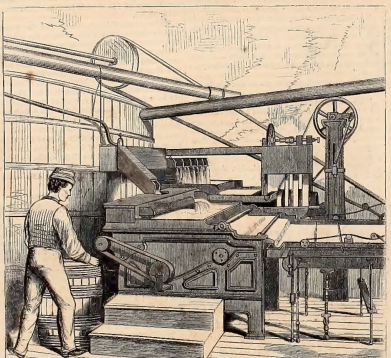
In this room, are the tubs or engines, which beat the rags into pulp, or stuff, as it is called, and bleach them. Here they go through the first important process in their transformation, that of being altered from rags to a substance, which, when dried, somewhat resembles fresh fallen snow—not city snow. This is done by continual agitation and maceration in water, and is a cleanly and beautiful process, and the pulp, as it comes from the tubs, is sufficiently tempting in appearance to induce an appetite, promising that the article was palatable and digestible.

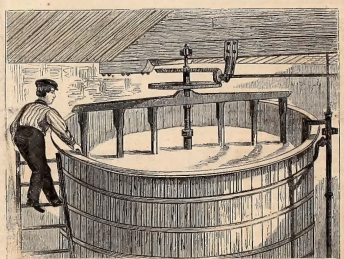


CALENDERING MACHINE.

WASHING AND BEATING THE RAGS.

From this point to the "Stuff Chest," or "Grinding Tub," (No. 6), the pulp goes, and here, by the addition of water, is worked to a creamy consistency, by a series of sharp iron blades, revolving on a frame, which keep the mass continually in motion and smooth. From this tub the pulp flows directly upon the machine (No. 7), which shall convert it into paper. This machine is the one invented by Fourdrinier, to which many improvements have been added by American inventors, until it seems to act almost with human intellect. To describe this machine is impossible without many illustrations, but a description of the old hand method of paper-making will better make it understood, the machine being simply an imitation of the human labor.

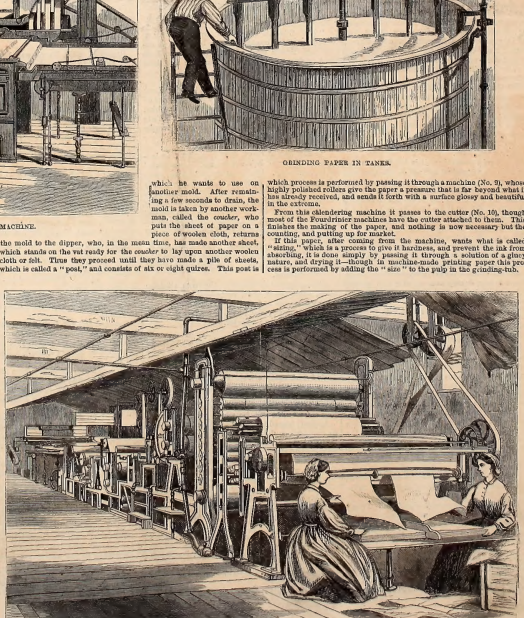
PULP RUNNING FROM TANK INTO MACHINE.



CUTTING MACHINE.

In the hand method the pulp is put into a vat, and is kept at the proper temperature by a stove or steam-pipe, and the contents held in suspense by stirring. The paper is made with a mold or deckle. This is a shallow, square frame, covered with wire cloth, and a little larger than the sheet to be made. The deckle is a very thin frame of wood, which fits close upon the mold, and is required to retain the pulp upon the mold, and to regulate the size of the sheet. The dipper, or vatman, inclining the mold a little toward him, dips it into the vat with the deckle upon it, and lifts it up horizontally. He shakes it to distribute the stuff, or pulp, equally, and the water drains through the wire. He lays the mold on the edge of the vat, and takes off the deckle, which he wants to use on another mold. After remaining a few seconds to drain, the mold is taken by another workman, called the coucher, who puts the sheet of paper on a piece of woolen cloth, returns the mold to the dipper, who, in the mean time, has made another sheet, which stands on the vat ready for the coucher to lay upon another woolen cloth or felt. Thus they proceed until they have made a pile of sheets, which is called a "post," and consists of six or eight quires. This post is placed in a wet-press, and subjected to heavy pressure, to squeeze out the water and to give firmness and solidity to the paper. The pile is then taken from the vat-press, the sheets taken from between the felts, and then pressed by themselves. They are then taken to the drying-room, and hung up in lots of six or eight sheets to dry.

The th ry of the Fourdrinier machine is the same. The mold of wire-cloth, instead of being square, is a revolving cylinder, which, as it revolves, dips into the pulp, and upon its opposite side delivers up the crude paper to the felts or woolen cloths. From the felts it is passed, in one continuous sheet, to the hot cylinders, which press and dry it, sending it steadily on its course, until, at the other end of the machine, it meets a revolving knife (No. 8), which is set to cut it into sheets of the required size.



When a very smooth surface is wanted upon the paper, it is calendered, which process is performed by passing it through a machine (No. 9), whose highly polished rollers give the paper a pressure that is far beyond what it has already received, and sends it forth with a surface glossy and beautiful in the extreme.

GRINDING PAPER IN TANKS.

From this calendering machine it passes to the cutter (No. 10), though most of the Fourdrinier machines have the cutter attached to them. This finishes the making of the paper, and nothing is now necessary but the counting, and putting up for market.

If this paper, after coming from the machine, wants what is called "sizing," which is a process to give it hardness, and prevent the ink from absorbing, it is done simply by passing it through a solution of a glary nature, and drying it—though in machine-made printing paper this process is performed by adding the "size" to the pulp in the grinding-tub.

PAPER MACHINE.

WE WERE WAITING.

We were waiting—we were waiting,
While the stars gemmed heaven's dome,
For a loved and war-worn brother,
In our little cottage-home.

We were waiting—we were waiting,
And the motion seemed so slow
Which the old clock's hands were making
That we thought they ceased to go.

We were waiting—we were waiting,
And the tea was on the board;
And the best of meats were smoking,
And the best of wines were poured,

We were waiting—we were waiting;
For we all had done our part
In arranging for the welcome
Of a kind and kindred heart.

We were waiting—we were waiting
For his tap upon the door;
And the long and fond caressing
That he gave us, heretofore.

We were waiting—we were waiting;
Any dull eye could discern
That our faces grew less sanguine,
As we spoke of his return.

We were waiting—vainly waiting,
While the stars gemmed heaven's dome,
For the weary one was resting
In a higher cottage-home.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LXV.—THE BALANCE-SHEET OF JOHN HARRIS & CO.

No misgivings, natural or supernatural, warned Anthony of the impending stroke—a fact hardly to be wondered at, considering the present position of the firm of John Harris & Co., the particular occupation of the partners during this April, and the general bustle and activity that characterizes the heterogeneous pile of buildings of which the dull house forms the centre.

A dull house no longer. The walls and roof have been renovated, balconies pushed out, worn-out plants grubbed up, and others put in their place; yet, with admirable taste, Anthony, the author of all these improvements, has jealously guarded the substantial integrity of the house, so that if he had grown so much attached to it, he could not even think of a general rebuilding.

What a scene of industry it is in the yards on each side, and the new and far bigger yard at the back connecting the others? Some fifty or sixty men are at work in them, yet all goes on with a smoothness and regularity that speaks well for the organization and its chiefs.

But more than the partners, that neither of them has been seen in the yards the whole morning?—a most unusual circumstance. Well, they are doing at least what they have been intending to do ever since Christmas, but been too profitably busy in other ways to accomplish till now—they have been stock-taking, and are now preparing a balance-sheet.

Had Harris alone been concerned, he would have put off such business till doomsday while he knew things were going on well; but, when Anthony urged it again and again, till at last Harris saw he had some secret motive for his importunity, then he yielded to the idea of losing a deal of valuable time. They are now drawing toward a conclusion.

The room in which they sit is the same as that into which the famished and almost dead Anthony had staggered on his first arrival long ago; but it has been so altered and enlarged by the bay window and the handsome curtains, and the odds and ends of rich furniture that Harris has picked up in his wanderings, that no one would recognize it who had known it under the old state.

There are two men now are: Anthony seated at a desk, Harris standing behind him, looking over his shoulder with very much the air of a man who is watching the progress of an incantation which may raise figures that shall promise him all sorts of good things, or may raise gloomy and spectral shades, which he has no desire to make acquaintance with.

Suddenly Anthony turns round with a laugh, saying:

"I am sure I shall make a mistake if you don't let me alone. I shall, indeed! I shall either bring you a deal that'll show we must immediately shut up shop, and ask how people do when they have to go to the bankruptcy court—"

"My dear Anthony!" remonstrated Harris.

"—Or else I shall make it appear we're making nobody knows how many thousands a year, and then, when I've gone off on the strength of it to do I know not what wild and extravagant things, you'll come posting after me, your face longer than ever, to say: 'Oh, Mr. Anthony, it's all a dreadful mistake!'"

Harris's face—which looked more wan than of yore, in spite of the prosperity evident in the fine linen and the genteel black clothes which he now affected—became radiant for the moment, then relapsed into its usual anxious expression, as he said:

"I only want to be correct—that's all. I can't rest with that £49. 10s. 6d. on my mind which you have put to profit. I'm sure it ought to go to loss. Only set that right, and then—I'll take your word for the rest."

"Very well, then, I'll transfer it to the wrong side to please you."

Anthony did transfer the disputed item, and he saw that his friend and partner was then prepared to receive with implicit faith and all reasonable equanimity the results of the balance-sheet of the year, the third completed year of the partnership.

Anthony did not say anything when he had finished the figures. He only took a prolonged look at them, as if to satisfy himself he had committed no error, then got up, forgot Harris, after a wave of the hand directing him to look for himself, forgot the place where he was, and walked about, thinking of all that the balance-sheet ought to mean for him.

As to Harris, his fingers trembled a little as he sat down where Anthony had been sitting, and he gazed, with spidery eyes, at the figures, which seemed to brighten into golden ones, and to dance in a kind of mocking fantasy before him, as if to say, "Come, and understand us, if you can!"

But Harris did understand very well that the stock and the plant—which had been constantly growing in size—and the horses and the carts, and the good debts and the cash in hand, amounted to nine thousand pounds beyond all that the rent owed. He also understood, and entirely appreciated, the fact that this sudden creation of capital only very imperfectly suggested the progress they had made. It was the realized profits for the year—four thousand pounds—it was the estimated profits for the next year of seven thousand pounds, an estimate founded upon actual contracts and orders in hand; above all, it was the still, obvious undiminished and undiminishable for the opportunities opened to them—these were the thoughts that made Harris, after a long and very puzzled look at the figures, lift his face, his face at last upward, with moist eyes and quivering lips, and murmur an inaudible prayer and thanksgiving.

"Well," said Anthony, as he checked himself in the midst of his soul-enthralling dreams, as he saw that a reverential pause was very worthy friend, what say you now? It's true enough, isn't it? Comfortable for the present, and an income of ten thousand a year for the future for each of us?"

"Yes, Mr. Anthony, for one year. One year, you know, only is secured to us."

"Don't you think that the chances are that we ought to go on, instead of stopping, after that year?"

"Oh, don't let us talk of that! it frightens me. It does, indeed!"

"Does it? By the lord, it doesn't frighten me at all. If it were twenty thousand a year, it's my belief I should be found quite willing, even then, to go on if fortune favored me. But I thank her, and own fully she is kind."

"But now, my dear Mr. Anthony, about Esau?"

"Ah, ah! of him, the last piece of worry!"

"Don't you think we ought to take him into the concern as a partner?"

"Not I; not while he is as he is. I've tempted him that way often, but it's no use. There's something, I fear, of the vagabond in his very blood."

"No, no! Don't let us be impatient. He's so very young. And he's very clever. Gibson will have a high opinion, I'm sure, of his abilities. He said, I verily believe, thinks more of him than he does of either you or I."

"Then Gibson's a fool. As foreman among so many men, he ought to know better than encourage Esau's mad tricks. Where was Esau last night, when I sat up for him till three o'clock?"

"Don't know."

"I think I could tell you—at the 'Flying Horse Music Hall.' A pretty place! I hear he goes off there every now and then, when we miss him, and is fit for life and work next day. Esau's not a bad way, Harris, and I am losing my temper with him."

"Then Gibson's a fool. As foreman among so many men, he ought to know better than encourage Esau's mad tricks. Where was Esau last night, when I sat up for him till three o'clock?"

"Don't know."

"I think I could tell you—at the 'Flying Horse Music Hall.' A pretty place! I hear he goes off there every now and then, when we miss him, and is fit for life and work next day. Esau's not a bad way, Harris, and I am losing my temper with him."

"Then you won't go with us on our trip to the seaside?"

"No. But I'm going with you and Mrs. Harris for a drive this very morning, and I have obtained a vehicle for the occasion, as I want to convince her that the country round about us can vie with, if not to be less anxious about home, and that the state of your health demands that you shall go more abroad."

"Well, we won't go into that, Mr. Anthony. But I am so glad we are to have a day of it! My wife wants it, and I want it. And how fine this is a happy day for us—the happier that it opens, as you say, new things for you."

"Yes," said then, for I heard the carriage here immediately."

Presently, while Harris was dressing upstairs, and trying to banish from his thoughts those impish figures, which always would come back, as if to show themselves and their capacities in spite of temporary banishment, a superb chariot drew up, drawn by a Cleveland bay horse, arrayed in a new harness with silver mounting, and driven by a coachman in new livery of livery great-coat, but of such quiet style, that one could tell the rank of the wearer by it, and that was all.

"That must be a great customer," said Mrs. Harris, as she fastened his cravat. "How vexatious!"

"Yes; but I shan't let him keep me long."

Both waited to see who should come out; but the driver sat motionless, and as if he waited to be some one.

Harris's face turned red and then white, as a thought crossed his mind; but it was one that he could not entertain, so he did not attempt to put it into words.

"Mr. Anthony never can have hired for us such a equipage as that," said the startled wife.

"I wouldn't go out in it for ever so much."

"Nor I, only it would offend Mr. Anthony, if it is really he doing."

"Now, then!" was called from below, in a clear, ringing, cheery voice, that sounded just a little malicious.

Husband and wife looked at one another. Then Mrs. Harris began to stamp her foot half angrily, while Harris picked bits off his clothes, both looking greatly flurried, and scarcely knowing what to say or do.

They went downstairs, where Esau and Miss Catherine headed a procession of all the young Harrises, and very many servants, a little behind. He looked on with faces of wonder and delight.

Mr. John Harris's carriage stops the way!" shouts Esau. "A link-boy, your honor!"

The timid Catherine said nothing but, "Oh, do, father!" and Harris knew about his cravat, &c. But I own to having paid for it. It belongs to a lady for whom I have, if she will allow me to say so, the affection, if not the right, of a son."

So saying, Anthony bowed to Mrs. Harris. How she got into the carriage, how she next looked when Harris met her gaze, and she began to laugh and cry, we shall not say.

There was a little pause when Anthony had followed and closed the door after him, for he had not ventured too far, had not put on Harris two men-servants at once, and, without thinking about the stoppage, he called out:

"Drive on."

Then a pause, and some altercation at the horse's head. Suddenly Anthony saw, in the face of Mrs. Harris, who was opposite, that which proved to be of a foretaste of the truth—fortune had already wearied of her beneficence.

The door was opened by a rough-looking man, evidently a jarvis combined, and behind him stood a man whom genteel clothes could not deprive of his air of intense vulgarity—Slumcr.

"What's the name in Anthony Mande, sin't it?" said the constable, in a disrespectful tone.

"I am Mr. Anthony Mande," was the haughty reply.

"Then I have a warrant here for you. Please to get out."

"An arrest for debt, I suppose? Pooh! I owe no one anything but what I can pay."

"It ain't a matter of paying. Will you get out? or must I make you?"

"Show me your warrant," said Anthony. "My dear Mrs. Harris, don't be frightened. We shall soon clear it up."

The man displayed his warrant, and Anthony's eyes grew dim with vertigo, till he found the word he wanted. Then, with incredulous scorn, he said, aloud:

"Murder! This is a sorry jest."

In dire confusion ended the hour that was to have been so full of happiness, for Anthony was taken away, and the man would not let him be could not—spare him the ignominy of the handcuffs.

CHAPTER LXVI.—UNDER PRISON-EAVES.

ANTHONY stands at the one window of his cell, leaning an elbow on the stonework, where the thickness of the walls, and the narrowness of the window externally, give to it somewhat of the aspect of the casemate of a fortress. He is fortress-bound, even in the depth of his misfortunes, that he can, at all events, stand there, and see human beings move about in the yard below—see the sun rise in the April sky above, with more painful significance of the eternal freshness and beauty of the world.

Misery owes this advantage, and the general comparative comfort of his room, to the kindness and sympathy of the governor, an old military man, who, from the hour first intended as Anthony's case, then in Anthony himself when they met; and when the governor—seeing, as he believed, a new prisoner before him—exerted himself to mitigate the first shock of the place and the people by a few words, expressive of his hope that Anthony would find that there was a satisfactory way, after a time, and that, in the interim, Anthony might rely upon all indulgences that did not interfere with the absolute rules of the establishment. That voice of kindness was answered by a squiering lip and a gallant smile, and some few, very few, grateful words. The impression remained through all the long and terrible-period that ensued.

Anthony is now on the second day of his imprisonment, looking out into the stone-paved yard, watching the formal evolutions of a party of men, whose cropped hair, gaunt regulation countenances, and unpleasant clothing, show they are criminals who have been convicted—who are enduring their punishment here, and are now taking what is called "exercise."

"And if I am convicted on this senseless charge, will they put me into that gang of wretches—wretches whose very look must revolt with internal corruption? No; I needn't fear that. See the advantage of being a very large criminal! I should be sent to Australia, all the way from Esau's desk to the gallows, no matter how many days or places intervened. Merciless as men are to their fellows, they have a sense of the way kind enters their souls, they can always smooth over the most terrible acts by the little hypocrisies of assuring the victims that they ask for mercy to God, and by feeling them and talking piously to them, while the sheriff and the hangman finish their job, and politely avoids its representation to watch the process."

If such were the thoughts that ran through Anthony's mind as he gazed upon his jail companions, and thought of their probable individual histories, and of the social injustice involved in the governmental and economical principles Avarice and Want—the true parents of crime—to flourish in impunity, and then hold life-long war with their terrible child, he also thought of such things, though he may be well excused for any bitterness of tone, any partiality of logic, under the circumstances of his case. Even the sweetness of his nature prompts him now to feel exactly the opposite emotions to those that would have characterized ordinary men in his position, and to sympathize with the wrong to them as an imaginary pedestal, raising them to still more serene heights of scorn and self-confidence. Anthony, in the height of his misery, creatures in that yard. Anthony felt that for the first time he was able to realize what these unhappy creatures must suffer; and he guilty and ought to be punished them from the bottom of his heart.

But his own innocence demanded all his care. He could no longer hide from himself that he was in danger. And the danger was of a nature to stir the very hair of his head to horror whenever its name upon it struck, after a few minutes of accidental forgetfulness.

Well, had he not done all he could do? Harris was, of course, hard at work. Whatever money, or professional skill, or devoted friendship could do, would be done by him, aided by Esau—whose mental aberrations would, he hoped, be forcibly restrained by the occurrence of such a calamity.

He had also sent for Mr. Stamp, and he waited anxiously for his coming—waited more than anxiously to discover if he would now repeat what he had said to him at the time of the discovery of the codicil with those pencil-marks on the back—that he had entire faith in his (Anthony's) innocence. It almost maddened Anthony to think that the lawyer might secretly have doubts—that he would dare to give them a hearing where he should be most bold—and, perhaps, at the most critical moment of all, might exercise him by letting his energies become paralyzed by the idea of possible guilt.

His hand he comes! No, it is the keeper, with a letter. Anthony's heart tells him, before his eyes possibly can, who it is from—Clarissa! It is from her, indeed. And could he have seen her just after writing it—then in—whether was closing and addressing it—he would have thought that that passion of tears—that utter self-abandonment to the most frenzied distress, augured badly for her hopes of his extrication. But he had not seen that—could not know it unless she told him. He saw only the letter, could learn only what it revealed.

"My own, ever dear, dear Anthony"—it began. Anthony paused in a burst of emotion, overpowered by that sudden and characteristic proof of the nobility of his soul's mistress. Never had she written to him like before. Never had he needed so much the comfort such words gave.

He stopped, holding the letter in his hand, as if conscious it could tell him nothing better than this, and that it would be wise to revel in it. And he did so. He recalled all that brief but delicious history. Every sight of her in her equestrian habit, during the day of the reading of the will; his mortification at her presence when all the blackguards of the town's acquaintance during the disputed period had assembled to greet him; his momentary relief during the interview between him and Clarissa—so humble and coy friend—at enjoyment of his joke as he introduced Elizabeth Jane, aged eighteen months, as his one presprochaladen child; and so on through the checkered day of courtship—of acceptance, and of separation—when the sudden revolution of the wheel had brought him from the direst height to the very ground, and left him no hope, but through time and a fresh career, ever to see her again. Well, he had seen her again, and to see her again. Then Fortune, as if she existed but to lie in wait for him, had caused this arrest for murder, thrown him into a prison—and there—why, there comes his noble mistress as she alone at present can come—in glowing, devoted, loving thoughtas alone he wishes her to come—to cheer him and console him.

All this passed through Anthony's mind, yet in a time so brief that a bystander would have only seen the hand drop a little that held the letter, the face rise toward heaven, full of spiritual light and glory, and the moment or two, and then the more calmly hand and face again approached each other, and the perusal of the letter went on:

"My own, ever dear, dear Anthony." He only read this a second time, but rested on each word as lovingly as if he heard it then coming from Clarissa's lips, and invested with all that witchery of sound which she knew so well how to use.

"My own ever dear, dear Anthony—I shall not say much to you, for it is a time for work. I shall not try to console you, for you are stronger than I, and will not allow light and unsteadiness from your heroism of spirit. Least of all shall I talk to you of love, of the future, or about friends or enemies. I think you know what I am. God will bless you, and believe, make me and fail too low beneath your kind appreciation of me. And as to your being unscrupulously murdered, and amazed to know that that seemingly humble man who brought you the casket of his own workmanship, and left it to you, little thinking of your sad prodigality, and that the casket would so soon be claimed by no possessor—by no contrasure, Anthony, next to you and to my father —I say I was deeply confounded, amazed, that might say awed, for it seems all so providential, to find that this man is your friend and partner, and devoted to you deeply. He has sent me, Anthony, a letter, which is, I think, in its simplicity and its sad frankness, the most touching thing I ever saw or heard of. And only to comfort me, and to let me know he and his will move heaven and earth rather than so atrocious a crime shall be on at your door. My father, too, Anthony, dearest, you don't know him yet. How could you? No one does. People see only the surface. But I know him to the depths, and I tell you—and I think you will believe me—he is brave, brave, nobly, thoroughly noble at heart. See him now. He began to turn from his anger when our first great misfortune happened —the loss of your property. And he is again moving even more decidedly toward you under this new calamity. Be patient, then, with him. Give him his own time, and even out of this awful period may arise unexpected blessings."

"Shall I now say what I sat down to write? It was that, Anthony, I want you to understand once for all, however little or unfrequently I may be able to write to you, perhaps even not at all—but ever little I may be able to see you—and that, alas, may be not at all—I am with you at all times —day and night, in good report and evil report, in hopeful moods and in despairing ones, for they will come, too, Anthony, just now—come and go. I want you to know this, whenever the knowledge may give you the smallest pleasure or relief. Don't fear me. It will always be true. Look only for me, and I shall be there. Were I to die this night, up to my latest breath I shall be saying, even if it be in broken murmurs to God, 'Anthony.'

"Farewell—no, for a little time, Mr. Stamp will be able to communicate to you on all business matters; and in time you will hear of all your friends' doings, and among them, of

"CLARISSA."

How many times Anthony read this, with what contagion of grief and joy he read it, I dare not attempt to say. Let us leave him to it just a little, and to the emotions it called forth.

* * * * *

Half an hour passes. Again the door opens, and again the keeper, not Mr. Stamp, enters.

"A gentleman of the name of Sleuth wishes to see you."

Before the entire sentence was heard, Anthony broke out:

"I won't see him! Say so. It is indecent—positively indecent! It is monstrous! If he wants to make any business communication, let him go to Mr. Stamp, who will be my lawyer."

"I'll tell him what you say; but he's a magistrate, and it would be a pity——"

"I don't care! I won't see him!" interrupted Anthony, folding up Clarissa's letter, as if to shut the very idea of her also out of the foul atmosphere Sleuth's name brought into the place.

"Very well, sir; but I ought to mention that he's been exerting himself with the governor to do his very best for you."

"Pretense! The governor is kindness itself, and needs no prompting."

"No; but he likes to have the countenance of the magistrates. And, if you'll forgive me offering an opinion, Mr. Sleuth spoke to me like a real friend of yours, and as if you were sad, and not at all as if he were commanding admittance to you. However, you know your own affairs best. But Mr. Sleuth is popular among the people, and if he acts as if he believed you were innocent, it'll cause a good many people to believe the same. And that's a consideration, I'm sure you're now and then the popular notions of things."

"Bowman, I thank you. There's good sense in what you say. But, if I must see him, I wish, at all events, it had been after seeing my lawyer."

"Very well. I'll ask him to wait. I think he will; he seemed very quiet and anxious."

Anthony thought this waiting for the lawyer was so like what Sleuth himself would do under equivocal circumstances, that it could not but be wrong for him. So, as the keeper was going away, he recalled him.

"Bowman, I think he may come in now."

"Of course," said the suddenly scrupulous keeper, with a knowing, half-contemptuous air. Anthony, which was not altogether displeasing, "you won't let him take any advantage of you, if you have intelligence with him."

"I'll try to guard myself," said Anthony, with a half-laugh at this seeming practical reversal of the good opinion he had just given.

When Sleuth and Anthony met, it was Sleuth that looked the prisoner, and Anthony the free man. Sleuth's face was pale and deeply agitated, and without any vulgar display, the latter so erect and menacing.

Anthony saw, even in his first hurried glance, Sleuth was no longer the man he had known—at least, in externals. Sleuth, if not exactly a gentleman, was no longer clearly the reverse. Wealth, society, the magistracy, had given a kind of artificial repose and dignity that showed itself even a now; for while in the ordinary polished sense Anthony there was still the old Sleuth revealed, in that displayed to the keeper it was clearly, even to Anthony's eyes, a new Sleuth. Turning to the man, Sleuth said:

"Leave me alone for a few minutes with the prisoner."

The keeper bowed and went out.

"Anthony!" Sleuth began, holding out his hand the while.

"Mr. Sleuth I" coldly reproved Anthony, raising his own hand at the same time with a repelling gesture, "I cannot receive you, unless you come to see me. You do see me. Let what you have to say be said without parade of feelings, or relationship, or friendship. I am a prisoner. I do not excuse my remarking, is, to say the least of it, in very bad taste just now."

The man who addressed Sleuth, in a sad voice, and with a sad smile, "but I was not born a gentleman, and therefore shall, I suppose, always be myself in moments of sad trial. And, I must bear the unpleasantness, I suppose, as well as all things that can't be helped. But whether I should or should not speak to you as to my own cousin, now no bitter reproach to myself, you don't stop to submit to rules of etiquette, but to the necessity of the case. I come here, Anthony—or, I come here, Mr. Maude, if you prefer that title from me—to offer you, in all sincerity, myself and all that I am rather, of time, thought, money (I care not what), of effort, to be made useful to you to clear your fame, and to re-establish your fortune. Now!"

"Now what?" demanded Anthony.

"Now you know my heart, except by asking you the same question? I know not what to believe."

"But did these burglars volunteer such a confession?"

"No," said Sleuth; and then he narrated the history of the governor's letter, and his own astonishment when he found that the prime mover in that letter, Maude, had returned to the country penniless, and determined to obtain justice on those who had killed his father-in-law. "I found him out and gave him justice, but money, which I declined to give him. But he had raked up so many facts that bore, or seemed to bear, upon the question of our once friendship, that I thought it best by telling him I should fulfill both my duties—that not to hold any kind of pecuniary relation with him, but to be free to offer a large reward for the discovery of the murderer, through Dr. Fontbon——"

"How much?"

"A thousand pounds."

"Indeed! Indeed! Anything else to tell me, Dick, since you are so very candid?"

"Yes; I have thought that the very best thing now for both of us, especially, Anthony, for yourself——"

"Why for me?" demanded Anthony.

"Because you are the one chiefly suspected; and, therefore, if innocent——"

"If?"

"Yes, Anthony. You and I must bear to hear that word often now, and to bear it patiently."

Anthony was silent. Sleuth proceeded:

"If you are innocent, you have everything to gain by increased knowledge. Who knows what sudden and hitherto unsuspected fact may not start up, explaining to us both the mystery of the concealed casket, and of those unfortunate marks?"

"You reason admirably, Dick. I must really

They shook hands in a most touching silence; and the very fact that Sleuth did not now pour forth a torrent of self-accusing words, further Anthony in his belief that he had done the right thing; and that, whatever Sleuth's character or conduct in the past, it was right to be kind to both what they should be in the present and future.

"One thing I should like to mention," said Sleuth, when he again broke silence. "It was not my fault that you were not sent for to a private meeting of magistrates. I did propose it, and I think the doctor would have seconded me; but for Mr. Maguire's blunt denunciation of the scheme. He thought it would look like partiality to a client. I only offered to go into the matter before him and the doctor, putting myself and you on a common level, as suspected persons——"

"Did you think, Dick?" eagerly interrupted Anthony.

"They will tell you so, if you ask them."

"Then you did as honest and true a friend."

"But, Anthony, we must not overlook a certain severity in our mutual relations."

"You mean, Sleuth?" interrupted.

"I mean that it is impossible we can do anything but tell the whole truth, just as we know it, or suppose we know it, however we think hurt or seem to hurt each other.

"Certainly that is what I wish."

"No doubt. But don't you see——"

"I see that you may have to testify to facts that will look bad against me—"

"That's it."

"Yes. And, then, you know, in return——"

"Yes, Anthony, I understand. Your counsel will be apt to handle me roughly."

"Not if he takes his policy from me, Dick. I shall instruct him to prove my innocence."

"Yes; but if he thinks he can do that best by attacking me——"

"Hardly!"

"Anthony, he will. But we must both stand on our respective grounds as strongly as we can, and that, I think, will require all our self-control and mutual good feeling to make us safely through."

Anthony wondered a little at this; not because it was unreasonable, or in itself out of place, but because it seemed so inconsistent with their meeting at all. And then, again, it seemed the right thing to do. It had a flavor of old-world chivalrousness about it that pleased him.

Sleuth, on his part, looked as if he had expected a different result. He said nothing, however, and turned the subject to Anthony's position.

"Do you know who is your accuser?"

"I supposed you," said Anthony, promptly.

"Well, I am not, not, of I may so speak. I am, because, once the thing set going, I, as the alderman's nephew and heir, and a magistrate beside, cannot hold it but charge like this, and then let things take an ordinary course, as if we had no interest or duty beyond that of an official."

"What have you done, or are you doing?" asked Anthony, with a new curiosity, and perhaps, a shade of returning suspicion.

"Let me first tell you how the proceedings originated. Mr. Pompeo handed to me a letter from the governor of Hilborough Jail, which states to show that the burglars—the men of that fatal night—have confessed to the robbery, but that they deny the murder."

"Indeed!" said Anthony, and he made a movement indicative of suspicious as regards his own inner emotion, but which might be explained by his desire to take a good view of Sleuth's face.

Sleuth returned no clear close to the window-opening, and turn his back upon it, so that he had all the light that it was possible to obtain reflected upon his countenance.

That face was very calm, very pale, and though the eyes quivered and winced a little under Anthony's gaze, there was none of the not very powerful rays that came through the window, to detect Anthony's gaze again, and again, and again, with increasing force, new strength after every visitation of the earth.

"Do you believe the men to speak truly?" asked Anthony.

"How can I possibly answer, except by asking you the same question? I know not what to believe."

"But did these burglars volunteer such a confession?"

"Yes," said Sleuth; and then he narrated the history of the governor's letter, and his own astonishment when he found that the prime mover in that letter, Maude, had returned to the country penniless, and determined to obtain justice on those who had killed his father-in-law. "I found him out and gave him justice, but money, which I declined to give him. But he had raked up so many facts that bore, or seemed to bear, upon the question of our once friendship, that I thought it best by telling him I should fulfill both my duties—that not to hold any kind of pecuniary relation with him, but to be free to offer a large reward for the discovery of the murderer, through Dr. Fontbon——"

"How much?"

"A thousand pounds."

"Indeed! Indeed! Anything else to tell me, Dick, since you are so very candid?"

"Yes; I have thought that the very best thing now for both of us, especially, Anthony, for yourself——"

"Why for me?" demanded Anthony.

"Because you are the one chiefly suspected; and, therefore, if innocent——"

"If?"

"Yes, Anthony. You and I must bear to hear that word often now, and to bear it patiently."

Anthony was silent. Sleuth proceeded:

"If you are innocent, you have everything to gain by increased knowledge. Who knows what sudden and hitherto unsuspected fact may not start up, explaining to us both the mystery of the concealed casket, and of those unfortunate marks?"

"You reason admirably, Dick. I must really congratulate you on your intellectual, as well as other progress. Is this the man, this Bob, who would, otherwise, be languishingly waiting a fitting yet prepared for the gallows—is this the man who would gain the reward if I were to be convicted?"

"Anthony, this kind of talk——"

"Excuse me. Women and captives should be indulged in talk. Would he?"

"I suppose he would."

"Then, if he were to hang me, wouldn't it be more comfortable than should have acted as the irresistable charm of the process?"

"Anthony, if one or two thousand pounds, used in the most powerful inquiries and in reward of the-discoverer of the truth, be calculated to injure you, what will be the effect of the odd hundred and sixty thousand which I have already offered you? Be as harsh as you please, but, at least, be just."

"Dick, I ask to Heaven you hadn't come, or having come, I wish you would manage to talk up a less equivocal position!"

"Think—think, Anthony, I entreat you. Has you now been in my place, and I in yours, would I have objected to see a public act performed, showing you were determined justice should be done? And oh, Anthony, would I have repelled you had you come to me as I have come?"

Anthony paused, and rested to himself a little, and then again resumed his earlier and more agreeable attitude, as he said, with a deep sigh:

"Dick, it's a horrible business, however it ends, I didn't think I should have felt this place so much. However, what must be, must be, I suppose; pure philosophy, Dick, though it does sound rather common-place. But come, let's try if plain sailing be really practicable between us. Tell me, then, my question, and when you have answered it, you may do the same thing over again with me. But I warn you, this is an awful place to go questioning in or tell truth in. From no question, you must dispose as you can of my answer, for it will try to go right to the mark."

Sleuth's eye, so strangely and suddenly in expression, looked at Anthony, but saw him not, so saw only that second question, and determined he would meet it, and, if he could, never have it answered—determined, therefore, the first should struggle the other before its birth. He said, after a pause:

"Ask your question."

"Do you believe me guilty?"

THE BANKING-HOUSE OF BARING BROTHERS.

THE following sketch of a famous banking-house is published in All the Year Round:

"The Barings come to Exeter from Bremen, and Matthew Baxd himself at Larkbear, (the Larrockbere of the time), came to open up the woolen trade with foreign lands, a trade of which, in the west of England, Exeter was the centre. The reputation and success of the house of the Barings was mainly owing to the business habits, the prudence, and the activity of the wife of Matthew Baring, who was traditionally known as Madame Baring. The ladies in those days took an active part in the management of their husband's affairs. They superintended the labors of the women engaged as hatters, who pulled the sticky dough over benches and with bowstrings, and by the slaughter of sweethearts, held in the right hand, picked out the blacks, knots and other defects in the yarn woven, which, with a whisk in the left hand, they swept into open bins at their feet. The wife of the duke of Bedford sometimes now and then to go from one end to the other of the long line of factory women, to be diligent, and reprehending the lazy.

"The ladies greatly fully appreciated the services of his wife, and built for her on the banks of the river Exe handsome lodgings—not large, but cosy rooms where she could uninterruptedly and comfortably look after the business of the house. Pollutions there were then in the fish, the fishing-house has been razed to the ground, but the fishing-house has been transferred to another site to the turf of the St. Leonard cemetery, and the ancient fishing-house is now a place to be seen. Mr. Baring, now the senior partner of the great house of John and Francis Baring, has lately had the pleasure of seeing the iron bars of the family architerred in the chancel and pew of the church of the consecrated front door domicile of Mount Radford only by a bridge (are we not in the parish of Exeter?) from the mansion of the Bishop of Exeter. The Exeter Presbyterians, and others in a very large degree, were originally attached to a Unitarian chapel, a few miles from the city.

"From such humble beginning were to rise a singular sagacity. Perhaps they favor of the destiny and courage of the Barings, by which they have had laid the foundations of his own and their prosperity; and how much of the prosperity of the house of Ashburton and Baring? I had in my possession a copy of a letter for part of it, from Sir Francis Baring to Lord Auckland, the young clergyman, in which the ambition of the great banker of his children's future is developed to the extent of three hundred pounds sterling. Two weeks ago and Lord Auckland's son, the present Lord Auckland, was laid in the grave by the side of his father and mother, and with them, and in a dark and secret grave, this letter would prove of great interest.

"An American lately in London, who was badgered by the English on almost every topic, at last, as a last defence, determined to get the Mississippi steamboat style, and drag down everything that came in his way. His first chance occurred at an exhibition of paintings, where a picture of a snow-storm attracted general admiration.

"'Is not that fine?' asked a John Bull; 'could you show anything as natural as that in America?'

"'Pooh!' answered the free-born American, 'that is no comparison to a snow-storm picture painted by a cousin of mine, a few years since; that painting was so natural, sir, that a mother, who incautiously left her babe sleeping in a cradle near it, on returning to the room found her child frozen to death!'

From that time onward, the American was left alone.

COLLEGIATE CHURCH, DUTCH REFORMED, DR. VERMILYE, PASTOR, FORTY-EIGHTH STREET, BETWEEN FIFTH AND SIXTH AVENUES.

COLLEGIATE DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH,

Forty-eighth Street and Fifth Avenue.

THERE are at present four places of worship under the Consistory of the Collegiate Church—the North, corner of Fulton and William streets; Lafayette place, corner of Fourth street; Fifth Avenue, corner of Twenty-ninth street; and the Chapel, on 48th street. This chapel will finally be connected with a large edifice the Consistory intend to erect, facing on Fifth Avenue, to correspond in style and finish with the chapel, and to be an ornament to the old Collegiate Dutch Church, and to that part of the city. The chapel has been put up at an expense of about $40,000, and in all respects is a first-class building. It has one of the finest Sabbath-School-rooms on the first-floor, furnished with every accommodation; and on the floor above is the chapel, seating about 460 persons, which, in fact, is an elegant church, with lofty ceiling, pews lined and cushioned, gallery and singing-loft, and spacious room adjoining the pulpit, for the use of the pastors, with closets, croton water, etc., and finished in that thorough and substantial manner becoming the descendants of the old burghers' sons of New Amsterdam. It is truly a model building of its kind. The architect was Mr. Warner, who also built the Twenty-ninth street church.

THE REV. THOMAS E. VERMILYE.

THE photograph gives as good a likeness, probably, as there is of Dr. Thomas E. Vermilye, pastor of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church, of this city. He was taken by Bogardus. Dr. Vermilye was born in the city of New York, February, 1803, of Huguenot ancestry, mingled with the Dutch, the family name being found here from the earliest period of the history of the city. He was thoroughly trained for college under that renowned classical teacher, the blind Joseph Nelson, and pursued his collegiate course at Yale College. From the Reformed Dutch Church in Albany he was invited to the pastorate of the Collegiate Church in this city, which is supposed to be the oldest ecclesiastical organization on the continent, and here, for the past 26 years he has pursued his ministry, in connection with several distinguished colleagues. Dr. Vermilye received the honorary degree of D.D. from both Rutgers and Union Colleges, and the degree of LL.D. from Jefferson College, Penn.

THE EPPING HUNT.

Illustrations of English Life.

A LATE English paper gives us illustrations of this old custom, the grand carnival of Cockney sportsmen. Epping is about twelve miles from London, and on the day of this hunt, everybody that can mount, is sure to make a holiday, and join the race.

The Epping Hunt, on Easter Monday, brings back many recollections of the good old days of suburban sports, when the Nimrods of the metropolis went forth, as in the earlier days of Chevy Chase,

To hunt the deer with hound and horn,

and gathered in hosts as numerous in Epping Forest as did the borderers of Northumberland on the warlike frontiers of Scotland. Fortunately the sportsmen of the metropolis were not so pugnacious, or at least, not so blood-thirsty, as their northern predecessors; for though it must be admitted that on more occasions than one, the pleasures of the chase were diversified by a pugilistic encounter or two, arising from too vehement a desire to excel in the display of horsemanship, or from the resentment of indignation at being unhorsed and laughed at in the ardor of the pursuit, the combatants were no seriously injured, and a couple of black eyes and a bloody nose covered the exuberance of momentary excitement, and restored the parties to reason. Easter Monday was a glorious day, not only for that class of sportsmen with which, in the days alluded to, Whitechapel and the northern districts of London abounded, but to the whole class of bold riders from every part of the town who could procure anything in the shape of a horse to "carry them up to the hounds;" and fortunate, perhaps, it was for some of the quadrupeds employed for that purpose that the hounds were tolerably well fed, or, for the moment, more anxious for sport than food, or it is much more than probable the living carrion which constituted on these occasions a large portion of the "field," would have furnished a hearty meal for the canine participants in the "day's diversion." But be this as it may, the sportsmen from Whitechapel were on this eventful day, joined by the sportsmen from all other parts of London and Westminster. It was in a vast variety of conveyances that the anxious and impatient mobs wended their way to that beautiful spot in the forest, Fairmead Bottom, to see the deer let loose from the cart, and join in the labors of his re-capture or death. There was a pleasing diversity of vehicles employed, and in motion from daybreak, ay, and long before the rosy-fingered morn unbarred the turnpike of Phœbus. There were then to be seen in long and rapid succession the Corinthian teams of the noble and the rich, the "heavy drag" of the more bulky and less opulent sportsmen, the four-in-hand, and the hackney coach; the "go-cart," and the cart that was "no go;" the capacious omnibus of modern interpolation was then not known, or, in its neophytic state as a fly-wagon, rolled heavily over Lea Bridge with a load of foresters, anxious for the chase and the sylvan honors of the glades.

Some pushed along with four-in-hand,
Whilst others drove at random,
In curricle, dog-cart, whisky, one-
Horse chaise or tandem.

The Eagle at Snaresbrook presented, at an early hour, a busy scene. The large pond in the immediate neighborhood was well calculated to quench the thirst and cool the flanks of the "locomotives," and the fluids supplied by the landlord supplied fresh vigor to the drivers and riders of the same. This was a half-way rendezvous of the engines and engineers, and here, all having recruited their strength, and confirmed their resolution of being in at the "take," proceeded to the well-known Bald Face Stag, the "whereabouts" of "Thomas Rounding," Esq., huntsman in ordinary, and also extraordinary of the day. Here Tom was to be seen in all his glory. His hunting-cap and coat, his buckskin breeches and top boots, mounted on the horse that had borne him through the toils of many a busy day.

In the accompanying illustration is shown the manner in which the deer was released from the cart; the same mode is made use of with all packs of stag-hounds, and there was no novelty in this respect at Epping. The animal, on being released, usually made its way for the thickest part of the forest, as if conscious that some hundreds of the pursuers would very soon be unable to thread their way through the intricacies of the ground, and such was the case. All four-wheeled and all two-wheeled carriages were very soon put hors de combat. "What shall he have that kills the deer?" was a question that in a very few minutes became of personal interest to very few persons. As in another of the illustrations may be seen, it was not long before and as the "chase" increased, a series of accidents, as represented, was inevitable; some fell from their horses, many horses fell from their riders, some were engulfed in mud and mire, some were knocked "up," others were knocked "down," and before half an hour had elapsed, not a tithe of the original "field" were to be seen in the forest.

"A chosen few alone the sport enjoyed;"

The deer had a trick which was to some peculiarly annoying, though others thought it capital fun; he would betake himself to one of the herds of his own species grazing in the forest, and then, instead of one quarry, the hounds and hunters had their choice of a score or two which to pursue. Here was perplexity, and that not a little increased by the hallooing of Tom Rounding, the yelping of dogs, the cursing of men, the cracking of whips, and the blowing of horns.

"All this discordance, this Discord, harmony not understood" was at length amended by the skill of Tom Rounding, who managed, by some means or other, to get a part of his pack upon the scent or track of the right deer, and the animal was, for the most part, ultimately driven to bay, when, after a contest with the dogs, he was secured and taken back to the place from whence he came, not to immediate but to ultimate execution, i.e., to another day's sport at a subsequent anniversary. All this was followed, and indeed accompanied by eating, drinking, singing, speechifying, and so forth; and, if no great encouragement to stag-hunting, in its more legitimate sense, was the means of amusement to hundreds of people, excited mirth and merriment, enforced good-fellowship, and furnished good exercise and diversion. Real stag-hunting is a manly and noble amusement, and when pursued as in some parts of the New Forest, a most exciting recreation.

REV. THOMAS E. VERMILYE, PASTOR COLLEGIATE CHURCH.

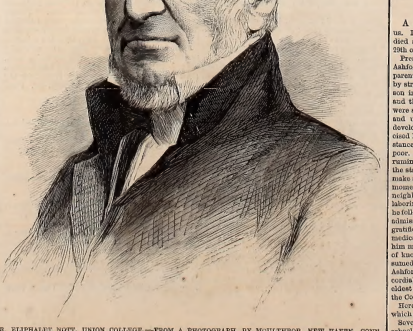
SHELTERED FROM THE RAIN.

DR. LIVINGSTONE, in his African travels, gives us some wondrous stories of elephants, stories which rather stagger the ideas of Americans who have never seen anything in the elephant line larger than the famous Hannibal, the huge beast who has been starring it through this country for the last ten years. One of which he speaks was shot by him on the Zambesi. Its ear-flaps measured four feet across, and four feet five inches in depth. He speaks also of the tame elephants that formed part of his train, and says, that during the drenching showers of rain that occurred almost daily, and very suddenly, the natives would take shelter behind the gigantic ear of the elephant, and by so doing, come out dry. To us such shelter would seem very much like the partridge who runs its head into the furze, leaving its body exposed, but to the African, whose only wotable clothing is a strip of cotton cloth and his wool, the idea is a good one.



DR. ELIPHALET NOTT.

A GREAT man has passed away from among us. Dr. Eliphalet Nott, President of Union College, died at Schenectady, on the morning of Monday, the 29th of January, aged nearly 93 years.

President Nott was born, of English descent, at Ashford, Conn., on the 26th of June, 1773. His parentage, though humble, is said to have been marked by strong characteristics, and of a nature to roar the son in the direction of a noble and useful manhood, and the few years of their influence vouchsafed him were salutary. At an early period of his life a burning and unconquerable thirst for knowledge began to develop itself, and he was much and constantly exercised how he should gratify it at once under his circumstances of being parentless and almost unspeakably poor. One day while toiling upon the farm and ruminating upon the probabilities of his ever attaining the stature of a learned man, and fully determining to make a start in this praiseworthy direction at no distant moment, on looking up, he noticed the physician of the neighborhood passing by the field in which he was laboring. At once throwing by his implement of labor, he followed to the residence of the physician, and sought admission to his office as a student. He was not gratified so far as to gain permission to a seat in the medical studio; nevertheless the physician imparted to him much excellent advice in regard to the acquisition of knowledge. Soon after this event, acting, it is presumed, upon the advice of his medical friend, he left Ashford and went to Franklin, Conn., where he was cordially and hospitably received into the family of his eldest brother, the Rev. Samuel Nott, D. D., pastor of the Congregational Church of the village.

Here he laid the foundation of the deep theology which he afterward so ably mastered.

Seventeen years of age found him in charge of a school at Plainfield, Conn., and still plodding eagerly on in the industrial pursuit of knowledge, at the same time no less educating his mind than softening and refining his character. The conspicuousness of this result will be readily seen when we state that at the age of nineteen years, without having passed through the formalities of a college curriculum of study, the University of Brown, at Providence, R. I., conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts ad eundem—a testimonial of student-standing which in those days carried with it the conviction of acquirements gained only after the exercise of commanding natural talents, aided by profound industry, rare insight and a most courageous application.

DR. ELIPHALET NOTT, UNION COLLEGE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MCCULLEROY, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

In the year 1794 he resolved to turn his back upon his native State and the many personal and professional friends whom his high learning and manners had earned for him, but not, however, until he had by his persuasive eloquence, or some other cogently effective means induced, the daughter of Dr. Rosell to accompany him. He took up his long journey on horseback from that then critical to the Mohawk Valley, settling at last in the then budding settlement of Cherry Valley, pausing by Albany, as he himself has since frequently said, because denizens were "too Dutch," and preferring a locality where his English tongue would stand him in better stead.

For two years he remained at Cherry Valley, and then removed to Albany, where he assumed the pastorate of the Congregational Church of that city. In the year 1804, while fulfilling at Albany the duties of his pastorate, Dr. Nott pronounced the powerful eulogium upon his friend Alexander Hamilton, which is yet remembered by men still living as a most masterly piece of funeral eloquence. It has long since been incorporated as a

EPPING HUNT—UNEARTHING THE STAG.

CARPENTERS' HALL, PHILA.

Its Past and Present.

THOUSANDS who pass within sight of one of the ever memorable altars of our country's liberty, are not only ignorant of its history, but of its very being as an old colonial relic. To such, a short imaginary visit cannot but be fraught with interest.

Carpenters' Hall stands at the head of Carpenters' Court, several hundred feet back of Chestnut street, below Fourth. From the sidewalks of our fashionable avenue, the very heart of business, the passer-by can memories of that time, let us see it in its present garb. The hall is about fifty feet long, by thirty wide, and has, in the front and rear, projections each thirty by ten feet, the former of which is a vestibule, and contains the stairway to the upper floor. The main room is lighted by eight windows, and its interior is grained in imitation of oak. The old high-backed settees around the room, and the antique chairs, are those that tradition asserts were in use in 1774. Even the furniture afterward added, is in style and general stiffness as precise and decorous. Opposite the entrance, upon a dais, back of an old desk, stand two quaint, very high-backed arm-chairs, each inscribed, "Continental Congress, 1774." On the wall, between them, is the inscription, in gold letters:

"Within these walls,
HENRY, HANCOCK AND ADAMS,
Inspired the Delegates of the Colonies
With nerve and stamp for the Toils of War,
Resulting in our National Independence."

On the eastern and western walls hang satin banners in glass cases, bearing the Carpenters' Arms. The former is quite rich in heraldic devices, and is surmounted by a carpenter's square, and a level, with the motto, "Fiat Justitia." Below these are the arms of the Carpenters' Company of London, and the motto, "Where there is unity there is strength." The banner was carried by the Carpenters' Society in the great Federal procession on the 4th of July, 1788, in honor of that day, and also to commemorate the adoption of the Constitution; the other was borne by the society in the great parade in Feb., 1839, in honor of the centennial anniversary of Washington's birthday. A handsome roll of the names of the members of the society, from its creation, is a massive gold frame, hangs upon the northern wall. In the wall, east of the doorway, is built an iron door, guarding the entrance to what, in olden times, were the vaults of the Bank of Pennsylvania. About this man-made ironbarred gate clusters a story likely unknown to thousands of our readers. Yet, in its day, that tale thrilled the hearts of our great-grandfathers and grandmothers with its incidents of unfaltering honesty and vindicated integrity.

"Pat Lyons!" His name is probably only known to many by his portrait, as a blacksmith, which hangs in the Academy of Fine Arts. In his time, his eccentricities, his bluntness, his rare abilities as a locksmith, his energy and determination, gave him an individuality of character beyond all others in the city. His mechanical genius secured his employment by the directors of the bank to repair the locks and doors that led to the vault.

On Sunday, Sept. 24, 1797, while the yellow fever was destroying thousands of the citizens, the doors were unlocked, and over $160,000 stolen. Suspicion attached to the great locksmith, Patrick Lyon.

He was away with his family at Cape Henlopen, to escape the malignant fever, but hearing he was accused, he immediately traveled back without stopping, and surrendered himself to Squire Jennings, who had a war gem in the choice literature of the country, and is familiar to every well-read American throughout the world. It was this specimen of pulpit power that immediately earned for him the Presidency of Union College, to which he was unanimously called by the corporation of that then infant institution in 1804. He superseded Rev. Dr. Mason, an impassioned, learned, and graceful polemic.

EPPING HUNT—THE VIEW HALLOW.

From that time to this day his great energies and business talent have been devoted to establishing that institution on a responsible foundation, and most wonderfully has he succeeded.

Dr. Nott assumed the chief direction of the affairs of Union College at a period of its history when its resources were of any means adequate to the work which its founders had proposed to do. When he came to its halls he found it essentially an infant institution, in need of students and direly necessitated for pecuniary means. The college was originally founded in 1795, but under the presidency of John Blair Smith, Jonathan Edwards (son of "Edwards on the Will"), and Jonathan Maxcy, it did not prosper—it merely existed.

President Nott was married three times. His first wife, as we have already said, was Miss Benedict; his second, the widow of Benjamin Tibbels, of Albany, whose maiden name was Gertrude Peebles; and the third, Miss Urania Sheldon, of Utica, this State. We had five children—Edward, Benjamin, Joel, and John (sons), and Maria (daughter), who subsequently became the wife of the late Bishop Potter, of Pennsylvania, and who died many years since.

Very early in life Dr. Nott made himself known as an inventor and author, and, unlike many other inventors and authors, has made money by both his mechanical and writings. He invented the first anthracite coal stove ever used in the country; and his experiments in heat, and the improvements he introduced, effected an entire revolution in the mode of warming buildings.

These inventions turned him in a large fortune. When it had grown to almost princely proportions, he endowed his college with the greater part of it. This was in 1854. On the fiftieth anniversary of his accession to the Presidency of the college, and in pursuance of a determination formed and expressed more than twenty years before, and the effectual accomplishment of which was many years since secured by the proper legal papers, to take effect in the event of his unexpected decease, he did deliver to the college board, in trust, for the use of the college, money, securities, and property of the estimated value of more than $600,000. This result, the fruit of individual skill and far-sighted policy, with donations previously made, was the noble disinterestedness which marked his whole administration of the affairs of Union College, and which entitle him to the highest credit and honor, and to the lasting gratitude of all friends of education, and of the amelioration of our race.

SHELTERED FROM THE RAIN.

she hall was a grand structure, and though there are now scores more pretentious, it is by no means unimposing.

The Philadelphia Library was located in the hall during this year.

July 19th, 1775, the Provincial Assembly was held here, and during the same year, Sept. 6th, the first American Congress assembled in the hall, and continued throughout its sessions, deliberately swearing that, "To the oppressive acts of the mother country, Americans cannot submit;" and the patriotic determination to "part with their liberties only with their lives." The brief prayer was delivered in Congress, Sept. 7th, the second day after they had assembled, on the same day the rumor came that Boston had been cannonaded. By invitation, the Rev. Jacob Duche, an Episcopian, opened the services, the Psalter for the seventh day of the month being read with impressive effect:

"Plead my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me; fight against them that fight against me.

"Take hold of shield and buckler and stand up for my help."

"Parson Duche" followed with a glowing extemporary prayer, and history reminds that Colonel Washington knelt and prayed.

Their work was well done, in the spirit befitting Christian men.

In 1775, the Provincial Assembly was again in session, and Oct. 5th, 1775, the committee from thence attended the funeral of Peyton Randolph, late President of the Congress of 1774.

In 1776, the Provincial Assembly again met in the hall, and upon the resolutions was the "calling of a convention, for the express purpose of forming a new government to the province, which shall derive all its powers from the people only."

In 1777, the British, having entered the city, were partly quartered here. The soldiers amused themselves by firing bullets through the vase on the cupola. In this year the library room was given up to the use of soldiers for barracks, and the committee gave deposits and hire for all books borrowed by them. During the next year the congress met once more in their hall, having been deprived of this privilege during the occupation by the British troops. During the latter part of the year a part of the hall is occupied by the U. S. barrack-master, and in 1778 it was occupied by the U. S. Commissary-General, who issued from here to the brass found, and his clothing shops on a part of the lot.

In 1781, Committee on Book of Prices, authorized to receive rents and settle accounts; the rent for the use of the committee rooms to five, and called "Committee on Rents and Book of Prices." Two years and three six other members were added to this committee, and authorized to settle all business relating to the Congress.

In 1776, the Friendship Carpenters' Company admitted, after sixteen years' efforts, on paying the sum of £4 each to the treasurer.

In 1787 the hall was occupied by the Convention to frame the Constitution. They deliberated with closed doors; and at the end of four months agreed upon a "Constitution for the United States of America." This was also occupied by the United States Commissary-General of Military Stores. Entrance fee, £20 each.

In 1791, the hall occupied by the Bank of the United States, where it continued business, and continued to be used for that purpose during the same year the meetings of the Congress of the United States were held here.

In 1793, a building, on the west side of the court, continuing thirty-sixty-five years, 1793 to 1858 of the company incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, by the name of "The Carpenters' Company of the City and County of Philadelphia." Treasurer first appointed—the duty being confined, under the charter of title of president changed from "Master" to "President." Secretary first appointed. Mode of electing officers changed by the warders. 1796, entrance fee changed from £5 to £10, meeting, and made fifty; and in 1797 the Bank of Pennsylvania commenced business in the hall. They continued to move the library from the company. 1798 to 1810 their new meeting-rooms of the for a land office, and for that only, by the United States for a certain time, not to exceed four years. In 1803, the Bank of the United States, which was occupied by the Agricultural Society. In 1825, the Franklin Institute of the Pennsylvania occupied the hall. The next year a law enacting an annual appropriation to the library; and in 1827, by the Society of Friends for their Meetings. In 1829, entrance fee increased to $60. In 1833 the assembly of the Supreme Court were in the hall; and for two years afterward the hall was occupied as an auction store. 1850, entrance fee $80.

In 1860 the hall is again occupied by the company. [illegible] to say what to visit [illegible] the three great men have left the [illegible] on the second floor." That simple, unadorned room, where delegates from all the colonies, save Georgia—the Church militant the following trifles of adulation:

Chatham in the House of Lords—of which John Adams declared: "Such an assembly of super human abilities, together on a sudden in any part of the world; every man is a great man, a hero, a critic, a statesman, when we convened, and for fifteen days sat here. The awful solemnity of the first day is not easy to be described by the uprising of a tall, spare, slightly-stooping, grave-looking gentleman in a plain dark suit, bob wig, and cocked hat, and unpowdered wig. He spoke, and the whole house how his features lighted up with a high emotion; his earnest, deeply-set gray-blue eyes flashed, and his whole mortified nobodyness all declared those immortal words: 'All America is thrown into one mass. Where are your landmarks, your boundaries of colonies?' They are all thrown down. The distinctions between Virginians and Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers and New Englanders, are no more. We are a new nation."—Patrick Henry.

And after the lapse of ninety-two years, imagination almost hears the same name.—Patrick Henry.

1859, entrance fee $100. In 1859, the city councils of Philadelphia propose to purchase the hall, because of its historical interest and associations with the early events of our independence, but the congress was not favorably declined.

1860, the convention for the erection of a monument to the signers of the Declaration of Independence held their meetings in the hall.

And now, with the memories of Washington, Jay, Henry, Lee and Adams, John Dickenson, Hancock, Henry Lee, and others, hallowing these walls, one welcomes with a sobered mind and quickened patriotism.

A MAHOLOLO LADY.—The chief lady of the wife of Sheridan Dr. Livingstone, was a queen and of brass rings as thick as one's finger, on each leg, and dozens of smaller each knee; massive brass rings on her left arm, and eight of brass and copper on her right, also, a large ivory ring above the elbow." When we add to this a bead necklace, and a bead sash around the waist, the toilet is complete. It is natural to suppose that this would not be a good walking dress, and it is, in fact, the full evening dress for a queen, and she and her dancing her ankles. Civilization, itself, scarcely makes a greater sacrifice to fashion than this.

NOT A BAD PLAN.—I saw at Montreal, the other day, a pretty of a certain company, called "Frankenstein Water," which transcends anything of the kind that I have yet printed. Here it is. It purports to be a testimonial, and is signed "Parcfamilias":

"The fate of my daughter was covered with pimples. With freckles her shoulders were all discolored; In vain was I resorted to the dresses and bills Had monstrous by ointment drugs and the shops I saw your anti-tincture, sir, and I bought her A flask of Flastingue's blooms-giving water. The pimples were healed from the face, Freckles have vanished, and bully for you."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

SOME gentleman called upon an old woman and inquired if she had a Bible. She was very angry at being asked such a question, and replied:

"Do you think, gentleman, that I am a heathen, that you ask such a question? Run and fetch the Bible out of the drawer, Betsy, and show the gentlemen."

They thought she would not take the trouble, but she insisted that they should "see that she was not a heathen."

Accordingly the Bible was brought, nicely covered. On opening it, the old woman exclaimed:

"Well, how glad I am that you called and asked about the Bible. If there are my spectacles! I have been looking for them these three weeks, and did not know but I had lost them!"

MR. QUINBUS, reading that "it has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, in Dublin, that a clergyman of the Church of England can legally marry himself," observed that he thought he very well as a matrimonial agency, but that even in the hardest time he should prefer to marry a wealth.

BASHFULNESS SOON wears off; modesty never does. Some other writer says: Nothing is more bashful than virtue. If a man begins life with being second husband of a family, he will never get higher.

A REVIVALIST in Binghamton, N. Y., recently encountered a large-sized African, and asked him:

"My friend, have you got religion?"

To which Sambo replied, in a surprised manner:

"Golly, massa, I have got whiskers."

LOVE is a great human impulse. Mothers' and children's love are nature's teachings. Nothing is more beautiful than a young man falling in love. It makes his mouth like a tin whistle, and softens him over immediately.

"AW! how you like my mustache, Mith Laura?" leaped a dandy to a merry girl.

"Very much, indeed. It looks like the fuzz on the back of a caterpillar!"

In all aspects of life putty and varnish has the same relation to the solid oak. Sham is counterfeit; and so great are pills in request, that new discoveries in the compounding of them are always coming up with the times.

A GREEK maid being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, replied:

"I will bring him what cannot purchase—a heart unspoiled, a virtue without stain."

THE good of life consists in playing one's part well, as the actor does who plays the best the angels, and he has been getting a little lower ever since.

WHY is John Morrissey, since his retirement from the prize-ring, like Daniel Webster? Because he is the great expounder.

THOUGH young men criticize the figures of young ladies, yet if she has $40,000, they think the figure beautiful.

A POOR DARKEY, who was sent to jail for marrying two wives, excuses himself by saying that when he had one she thought him, but when he had two they fought each other.

WIFE (complainingly)—"I haven't more than three dresses to wear."

Husband (triumphantly)—"That's all the law allows you."

ALFONSO LAMBERT, a celebrated sculptor to the Emperor Charles V., was a great coxcomb. He got into a passion with his wife, and threw a book at her; she took it into her head to make love in a roguish manner, which appeased him. He caught her in his arms, but turned to her, and having a pro und sigh, said, with a fantastic grimace:

"Ah! I love I feel, what is it?"

"Why love," said the young lady, something like you."

"If you go on that way, sir," said a prisoner in a court of justice, "you will make me fall him with force and fury and shouting judge and jury in a passion, and I will be sent to the State's Prison for hanging me, I know they will."

"Then," said Mercy replied the counsel, an Irish gentleman, carried away by his own eloquence, "never mind, my dear, I'll hang you, and I'll make them repent it."

A REMINDABLE TALE.—A lady thus addressed her servant in the presence of a fashionable party:

"Mary, relieve that burning luminary of the superincumbent mass of combustible matter."

"Ma'am?" said Mary, confused as to what her mistress meant.

"Take," said the lady, "from that luminous body its superincumbent mass of combustible matter."

"Ma'am?" repeated Mary.

"Why, you stupid, you hussy, you!" exclaimed the lady in haste,

"Take a screwdate lately given in Baltimore, just as one of the gentlemen had proposed with handkerchaps a "gentle song of lay," there came a pause, when a voice from the gallery, which had enjoyed the guitar, leaning from the open second-story front window of a house opposite, called out in the plaintive strain: "What was their amazement, when a rich, full soprano voice, which proved to belong to the vocalists of New York Opera Houses, poured forth the following response:

"Sing boy boys! sing ho boys! sing
The lady you're after loves three
The lady you're after loves three
Sing boy boys! sing."

There was a general rush among the affrighted musicians, and the entertainment was at an end.

A COUNTRYMAN in Savannah Ga., observed that a drove of darkies were working on the streets, each wearing a ball and chain. He asked one of them what he had obtained to his leg? "To keep people from stealing it," said the darkey. "keep of thieves about here, massa."

A BIRD SONG.

We are little airy creatures,
All of different voice and features;
One of us in glass is set,
One of us you'll find in jet;
Thus you may see in cage,
And the fourth a box within;
If he fills you should prosper,
It can never fly from you.

Answer—The swivels.

BASHAN.—Many of the houses in the ancient city of Bashan were perfect, only disabled yesterday. The walls are sound, the roofs unbroken, doors and eyes have not fallen from their places. Let not my readers think that I am transcribing from Josephus, or "Arabian Nights," or "Munchausen," or "Gulliver," when I say that I have seen with my own eyes, and can account for the preservation of only a few of these houses in a land of wood? If one of our ancient English cities were deserted for a millennium, there would scarcely be a fragment of it left standing. This is easy enough. The houses of Bashan are not entirely of wood. The walls are made by eight feet thick built of large squared blocks of basalt; the roofs are formed of slabs of the same material, here like planks, and sometimes of wood; the very doors and windows-shutters are of stone, hung upon pivots projecting above and below. Some of these ancient cities have from two to five hundred houses standing, but not a tree is left in them. On one occasion, from the battlements of the castle of Salcah, I counted fifteen cities, all of evil villages dotting the surface of the vast plain, many of them almost as perfect as when they were built, and for more than five centuries there has been a single inhabitant in one of them.

A LIMESTONE THEORY.

THE influence of soil, not only on the growth and development of men, but of animals, has lately been made a subject of study, as the influence of geological conditions on health had previously been made a subject of investigation. It has long been noticed that in granitic regions cattle are always small, and that they are large in marly and limestone districts. Professor Agassiz believes that the lime or chalk necessary to the formation of the bones, the framework of men and animals, is derived from limestone somewhere, and he is more likely to be got in limestone countries. Dr. Holmes, the distinguished poet and author, also endorses the limestone theory. He says: "In Kentucky, Ohio, and Western Vermont, men grow to larger size because of the limestone formations under the soil."

These opinions are not without their combatants, however, one of whom tells us:

"The character of the early settlers of these countries, and the habits of life which they were necessarily compelled to adopt, had much more to do with their physical development than the limestone that underlies these States.

"Kentucky was first settled by men from Virginia, the hardiest among the inhabitants of that old commonwealth—men who possessed unusual resolution and strength of bodily constitution. They traveled several or eight hundred miles, without roads, through an unbroken wilderness, inhabited only by wild beasts and savage Indians. Men of such a stamp, arriving in a new country, and being, moreover, very much compelled to adopt the most simple and most natural habits of life, would be well-developed males, and the females of the same race would be strong and well-formed women.

"Kentucky was also abundantly rich in game. These simple habits of life, practiced by such a hardy stock, would tend still to give to their offspring the best and the most perfect physical development. Thus for two generations there was a tendency necessarily to size and physical endurance those of any other state. But at the present time a few of these large men are to be seen—a mere remnant of a former generation remains.

"The same remarks will apply to Ohio, I believe, will fall below that of Ohio, a much older State. The people in the habits of life among the people of the north of Kentucky, since its early settlement, has been very great. Large cities have also sprung up, and a luxurious style, and the adoption of easy and luxurious habits of life, have produced a feeble physical race of the people.

"As Ohio labor has ever been deemed honorable, and the inhabitants still, in a good degree, maintain their early habits of industry, if not of simple living, the report of the statistics of Ohio, furnished by the Commissioner of Agriculture, will be very interesting facts are given, but the present length of this article will only allow an abstract. "The average height of the men in the interior of Ohio is five feet ten and a half inches, the average weight is 160 pounds, two and a half inches above that of the English recruits, and one and a half inches above that of the French conscripts. Of the two hundred and thirty-nine individuals taken promiscuously from agricultural districts, fifty-nine counties were six feet and upward—ten being above six feet two inches. The climate of the Western States is, we think, be attributed to the character of the country and climate, which are favorable to industry and simple habits of living."

A YOUNG widow, who had married an old man, was the other day asked how she liked him. "The second husband, at first, gently remonstrated.

"I grieve, Mary, my dear wife, pouting, "you'll want me to remember you, when you're dead and gone!"

"Pa, they tell us about the angry ocean; what makes the ocean angry?"

"Oh, it has been crossed so often."

When you feel a Cough or Bronchial affection, stopping on a Box of BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, and cure it before it becomes incurable.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. The most extraordinary Curiosity ever seen in the New York Herald. Last Week of the Circus, Circus and Drama, Circus, Circus, Circus, at 3: Evening Performance. The CIRCUS TROUPE, and thoroughbred Horses of Mr. Welch, Equestrian Stars, Performing Horse, Horned Bull, Splendid Acts of Horsemanship, Comic Circus, Equestrian Drama, Thursday and Wednesday, the Romantic Drama of the ELSHIE; OR, THE WARRIOR'S BRIDE. Every Evening, Thursday, Wednesday, the Domestic Drama of JESSIE GRAY; OR, THE ORPHAN'S VENGEANCE. At 3: Every Afternoon, Performances Singer. Great Living Curiosities: Three immense Human Beings, Two Living Dwarfs, Little Lady Sleeken, Mammoth Fat Woman, Giant Brothers, Albino Boy, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Great Living Grand Aquaria, 150,000 curiosities. Admission, 30 cents; Children under 10 years, 15 cents. Monday, 16th, will be produced an Historical Biblical Spectacle, with magnificent Scenery, Costumes, etc.

Best Black Ink. Five cents a gallon. Recipe sent free for five cents. Address Box 13, Hinsdale, N. H.

PRACTICAL HAND-BOOK

FOR

MINERS, METALLURGISTS AND ASSAYERS,

BY JULIUS SILVERSMITH.

Comprising the most recent improvements in the disintegration, amalgamation, smelting and parting of gold and silver containing gold, silver, copper, tin, quicksilver, &c., &c.

ALSO A

COMPREHENSIVE DIGEST OF THE MINING LAWS

OF THE

PROPOSELY UNITED STATES.

One volume, 12mo., cloth, $2.

For sale by DEWITT & DAVENPORT, Publisher,

No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

As Album for Thirty Cents! NEW! BEAUTIFUL! EXQUISITE! CHEAP! A beautiful 32th Matchless Album, containing 32 Photographs in metal frames, and HIGHLY PERFUMED, opening with Spring Flowers, for 30 cents. Address CALVIN, WILLIS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, N. Y. tf

"FANDANGLE."

Gentlemen, send for a "Fandangle," which will make more fun with your friends than anything you ever saw. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 501, Boston. 543-5

"FANDANGLE."

Ladies, send for a "Fandangle," and gratify your propensity for fun. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 501, Boston. 543-5

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

Now Ready,

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLUMES,

THE

Pictorial History

OF THE

WAR FOR THE UNION

BY

MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

To be had only of Authorized Agents, and not in Book Stores, being

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

THE TWO VOLUMES

Contain 1,150 Pages,

Embellished with over

200 Splendid Engravings.

By first-class Artists, embracing views of Battle-Scenes and Thrilling Incidents, Maps, and Illustrations of Notable Events,

Portraits of all

THE PROMINENT UNION GENERALS,

and Portraits of all the Prominent Confederate Officers,

The whole forming a

COMPLETE AND RELIABLE HISTORY OF THE WAR FROM ITS COMMENCEMENT TO ITS CLOSE!

Giving a graphic picture of the great Drama of War, its bloody encounters, frightful slaughter, its death escapes, individual daring, desperate charges, personal anecdotes, &c., &c., gleaned from eye-witnesses of and participants in the terrible scenes described—a truthful, living relief of all matters of interest connected with this, the most gigantic of human struggles.

Also a complete

CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD,

Giving every Event in the Order of its Occurrence.

THE IMMENSE SUCCESS

Which has already crowned the efforts of the Publisher proclaims this work to be

"THE PEOPLE'S HISTORY,"

"THE BOOK FOR THE MILLION,"

"The Cheapest and Best History Published."

Among all the writers of America perhaps no one could be found more capable of writing a history for the people than Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. No person who has read the historical romances which first gave this lady her reputation will doubt her ability to produce a history at once truthful and brilliant. Without deviating from fact, she has spread the charm of her great descriptive powers over actual events, investing them upon the pages of history with a distinctness and power that gives them the charm of romance, while every battle she describes is so truthfully depicted that the dullest writer could give them, and each event can be depended upon as authentic in fact and detail.

REASONS WHY THIS HISTORY EXCELS ALL OTHERS.

1st. It is a well-written and truthful narrative of events as they occurred, and not a political text-book, nor designed to pander to party feelings or to party interests.

2d. It is not a mere expression of private opinions, or lauds-action or condemnation of individuals, but a clear and lucid exposition of the deeds of war, leaving to the readers' judgment the privilege of deciding upon the merits or demerits of the actors engaged.

3d. It is the only history published containing the portraits of the Confederate officers engaged in the conflict.

4th. It is the only history containing a complete Chronological Record.

5th. It is the last printed, most handsomely illustrated work, of 1,150 pages, now being published, at the exceedingly low prices for which it is sold.

Cost to Subscribers.

BOTH VOLUMES.

Bound in Cloth, Marbled Edges $5 00
Bound in Embossed Leather 7 00
Bound in Sheep (Library Style) 7 00
Bound either in Embossed Leather or Sheep, Gilt Edges 8 00

Specimen Copies mailed on receipt of price.

Subscriptions

Received by the Publisher and his authorized Agents, by whom the work will be delivered, free of charges, on receipt of the price. An agent wanted in every town in the United States. Liberal inducements given to Canvassers. Address

B. W. HITCHCOCK,

PUBLISHER,

14 Chambers Street,

NEW YORK.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

JOE MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Agents Always Wanted.

Circulars Free. Address
537-40 B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chamber street, N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 5291y

---

$1,500 PER YEAR! We went agents everywhere to sell our IMPROVED $20 Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. The ONLY machines sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Matrimony Made Easy;

Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with specimen Love Letters. Price 15 cents. Send orders to Box 3,410 P. O., N. Y. tf

---

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865,

No. 14866	drew	$100,000
No. 25240	"	50,000
No. 15580	"	25,000
No. 93	"	10,000
No. 16316	"	5,000
No. 7907	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN—Red or Brown, $2 50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE LINED—$5, $7, $9, $11, $13, $15.
FRENCH—Blocked and Lined, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $75 to $300.
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.

FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable until the great discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools readily yield to these peerless remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare Illustrations. Sent Gratis.

CHARLES E. MACKEY,
tf 267 Broadway, New York.

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.

S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, free. Address BLACKIE & Co., 713 Broadway, N. Y. tf

---

144 COMIC VALENTINES $1
Sent by Mail, Postpaid.
B. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers street, N. Y. 537-40

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses.

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., PERFUMERS, tf 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

SIAMESE TWINS.

Two men grown together. A Life Photograph sent by mail for 35 cents. Address

C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

COLORED CARTES DE VISITE

SIXTY CENTS PER DOZEN.

I will send upon receipt of 60 cents 12 Cartes de Visite of French Grisettes in different positions, or the whole set of 50 different pictures, $2.
541-4 T. ALLEN, 60 Nassau street, New York.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of Price. Address

FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

Vieve Brower; or, Life in the Concert Saloons of New York. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78. HOLLAND, N. Y. 542-51

Kate Vaugh, a Racy Novel, 72 pp.; only 15 cents; sent free. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Senseology, Psychologic Fascination, Marriage Happily Attained, How to Become Rich, Win the Opposite Sex, Marriage, &c. This queer, useful, and spicy book, sent by mail for 25 cents. Address EVANS & CO., Box 1,215, Philadelphia. tf

---

Guide to Beauty. 100 pages. All should have it. Mailed for 25c. Address C. JENNISON, Box 5,374, P. O., New York. tf

---

Employment at your own Homes—either sex—suitable for a livelihood, or leisure hours in every city and town. Large profits realized. Address, with red stamp, for particulars, DR. WARNER, 54 East 12th street, New York City. 542-3

How to Take Pictures.

I will send, post-paid, for $1, the Art of Copying Likenesses in a few seconds by the rays of light. Any number of copies may be taken without injury to the likeness. Anybody can do it. No apparatus required. Address P. J. WARD, Terre Haute, Ind. 542-3

10,000 ALREADY SOLD. Eighth Edition now ready. MAGIC MADE EASY: A complete expose of legerdemain, sleight-of-hand, &c. It tells how to eat fire, to cut off your nose, rope-tying feats, and nearly 200 other astounding magical performances. Price 20 cents. Sold everywhere, or mailed, free of postage, by HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Theatricals; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Salts, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 3410, Post Office, N. Y. 533-5

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Onguents and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

---

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

---

300 per cent. PROFIT for AGENTS. Three genteel articles everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent, with particulars, free by mail for 35 cents. Address E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.
tf

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Sent free for FIVE CENTS.
tf Address, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

Short-hand Reporting.

The undersigned will give to a few gents a thorough course of private instruction in phonopraphy; and as the student advances, will attend public meetings with him, that he may have what is needful to success, the proper practice; and will then assist him to a profitable situation as reporter, if desired. Please address

C. H. MANSFIELD,
No. 189 East Twenty-third St.

Get Rich.—$10,000 is something, but you can get double that amount by sending a stamp to F. C. RENNER, Ladiesburgh, Md. Thousands made Rich already.

New Editions!

The Pictorial Double Numbers for Jan. and Feb. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with Physiognomy, Ethnology, Physiology, and Psychology, now ready. Twenty cents each, or $2 a year. Address

FOWLER & WELLS,
543-4 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Catarrh Cured for One Dollar.

This is no humbug! Read! For One Dollar, per mail, I will send you a recipe and medicine that will cure the worst cases of Catarrh in the Head or Bronchial Tubes in a few weeks, or money returned. It has cured me, and, as I believe, saved my life. I know it is no humbug, and am willing to aid in the relief of others from that tormenting and dangerous disease. Address T. P. SYMMES, No. 152½ Fulton St., N. Y.
543-4

For Thorough Instruction in Vocal Music,

Use BASSINI'S Art of Singing: an Analytical and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice. This work is prepared on a rigidly scientific basis, and universally admitted to be the most desirable work for teachers and scholars. Price, for Soprano Voice, complete, $4. Abridged, $3. For Tenor Voice, $4. Mailed post-paid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CRIMPING attachment, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is NOISELESS in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and works horizontal, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD of ALL KINDS. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c.; the strongest machine made. Warranted not to get out of order for THREE YEARS. It has taken the PREMIUMS at New York and other STATE FAIRS, and received the FULL APPROVAL of ALL the principal Journals, and of those who have USED THEM. The ONLY Low Price Machine Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others at the same price are INFRINGEMENTS.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address
tf T. WILLIAM & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia.

10,000 SOLD.

I will send by mail, post-paid, a beautiful Military Album, with 24 assorted portraits of our Union Generals, for 50 cents, or $3 per dozen to Agents. Address C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

The Way to Make from One Dollar to One Dollar and Fifty Cents in an evening, with other information, will be sent to any one enclosing two stamps. Address A. WOLCOTT, Cleveland, O.

EVANS' TOILET GEMS,

Consisting of Diamond, Emerald, Ruby, Royal Azure, Gold and Silver Powders. These gems are sprinkled in the hair, and present a glittering and brilliant appearance. For balls, parties, and social gatherings, they are elegant and fashionable. Sold only at HUNT & CO.'S, Perfumers, 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia. Sample box of either kind sent by mail for $1 18; sufficient to dress the hair twenty times. tf

---

FUN, "O," FUN.

HURRAH for the new Phunney articles which are now just out; they sell like wild-fire. "The Pocket Picture Gallery," the most laughable thing on earth; over 1,000 "Phunney Specimens of Wit, Humor, and Endless Transformations." Price only 50 cents. "The Magic Pocket-Book," a rich thing. Price 50 cents. "The Magic Cards;" they are the strangest thing on earth. Price 50 cents per pack. "The Old Salamander;" he beats all. Price 25 cents. "The Phunney Album," with 24 assorted Pictures. Price 50 cents. A Rare Book—"Life Scenes in our great cities." Price 75 cents. A beautiful bound book M. "M." E.; it tells the only true magic secrets, showing how to win your sweetheart, and make your money like dirt. Price only 75 cents. A "N" hand-book, beautifully bound. Price $1. I will send any of the above articles by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, or I will send the whole lot for $4. These articles are just the thing to make a world of fun this winter. I hope to hear from you all soon. Address orders to

C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,308, Chicago, Ill.

$5 Secret.—Agents and others can have for only 10 cents, the great $5 secret and other information whereby they can clear $20 a day, or circulars free. Address STEPHENS & CO., 239 Broadway, N. Y.
541-4

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.

Sample and Catalogue sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address
tf JAS. F. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, N. Y.

---

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent post-paid for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address
536-45 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition, WITH SUPPLEMENT. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

---

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK.

Photographic Materials,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.

Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties. tf

---

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

R. R. R.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF

RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

The Cheapest and Best Medicine for Family Use in the World.

One 50 Cent Bottle

WILL CURE MORE COMPLAINTS, AND PREVENT THE SYSTEM AGAINST SUDDEN ATTACKS OF EPIDEMIC AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES, THAN ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS EXPENDED FOR OTHER MEDICINES OR MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

THE MOMENT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF IS APPLIED EXTERNALLY, OR TAKEN INTERNALLY, ACCORDING TO DIRECTIONS, PAIN, FROM WHATEVER CAUSE, CEASES TO EXIST.

1849. Asiatic Cholera. 1849.

IN 1849 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF CURED OVER 10,000 PERSONS SEIZED WITH ASIATIC CHOLERA AND BY ITS TIMELY USE AS A PREVENTIVE, SAVED OVER ONE MILLION OF LIVES.

1856. Yellow Fever. 1856.

In 1856 RADWAY'S READY RELIEF cured thousands of persons seized with Yellow Fever. As a preventive of this terrible disease, Dr. Frederick B. Page, of Mississippi, urged its use to the Medical Boards of the Southern States, and publicly recommended it as the most certain safeguard in the world.

During the War

More lives were saved by the use of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF than from the best efforts of the medical staff. We have hundreds of letters proving this fact. We have the evidence to prove that in cases where men, by exposure to malarious swamps, bottom lands, rice fields, etc., used RADWAY'S READY RELIEF, invariably escaped sickness; those who did not were seized with Dysentery, Swamp Fevers, Bilious Fevers, Diarrhœa, Cholera, Rheumatism, etc., and those only who, when thus seized, used the READY RELIEF, entirely recovered.

Its Universal Use.

It cures the worst diseases incidental to all climates. It has been tested in Asia, Africa, South America, Europe, East and West Indies, and cured the worst forms of Cholera, Dysentery, Fluxes, Fevers, Yellow Fever, Swamp, Marsh, Ship, and other Fevers—and never failed in protecting persons who used it as a preventive against attacks.

Why Not?

If RADWAY'S READY RELIEF possesses such remarkable disinfecting, neutralizing, strengthening, aperient, sudorific, anodyne, and other properties, as to cure the worst forms of disease as they exist, in the most sickly climates of the world, and where the poisonous malaria is so thick that "you may almost cut it with a knife," why not cure, with the great ease it does, all sorts of fevers of the milder type in our own climate? Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Fever and Ague, Bilious Fever, Influenza, etc., are but the milder and weaker forms of the more terrible diseases. If it cures the worst forms as they exist in the most sickly climates, it will readily cure the less as they prevail amongst us.

Domestic Purposes.

Every family should be provided with a bottle of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. One bottle costs only 50 cents, and this bottle can be used for various purposes, with the assurance of doing more permanent good than one hundred dollars expended for other medicines and physician's prescriptions. If suddenly seized with sickness, the use of the Relief will instantly arrest the disease, and afford immediate ease to the patient.

Ten Years' Rheumatism

CURED BY RUBBING THE SPINE WITH

Radway's Ready Relief.

ROBERT ELY, Esq., aged 60, has been afflicted with Rheumatism for 10 years. For the past 12 months he was confined to his room, perfectly helpless. His limbs were distorted, swollen and misshapen; his hands cramped, so that he could neither move his fingers nor open nor shut his hands; rheumatic pains ran riot all over his body; moving him from his bed involved the most intense suffering. He was induced to have his spine rubbed one hour, morning and night, with RADWAY'S READY RELIEF. The first rubbing gave him ease; a few successive rubbings relieved him of pain; one month's application of the RELIEF and a few doses of RADWAY'S PILLS cured him. He is now a well and hearty man, and uses the RELIEF and PILLS occasionally only.

As a Family Medicine.

As a family medicine it is the most useful remedy known to the world. If seized with pain or sickness, or threatened with any malignant disease, its use will quickly cure the patient and protect the system against attacks. IN A FEW MINUTES after the application of the READY RELIEF externally, or its administration internally, the patient, seized with the most excruciating PAINS, ACHES, CRAMPS, RHEUMATISM, NEURALGIA, GOUT, LUMBAGO, FEVER AND AGUE, SPASMS, SORE THROAT, INFLUENZA, DIPHTHERIA, CONGESTION, or INFLAMMATION will enjoy ease and comfort.

IMPORTANT.—TO FARMERS AND OTHERS residing in sparsely settled districts where it is difficult to secure the services of a physician, RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is invaluable. It can be used with positive assurance of doing good in all cases where pain or discomfort is experienced, or if seized with INFLUENZA, DIPHTHERIA, SORE THROAT, BAD COUGHS, HOARSENESS, BILIOUS COLIC, INFLAMMATION of the BOWELS, STOMACH, LUNGS, LIVER, KIDNEYS; or with CROUP, QUINSY, FEVER AND AGUE, or with NEURALGIA, HEADACHE, TIC DOLOREUX, TOOTHACHE, EARACHE, or with LUMBAGO, PAIN IN THE BACK, or RHEUMATISM, or with DIARRHŒA, CHOLERA MORBUS, or DYSENTERY, or with BURNS, SCALDS, or BRUISES, or with STRAINS, CRAMPS, or SPASMS. The application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will cure you of the worst of these complaints in a few hours.

RHEUMATISM.—This painful disease has baffled the most skilful physicians and popular remedies. It is the most difficult of diseases to treat—yet RADWAY'S READY RELIEF has never failed in affording immediate relief to the sufferer; and in all cases of Acute, Inflammatory or Nervous Rheumatism, to effect a permanent cure. In Chronic Rheumatism and Gout, RADWAY'S CLEANSING SYRUP, called Renovating Resolvent, should be taken as an adjunct with the READY RELIEF.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERYWHERE.
Price 50 cents per Bottle.
Dr. JOHN RADWAY & CO., Montreal.
C. E. RADWAY & CO.,
539-42 No. 87 Maiden Lane, New York.

B. T. HAYWARD,

208 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Manufacturer of Badges.

I will send as sample a Solid Gold Masonic, Odd Fellow, or Fenian Badge, on receipt of $5. Coin Silver Army Badge, or Gold Enameled Badge, for $3. Parties ordering will please be particular about the number, as I have no connection with any other house. o

SKATES FOR THE MILLION

DEPOT FOR

Lovatt's Patent Skates,

WITHOUT STRAPS, AND

NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,

WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.

A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates. Depot for the "Latest Rink" and "Patent Foot Shanks." Wholesale and Retail.

ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway.
Skates Ground and Repaired. o

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 DIMES, mailed to any address for 50 cts
THREE of different powers for $1. Address
0000 F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES.

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

MESSRS. C. & SONS have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. o

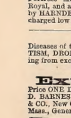
Ask for the Vicksburg Schottische, composed by Miss Baden. A musical gem, with a superb title-page, in colors, of the city of Vicksburg. Published by WOODWARD & DESCHENES, Vicksburg, Miss. For sale at the principal music stores in the country. o

o

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newborne, Fort Royal, and all other places, should be sent at hail rates, by HAINDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Boxes charged low rates. 0000



TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL, and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S

Extract Buchu.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-47o

WHISKERS and MUSTACHES

forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SEVIGNE'S RESTAURATEUR. CAPILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acts upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success. Names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 542-47o

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-45o

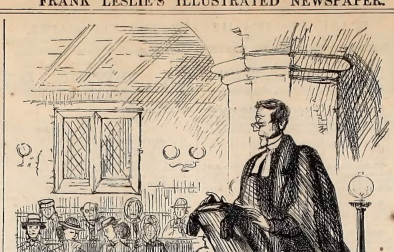
CHOLERA! CHOLERA!!

Do not die with the cholera. Save your life. Dr. Charles' European Cholera Remedy has cured the worst cases in from 10 to 30 minutes. Everybody should send at once and receive it, by return of mail, for we know not what time it will come upon us. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 00, or six for $5. Address all orders to the agent.

CHARLES L. BRIDGE, Agent,
541-4o 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH



SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
537-49o 509 Broadway, New York.

A VERY NATURAL MISTAKE—THE NEW DERBY HAT.

NEAR-SIGHTED CLERGYMAN.—"Dearly beloved brethren—I must beg of the gentlemen of my congregation to remove their hats. It is very irreverend to wear them."

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER.

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 19th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen, a decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved scientific principles, and warranted to REMOVE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. If required so any "or standing up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Approved by the Press and all who have used them. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors, to 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

POLLAR & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 693 Broadway, next door to 4th St., N. Y., Wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $80 each.
o513-45

LADIES' PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS.

WHOLESALE & RETAIL.

WARD, 387 B'WAY, N.Y.

One Lady's Collar sent free to the Trade, with list of prices and the drawings of different styles. o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by BEIDE'S CHIMCAN OINTMENT. Price 35 cents. Send 42 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 535-47o

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfo

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Isoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, &c. She is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that no picture is what it purports to be, by stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, with inches, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
542-51o P. O. Drawer 72, Albany, N. Y.

MUSICAL BOXES.

531-45o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

ECONOMY is WEALTH.

If you want the best fitting, strongest, and most serviceable paper collar ever offered to the public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

The most Economical Collar ever Invented.

Showing the embossed or printed stitch equally well on both sides.

The following styles are now made:

Patent REVERSIBLE Enameled PAPER COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Bank Note Paper COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Printed Stitch PAPER COLLARS

To be obtained all Furnishing Good Dealers throughout the country.

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & Co., Agents,
541-53o Winthrop Square, Boston.

BEAUTY.—Auburn, Golden, Flaxen, and Silken CURLS produced by the use of Professor DR BELEY'S FRISER LE CHEVEUX. One application warrants to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy, massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ, & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer, 21, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 542-54o

Ladies & Gentlemen

OUT OF THE CITY,

TAKE YOUR OWN MEASURE AND SEND TO

E. A. BROOKS, &c'a,
Importer and Manufacturer of

BOOTS, SHOES, &c.

575 Broadway, New York.

Directions for Measuring the Foot.

First. Place the foot upon a piece of paper and trace the outline of same with a pencil, which will give the length and spread of the foot, as shown in figure 1. Second. Make the following measurements, in inches and fractions, with tape measure, as shown in figure 2, viz:

1st—The Ball of the foot.
2d—The Instep.
3d—The High Instep.
4th—The Heel.
5th—The Ankle.

o

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $30 to $50 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Lower Township, New Jersey.

From Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, on an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

The Little Joker and A FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,067, P. O., New York. tf

$7 FINE WATCHES $7

AT OLD PRICES.

English Silver Watches	$ 6, $8, $
Pure Silver Hunting Lepines	$12 Each.
Fine 18 Karat Gold-Plated Watches	$13, $15, $20.
Fancy Compass and Thermometer Watches	$15, $20.
Silver Hunting Levers	$20, $25.
Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches	$20, $25 to $75.
Coin Silver American Levers	$30.

All kinds of Good Watches, low.
CATELY BROTHERS, Importers,
tfo 102 Nassau street, N. Y.

Superbly Enameled Reversible Steel Skirt Bearers, Curls, Collars. 50 Cents; Extra Set, $1. Sold by Leading Corset and Curl Dealers Retail. Send price a size. Bolton & Foscue, 78 Nassau St., N. Y.
o

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. o6f

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH.

Salt Rheum. OINTMENT. Salt Rheum.

Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cure Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 Cents; by sending 60 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists. 541-56o

Serpents de Pharaon.—How to make them. Enclose 50 cents, and address J. F. BRACE & CO., Mount Morris, N. Y. o

STAMMERING

cured by Bate's Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet &c., address BIMPSON & CO., 277 West 18d street, N. Y. 6owo

Good Books.—Guide to Beauty, 25 cts.; Love Oracle, 30 cts.; Laws of Love, 25 cts.; How to Converse, 25 cts.; Rules of the Billiard Table, 50 cts; Guide to the Stage, or, How to be an Actor, 25 cts.; Parlor Games, male characters only, 50 cts.; female characters, 50 cts.; Burlesque Drama, 50 cts.; Quotations from Shakespeare, 49 cts.; Life of a Showman, 50 cts.; Parlor Pantomimes, set, $1. Mammoth catalogues sent to every lady and gentleman, free. Send for them. W. C. WEMYSS, 378 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York. o

MICROSCOPES 60 cents; two for $1.

THE FRENCH TUBULAR MICROSCOPE, a very powerful instrument, mailed for 60 cents; two for $1. Address
GEO. D. WASHBURN & CO., Box 5,093, Boston, Mass. 541-3o

ROGERS' FRAGRANT ODONTOLINE FOR THE TEETH

For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers.
o

Notice to the Trade.

On the 1st of March will be issued the first number of an Illustrated Monthly Periodical, for the Young, entitled,

Frank Leslie's Children's Friend.

This will be the cheapest, most instructive and amusing Magazine ever published for young folks; full of interesting matter, with numerous illustrations. Although the object of this publisher is to please children exclusively, yet the publication will have sufficient general interest to amuse grown-up people. The instruction, as well as the recreation of children, will be combined in FRANK LESLIE'S CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

There are several publications periodically for young or advanced years, but there is a real want existing: or something within the reach and capacity of younger children, which they can read and appreciate, and which shall be sufficiently cheap to be within the reach of the poorest families.

The CHILDREN'S FRIEND will be conducted by persons whose experience in the direction and guidance of the young gives unusual advantages in adapting the contents and illustrations to their awakening intellect.

It will contain 32 pages, small quarto, price ten cents. Yearly subscription, one dollar.

This work will be indispensable to every school and household.

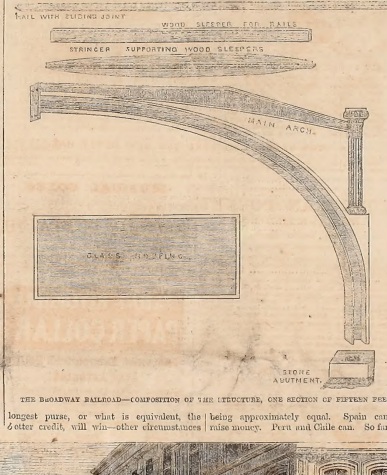
For sale by all Newsdealers.

Liberal terms to Canvassers with Teachers and Clergymen taking a number of copies.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

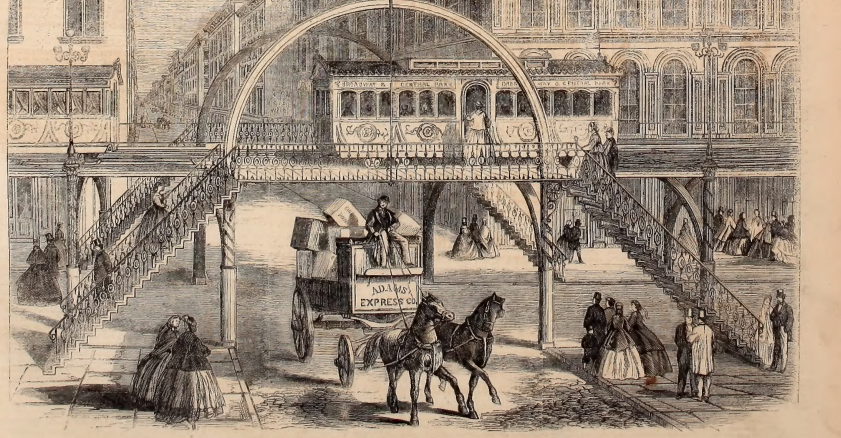
Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 544 Vol. XXI] NEW YORK, MARCH 3, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 NUMBERS $1 00.



Spain and the South American Alliance.

THE last steamer from the Isthmus brings us the news of the ratification of a treaty, offensive and defensive, between Chile and Peru, and of the formal declaration of war by the latter against Spain. This effete power, therefore, baffled and humiliated in Santo Domingo, now finds herself embroiled in a deadly struggle with Chile, the most vigorous and enterprising of the republics of South America, and with Peru, the richest of all the American republics, with the single exception of the United States. The proximate results of this contest are plain. Spain will be again beaten and humiliated. Of her last squadron sent into the Pacific against the same combatants, not a single vessel returned to the Peninsula. Not one of the present squadron, which it has cost her utmost efforts to get together and sustain, will ever see the Atlantic, except through ignominious flight. So much we venture to predict, without pretending to the gift of prophecy, but as a fair and inevitable deduction from facts and conditions obvious to every mind.



In the first place, Spain is bankrupt. She stands lowest in the scale of republicating states. Even the profligacy of Turkey has not dragged the credit of that superfluous empire so low as has the faithlessness of Spain here. Her bonds are nominally at 14 and 25 per cent., and would run still lower if the unfortunate holders had the audacity to put any considerable amount on the market! The bonds of Peru, on the other hand, stood lately, and probably now stand, at a premium. Those of Chile, if not so high, are certainly three to four times higher than those of Spain. Now as war is costly, and as a war carried on against Peru and Chile, eleven thousand miles away, must be especially so, it follows that the longest purse, or what is equivalent, the better credit, will win—other circumstances being approximately equal. Spain cannot raise money. Peru and Chile can. So far as superior means, therefore, may enter into the conflict, the chances are with the South American republics.

But, as Napoleon said, "the Lord is on the side of the heaviest battalions." How stands the issue under this aspect? It may be safely assumed that Spain, even if she had the transports, could not send out to the Pacific coast, and support there, a sufficiently large land force to effect a lodgment, or hold any important position. Her powers of offense are limited to purely naval operations. Then the question arises, How can these be made effective in a coercive sense? With the exception of Valparaiso and Callao, the ports of Peru and Chile are of no consequence per se. Valparaiso may be blockaded and bombarded, but Callao is too strongly fortified to be assailed, except at such risks as no Spanish commander would dare to assume. All the other ports on the coast are of slight importance, made up of paltry sheds, in which goods rest for a few hours before being shipped, or after being loaded. They might be destroyed entirely, without making any serious impression, and without hardly creating an irritation. To blockade, seize, or destroy them, would be mere waste of time, means and effort. But it would be impossible for the largest naval power in the world (which Spain is not), to blockade 3,000 miles of coast with more than a hundred available ports. Even now the ostentatious blockade of Chile has been reduced to that of the single port of Valparaiso, where all the Spanish vessels have been concentrated for mutual protection!

Peru may be supposed to be specially vulnerable in her guano islands. But it must be remembered that these islands produce no food or fuel, not even a drop of water, which must be brought from the mainland, where no Spanish force could land, except at risk of almost certain destruction; and further, all existing means for the extraction and shipment of guano are taxed to their utmost capability in filling English, German, French and other contracts, which have to run over many years, and with which Spain dare not interfere. Her late seizure of the islands gave her no tangible return, for she was unable to collect a single dollar from all the amounts of guano loaded during the ten months of her so-called occupation.

THE BROADWAY RAILROAD—COMPOSITION OF THE STRUCTURE, ONE SECTION OF FIFTEEN FEET.

THE PROPOSED BROADWAY RAILROAD—THE BRIDGE ELEVATION AT THE STREET CROSSINGS.

Outside of the islands, Peru is absolutely invulnerable. Her simple inertia is more potential than the demonstrative force of the most powerful European nation. But Peru has something more than her natural impenetrability in her favor. She has a positive naval force, which may be rapidly augmented, with the aid of Chile, so as to be able to cope, with the best chance of success, with that of Spain. A double-turreted monitor and an iron-clad frigate have lately sailed from England for Callao, which, with the existing war vessels of Peru, will make a very formidable squadron—perhaps, if well manned, the most formidable in the Pacific.

The Spanish Admiral showed, in the most marked manner possible, his sense of the hopelessness of the attempt to coerce Chile by blockade. He found that if he separated his vessels for that purpose, they would be destroyed in detail. The capture of the Covadonga opened his eyes to that danger, and he blew out his brains in sheer despair. If a blockade of Chile proved to be impossible, what can this mode of coercion be expected to avail against both Chile and Peru, especially when, as now appears certain, Equador and Bolivia will join those two republics in their offensive and defensive alliance?

To bombard Valparaiso, or even Callao, would only be an act of vengeance, exciting Chile and Peru to more vigorous action, without weakening their physically or seriously affecting their resources. And as most of the property in these ports belongs to foreigners, the act would only tend to provoke their enmity, and perhaps eventually bring Spain, while embroiling her with foreign governments, none too well inclined to treat her with favor.

From our point of view, Spain is utterly impotent as against the new and growing South American nationalities. Persistence in the policy she has undertaken in the Pacific must bring her defeat and dishonor, which in turn must seriously react on her domestic affairs, already in a disordered, not to say critical condition.

It would be a severe but not undeserved punishment, if her wanton, boastful and insulting interventions and aggressions in Santo Domingo and South America, undertaken in the belief that the power of the United States was permanently broken, should result not alone in a shrinkage of Spain, but in such a radical change in the institutions of the country, We may regard the severance of Cuba as another not impossible but probable result. Last year contemplated the contingency of the destruction of the Spanish squadron in the Pacific by the combined fleets of the South American republics. What is there to prevent them from guaranteeing their future security by effectively and for ever crippling what remains of the power of Spain, by depriving her of the last of the American possessions? We would not only have the right to do so in their character as belligerents, but there would be something chivalric and noble in disenthralling that fine-hearted people of Cuba, and lifting from their necks a heavy and offensive yoke! In doing so, spite of the utmost vigor of our government in enforcing its neutrality obligations, it would be largely supported and assisted by something more tangible than an undivided public sentiment in their favor. Their sentiment, we should, would be so strong, that any intervention by France or any only nation at all likely to undertake it to support Spanish dominion in Cuba, would result in the loss to the crown of America in the scale, and in a war which could not fail to drag down both Bonaparte and Bourbon.

Whatever may be the value of these speculations, it is certain that the contest which Spain has provoked in the Pacific has already reached unexpected and formidable proportions, and promises to test if not battle her utmost strength. Failure, on her part, seems almost inevitable. And is not failure revolution and dismemberment? Spain has found her Nemesis.

AMERICAN researches in the Holy Land are thus acknowledged by the London Athenæum:

"Americans have done a good deal for Palestine. Dr. Vandyke is perhaps our best Arabic scholar. Mr. Eli Smith was unequalled in knowledge of sites and antiquities. Dr. Thompson has become an Arab in literature. Even Robinson, though his notoriety has been nearly in excess of his merit, did service to Biblical lore; his many great errors of fact, his still more ludicrous errors of inference, may be admitted, and yet a fair residue of value remain. More than all others he owns a debt of knowledge to Lieut. Lynch, whose surveys of the lower Jordan and the Dead Sea are even now our only sources of information as to those regions pretending to scientific accuracy."

OUR PUBLICATIONS.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY—PRICE 10 CENTS, OR $4 A YEAR.

This most splendidly illustrated weekly record of the times has become the leading Illustrated Paper of America. It contains faithful sketches of all the leading events of the day, both foreign and domestic, Comic Cuts, a perfect pictorial commentary on the times of the world. It contains every new and important invention, of Utility or Beauty, Splendid Full-page Steel Embellishments of Remarkable Scenery, Art Pictures, the Striking Events of Peace and War, New Publications, Fashions, &c. Its Literature comprises a continued story by some distinguished author, Tales, Sketches, Articles, Criticisms, Poetry, Foreign and Domestic News, &c.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Journal published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA

Each Number contains a variety of Short Stories by the most Approved Authors, Sketches of Travel and Society, Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Manners and Customs, Adventures in the Wilds of the Golden Times, Heroic Passages in History, Portraits and Biographs of the Self-Made Men of America, Articles for Young Folks, Gossip for the Ladies, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures, Sparkling Wit, Humor, &c., &c., of great power and utility constantly introduced, making it the most comprehensive and popular Family Journal ever published. It is also the most elaborately Illustrated Family Paper ever presented to the public.

Terms:

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Journal published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrirte Zeitung,

Or German Illustrated Newspaper,

Published weekly—price 10 cents, or $4 a year. This splendidly Illustrated Newspaper is same size as Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and is the best Illustrated Paper in the German Language.

The Great Magazine of Fashion.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine,

With nearly double the number of Pages, Steel Plates, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some exquisite Parisian Bonnet, colored to exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll with a complete set of costumes, fashion, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number will contain a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Lady"—and a doll model in her costume complete, the articles of dress being separate.

The February number contains an exquisitely colored lithograph of "So Fresp," and a doll model ball-room costume, the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated artists, are also to be presented, and will appear in the March and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions will be received for four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis to the person sending the amount.

Subscriptions to be sent to

FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun.

Published Monthly—$1 50 a year.

This excellent Comic Paper is now in its ninth year, and in the choicest material and paper of any

Frank Leslie's New Monthly.

The best and cheapest Illustrated Magazine ever offered to the public—devoted to useful and entertaining literature. Price 15 cents per number, or $1 60 a year.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine and New Monthly sent to one address for $4 50.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

UNPRECEDENTED ATTRACTIONS.

Three Splendid Gift Plates.

WITH NO. 39 OF

FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER

each purchaser is entitled to receive the great National Engraving,

"Grant in Peace,"

The most exquisite and attractive work of the time.

With that number commenced Abbeyford, a Romance of Three Women, a new and highly exciting Story, by one of the most popular Authors of the day.

With that number, also, Part I. of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER is entitled to, gratis, the splendid Gift Plate of "Franklin Pierce," the Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1856."

With Number 39 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER each purchaser is entitled to receive a most elegant engraving, entitled "His Only Pair," the English prints of which cost Thirty Dollars.

Subscribers to the CHIMNEY CORNER, or FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE, or NEW MONTHLY (for one year), will receive the above three elegant Plates, gratis, all magnificently Colored.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Monday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent, so that persons wishing to subscribe at any time, by taking the back numbers from the commencement, will be entitled to receive the Presentation Plates.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Pub-lisher,

FRANK LESLIE,
537, Pearl street, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, MARCH 3, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner.

The wonderful extent to which this new and well-conducted paper has secured the popular favor, may be judged by the fact that, of the last number, no less than

150,000 copies were sold

within a few days of its publication. Its varied and attractive contents, embracing contributions of the highest character, illustrated with care, and adapted to the great entertainment and sound instruction of the home circle, make it indeed the first family paper in America.

To meet so immense a demand would be impossible to an ordinary establishment; and, indeed, it taxes the resources even of the publisher, especially to strike off, with proper care, the elegant Presentation Plate, "Grant in Peace," which has elicited such universal praise.

Abuse of Language.

If there be one thing above all others that has been impressively and decisively established during this century, it is this, that the United States shall be a nation; that it shall be a unit, with power to suppress disorganization at home and resist aggression from abroad. As Time's last and grandest birth, it has been determined that it shall have a more selfish existence, but for the greatest good of its own people, and an examplar for mankind.

If there be an illusion or delusion, more absurd or wicked than any other, it is that which is involved in the wish or hope of dismemberment. If there be a folly more absurd or criminal than any other, it is that which finds expression in suggestions of the possibility, under any circumstances, of the disseverance, and the consequent inevitable decay and death of the American Union.

Paltry partisan or factional editors talk of the possible disruption of the United States, and make disruption the alternative to the refusal of their political measures, which can no more really affect the question of the national life than the accidental alighting of a fly on the spoke of a conflicted car can affect the velocity or destination of the vehicle.

The manner in which "able editors" deal with stern and portentous realities would be ludicrous, if it were not culpable and repulsive.

Thus we have a newspaper in this city, at present the ablest—we had almost said the only—organ of the so-called "democracy," insisting that certain measures shall be carried through Congress, and demanding that the President himself, the sworn defender of the Constitution, shall violate its most solemn and important provisions, and, by a coup d'état, inaugurate a revolution on his own account, coincident with that which the nation has so sternly repressed! The followers in the South accept the measure which our fathers have instituted for reforming evils of government. They decide the forms as well as contemn the essence of free institutions. One of them, at least, has the ineffable insolence to suggest that "the ballot-box is too slow a process as a remedy for existing grievances." It has the audacity and impudence to declare editors that the President should send a regiment of troops to install certain persons claiming to be Members of Congress, in face of the Constitutional provision that each House of Congress shall be the sole judge of the qualifications of their own members.

The same radical, or, rather, revolutionary, spirit is manifested in another newspaper, that professes to be "conservative." We refer to the Times, of this city. That paper tells us that a majority of Congress, coming freshly from the people, and de facto, representing their matured views, "have been trying to destroy the Union!" This arraignment of the national will is as audacious as the suggestion of a coup d'état of the President is infamous. "Trying to destroy the Union!" Do the writers for the Times know the value—do they consider the weight of words? If they mean to say that, in the reorganization of the country, consequent on its late terrible dislocation, there may be, as in the nature of the case there must be, wide differences of opinion, no one can refuse assent. Differences do and must exist, and may be sustained with more or less of obstinacy, and in language varying with the temperament and education of the individual. But that there is an individual in Congress, much less a sufficient aggregation of individuals to be called a faction, "trying to destroy the Union," is either a careless, reckless arraignment, or a libel.

Some of us can remember the time when parties were divided on questions of no greater importance than whether the proceeds of the sale of public lands should be divided among the States, and when we were told that the salvation of the country, and its permanence depended upon a prompt and satisfactory decision of the question. Our orators made up an extravagance of language for the lack of substance, and the interest in the issue which they called the people to act. But the time for such things is past; we now know what denying the Union, or "trying to destroy it," means. We are not likely to speak lightly of death in a circle out of which a friend dropped into the grave but yesterday. We are in no condition to trifle with a matter so serious as the integrity of the country, and there can be no graver accusation against a man, or body of men, than that they are "trying to destroy the Union." If the writers for the Times really believe that there are men in Congress striving to that end, they should arraign them with a solemnity commensurate with the gravity of their great crime, and not in a heated article, breathing a partisan, or, rather, factional spirit.

It is unnecessary to enlarge on this point, for the truth is, simply is, that neither the editor of the Times, nor anybody else, believes that there are men in Congress "trying to divide the Union." The allegation is made loosely, we may say, thoughtlessly, and would never have been made in the form and connection in which it was put forward, had the writer really believed what he uttered. Words sometimes are things, and should never be abused in the use.

We have another batch of documents, this time from Paris, about the Mexican question. They amount precisely to this: "Napoleon will get out of Mexico when he is ready, provided he isn't hurried, but not unless we will agree not to meddle with Maximilian, or allow anybody else to do so." In other words, we must practically recognize the Austrian adventurer, while France reserves the right "to put in her oar" to his sustenance, whenever convenient or necessary. Therefore let us "eat, drink, and be merry," over the last great triumph of American diplomacy!

A NEW figure for the cotillion has been introduced in Paris. A small closet, after the Davenport fashion, with a small hole in the upper panel of the door, is placed in the centre of the room, and one of the male dancers shut inside. As the ladies waltz round, each passes her hand for an instant through the opening, and the prisoner pronounces the name of the owner of that "pretty thing." Should he chance to be right, the door is thrown open, and he spins away into a space with the fair one whom he has visited with the punishment.

THE people of Belgium are far from satisfied with the conduct of the late King in sending Belgian troops to Mexico, to aid the designs of Louis Napoleon. The Liberal Union of the Civil Guard of Liege have passed resolutions protesting against the proposal of St. Cyr Pretextex, Commander of the Civil Guard of Brussels, to send a deputation to the memory of Belgians who fell in the action at Tacumbaro in the Mexican Republic, the 11th day of April, 1865, because they fought against the cause and liberty of liberty and in contradiction to the efforts of the Belgians made in 1830 to gain their independence.

SEVENTEEN seems to be a fatal number with the rulers of France. No sovereign since the downfall of the second empire has lasted longer than sixteen or seventeen years. Seventeen years were the limit of the supremacy of Napoleon I. Seventeen years restored Bourbon supremacy. Seventeen years Louis Philippe occupied the throne. And we may safely predict that seventeen years will be the longest period allotted by the hand of destiny to the restored dynasty of the Bonapartes.

PROFESSOR FAWCETT, Member of Parliament, and Lecturer upon Political Economy in the University of Cambridge, says of England: "The rich are growing richer, and the poor are growing poorer. There is no true sympathy between the employers and employed, and no just and proper relations between capital and labor and amongst all classes of society; and in consequence of all those unhappy feelings, England and Wales have 130,000 criminals every year, and one man in every twenty is a pauper, while in Ireland, tens of thousands die of the effects of starvation, and millions—one quarter—have emigrated to America to avoid this fate, in the last twenty years."

THE Boston Transcript says of Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, the acknowledged leader of the House of Representatives:

"Without endowing his political opinions in full, and with serious doubts as to some of his methods of announcing and enforcing them, it is impossible to deny that Thaddeus Stevens is a man of remarkable power, full of intellect, and that intellect of a high and influence that belongs to genius alone. He combines the best and weakest qualities of Josiah Quincy Adams and John Randolph, without being an imitation of either."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I observe that a certain elemental knowledge of science is now considered at least indispensable in general society. The readers of popular scientific works are increasing daily; nor is this amongst men only. I was present at the last evening meeting of the Geographical Society, and certainly a third of those present were ladies. The secretary of one of the most distinguished geologists of the day is the daughter of a clergyman. It may be remembered, too, that both the translators of Humboldt's 'Cosmos' were women. It is probable that the female mind may never attain to the highest efforts of the human intellect; but women can do good, serviceable work, preserving at the same time all the most valued characteristics of their sex. Olympia Morata is remembered in history for her beauty, gentleness, and modesty, as well as for her great philosophical attainments."

At the end of 1864 there were 7,728 members of the Jesuit order in the Catholic world, being 129 more than in 1863. In the same year there were 1,532 Jesuits employed in foreign missions, being an increase of 242 over the year 1863. The European missions amounted to 28; the Asiatic to 296; the African to 213; the North American to 276; the South American to 199; the Oceanian to 55; and 15 were on passage. Twenty-five years ago, namely, in 1841, there were but 3,563 Jesuits, so that since that period the number has been more than doubled.

There is no reason why, after adopting the decimal system as regards money, we should not follow it out in our standards of weights and measures. We laugh at Englishmen who compute their cumbersome denominations of pounds, shillings, pence and farthings by different divisors, and boast of the superior rapidity and ease of our system of computation. Yet we stick to 12 inches make a foot, 3 foot make a yard, 5½ yards make a rod, 40 rods a furlong, etc., etc., and will call a pound 12 ounces in one case and 16 in another, and thus perpetuate difficult, perplexing, and utterly irrational standards. We have got to come to the decimal system in weights and measures sooner or later—the sooner the better, and all the easier. It is easier to accommodate 35,000,000 of people to the change, than it will be 40,000,000—which our country will probably number in 1870. The longer the delay, the more difficult the change. Several, perhaps most, of the South American republics, have established the French decimal system, which, as it has already a wide dissemination, we cannot do better than adopt. To this end, Mr. Allison has introduced in Congress a bill fixing a decimal standard, to take effect, if possible, July 1st, 1867. It provides that:

"The unit of lengths shall be the meter of the ten-millionth part of the distance from the pole to the equator, measuring at the level of the sea; its multiples shall be the decometer, hectometer, kilometer and myriameter; its subdivisions the decimeter, centimeter and millimeter. The unit of surface shall be the arc or square decamister; one square meter shall be called centiare, and one square hectometer be called hectare. The unit of solidity shall be the ster, or cubic meter; its subdivisions the decister, centister and millister. The unit of capacity shall be the liter, or decimeter; its multiples the decaliter or territers; its subdivisions the deciliter, centiliter or mileter.

"For the purpose of assessing or collecting duties and taxes for the sale of public lands, and all purposes where strict accuracy is not required, the following list of proximate equivalents is established: One decimeter, four inches; one meter, one and one-tenth yard; one decometer, five-tenths of one chain; one kilometer, six hundred and twenty-five thousandths (.625) of a mile; one centaire, one and two-tenths square yards; one hectare, two and five-tenths acres; one liter, three hundred and seventy-five thousandths (.375) of a gallon; one kilogram, thirty-two ounces troy; one kilogram, two-tenths pound avoirdupois; one tun, two thousand two hundred and forty pounds."

The question of reform in representation is attracting great attention in England. Among the abuses existing under the present system, may be mentioned the fact that there are twenty-nine boroughs returning fifty-one members to the House of Commons, which show an average voting register of only 192, and which have only 160,000 inhabitants. These return nearly as many members as all Scotland, half as many as Irelend, and three times as many as London, with its 3,000,000 of inhabitants! And yet half of England is struggling to prevent this gross disparity in representation, and denouncing all advocates of equalization as "radicals!"

A curious case was lately heard in the British Divorce Court. Mr. Hyde joined the Mormons, was married in Utah, went to the Sandwich Islands, and quitted the community. He was thereupon excommunicated, and his wife pronounced free to marry again, which she did. He thereupon claimed a divorce. The Judge took time to consider his decision, being doubtful whether a Mormon marriage, which presupposes a right of polygamy, could be held to be any marriage at all—whether Mr. Hyde had, in fact, any wife to be divorced from.

The London Spectator, commenting on the late speech of the Emperor of the French, observes of that part referring to the United States and Mexico:

"It is true Napoleon has affirmed that he is arranging with the Emperor Maximilian for the recall of his army; but then their return must be effected when it 'will not compromise the interests which France went out to that distant land to defend.' When is that? Do the interests to be defended include the reinvigoration of the Latin race? Nothing is clear from the speech, and, according to the Yellow Book, which is always supposed to explain the speech, the French army is only to return from Mexico when the President of the Union has recognized the Mexican Empire, an act which he has refused to do, and which Congress has specifically forbidden him to perform. There is nothing in the speech inconsistent with that interpretation; and if it is correct, the Americans will simply contrast the compliments offered them in words with the impossible proposal submitted in fact, and be less content than ever. All they obtain is a promise that, at some time not specified, when a result they dislike has been accomplished, the Emperor will, if consistent with his honor, withdraw the troops, through whom he has been able to accomplish it—not a very definite or very satisfactory pledge."

TOWN GOSSIP.

There is at this moment a mighty question agitating not only New York, but all the nation. It is not a question of bread, but of BEER, resolved simply into the shape of old style or new style, patent lager, or no patent lager.

Somebody, at some recent period, invented a way to brew lager, for which they received a patent. Whether it was by adding a decoction of old shoes, or throwing in an extra dash of molasses, is more than we can tell, but the result was at once a pitched battle. The old style reared up, and straightway furnished the lager shops that remained faithful to their standard, labels, free gratis for nothing, on which were printed in large and ominous characters, "No Patent Beer Sold Here." On the other hand, the patent beerites girded up their loins and struck for their rights. They openly declared that from the old beer came headaches and indigestion, while from the patent beer came nothing but happiness, rotundity, jolly vrows and chubby children. They fought the battle step by step, and lager beer shop by lager beer shop, until the original beerites shook in their shoes, and their empire seemed trembling. The worshipers of Gambrinus were in daily doubt, and became so muddled—not with beer, but with diverse opinions—that many of them have not yet recovered. At this moment, even while the old beerites were crying aloud in the most doleful tones, "Look not upon the beer when it is red within the mug"—which is as near as we can get to the quotation—the patent beerites came to the rescue with a chemical analysis, which analysis showed that patent beer was beer, and instead of being a mixture of old boots, street-sweepings and such small deer, it was simply a preparation of malt and hops brewed by a peculiar process. This was a whole shell in the camp of the old beerites, and so far they have not been able to recover from it. In this state stands the matter now, and a mighty pretty quarrel it is, too, as it stands. Yankee Doodledom, as well as Teutonia, is divided into two distinct parties, the old beerites and the patent beerites, and while some are in doubt still as to drinking either fluid, others double on the quantity, feeling that they cannot make up their minds on so important a subject without a thorough sampling of the article in dispute. Should anything farther transpire, we shall chronicle—not small beer—it for the public edification.

From beer to coals is a natural transition, and we shall make it, simply to give our readers an idea of how it is they pay $13 or $14 per ton for coal. We start with it from the mines:

Worth in the mine	$0 25
Out of the mine	1 05
Prepared for use	1 85
In Philadelphia	8 00
At Elizabethport, N. J.	9 50
At the New York dock	10 25
At the retail yards	13 95

Thus it will be seen that between the mines and New York consumers, it gains the sum of $13 70. Verily we are a wonderful people!

We all remember what Jem Baggs, in "The Wandering Minstrel" says: "D'ye think I don't know the vally o' peace and quietness? No, sir! I never moves on under a shilling."

We quote it to say that Mr. Baggs has his representatives at every corner of our streets, and we are not sure but the original Baggs has opened a school somewhere about town, in which vagabonds of every age and clime are taught to torture some otherwise inoffensive instrument, until it responds under our fingers or mouth with the most fearful twangs or shrieks. Of all these musicians—God save the mark!—the worst is the organ-grinding fraternity. There is about them an air of laziness and dirt not found in others of the tribe, an insouciance and abandon of consequences perfectly delicious. They show in their very looks the truth of the answer of one of the fraternity, who, upon being asked by a victim to his sounds how he bore it himself, said, "Oh! I never hears 'em!" These organic nuisances are generally accompanied by a woman, the more good-looking the better, who, with a very dirty tamborine, and conversation to match, goes into stores and drinking-saloons while the man is droning away outside, and by her blandishments picks up all the small stamps she can get from weak-headed youths. Next to this style, in annoyance, is the universal musician, who stations himself under your window with a bass drum slung upon his back, a hurdy-gurdy in front, a pandean-pipes under his nose, a pair of cymbals between his legs, and heaven only knows how many other noise-making affairs about his noisy person.

We believe earnestly that these perepatetic harmonics average in their earnings (!) about $7 per day, double what an honest, hard-working mechanic can earn. To achieve this, these gentry are up to every dodge ever thought of in the human brain, an illustration of which will be the manner in which we saw a dollar extorted from a music-loving friend a few days since. He did love music; and, as a consequence, winced under the noise of one of these organic wretches who ground away under his window every day about dinner-time. The gentleman, feeling that his house was not his castle while the nuisance existed, opened negotiations, and finally bought off the thing for one dollar, cash in hand, paid with the strict stipulation that the fellow should not play again in front of his house. The dollar was pocketed, and the promise strictly kept, for from that day to this the fellow has played at the same hour, daily, under the window of the next-door neighbor, just 20 feet from the spot where he played before.

Is there no balm in Gilead?

Of the theatres what can we say, when they are by their successes beyond all criticism or press notice? What does a manager care for the opinion of newspapers when the public crowd his house, so that before the curtain goes up the label, "Only standing room," has to be displayed at the box-office? and this, we believe, is the present condition of the dramatic institution in New York.

Niblo's has finished with Miss Bateman after a wonderful success, in which she has shown the finished artistic improvement of her English tour. Maggie Mitchell has taken her place, with her charming rendering of "Fanchon," and it may be expected that for several weeks we can say nothing but that Maggie Mitchell is playing "Fanchon" at Niblo's.

At Lucy Rushton's, they have been trying the effect of turning away a hundred or two of people from the doors every evening, for a week or two, just by the way of letting them know there is something good going on inside, and that seats ought to be secured several days in advance, if they expect not to be crowded out.

The Broadway announces that Mr. Owens has entered upon his 225th night of Solon Shingle at that house. We have not yet lost faith in the real taste of the New York public.

Wallack announces "a new and original comedy, entitled 'Society,' by Messrs. T. W. Roberts and M. Noah, now running with the greatest success in London, which will shortly be produced here, with beautiful and appropriate scenery and appointments, and a powerful cast." There, we give the very words as advertised, and charge nothing for it.

What is going on at the Winter Garden we tell in another column.

At the Olympic, "Who Killed Cock-Robin?" is a genuine success. "Cinderella" is in preparation, and is to be splendidly produced.

Wood's Theatre has Mr. Frank Drew; and, of course, under his funniness, is having all the success it is able to attend to.

Among the noticeables of the day and evening is Mr. James Robinson, the bare-backed rider. There can be little doubt that Mr. Robinson is the greatest rider we have ever seen, and, however blasé we may be, can awake a sensation even in the heart and brain of a Sir Charles Coldstream.

And last, though not least, the Opera.

Maretzek is making no splurge, doing nothing in the way of fancy advertising, but every quiet announcement of an opera night puts $3,000 or $4,000 in the house, and about the same for every matinee. He has no need to offer music-lovers any new attraction; his present company more than satisfies, and grows nightly upon the tastes of those who know how to appreciate.

The Poznanski brothers are making a great success with their concerts at Irving Hall, so much so that they are announced for continuance. Real merit will always find its success in New York, if placed properly before the public.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The great Cincinnati bridge about to be suspended across the Ohio river will be the longest in the world, being over 2,000 feet longer than the Suspension Bridge over the Niagara river, and 540 feet longer than the Menai Bridge in England. Its total span will be 1,057 yards. The massive stone piers tower 110 feet over the floor of the bridge, and 200 feet above their foundations. One year is the period allowed for building it.

—— An economical view of homicide is taken by the Caluso (Cal.) Sun, in the following item: "The sheriff of Sutter County, killed a thief last week, who was attempting to escape, thereby saving the county much cash."

—— The Mobile Advertiser says, that the markets there are fairly glutted with provisions and country produce, and the busy hum and bustle of the throng in attendance on market-days remind them of the good old days of yore, when market-baskets went home brimming full, and the people "lived on the fat of the land." Trade is represented as flush in all branches, and there is every evidence that "the good time is coming."

—— A noted spiritualist, Dr. Randolph, says now, that after the experience of five years as a medium, it is his candid opinion that spiritualism is one-third imposture, one-third insanity, one-third diabolism, and that insanity is the usual fate of trance-mediums.

—— Benjamin Pinney, a wealthy farmer at Rockport, Ill., was recently poisoned to death with strychnine by his fifth wife, a pretty girl, whom he married six weeks ago.

—— A Connecticut farmer, a few days ago, warmed a blanket to wrap round the feet of his aged and paralytic wife. He went to the barn, and in his absence the bed took fire from a spark in the blanket, and his wife was burned to death.

—— Two smart twelve year old boys have started a two-column local paper at Waterbury, Ct. They do all the work upon it themselves, and then go out on the street and sell their papers.

—— A cool robbery of government property was attempted a few days ago, at Mobile. A man representing himself as a government agent, drove up with a dray, passed the guards, and loading the vehicle with blankets, drove off. Two civilian employés suspecting something wrong, followed, and had him arrested.

—— But for King Alcohol, the papers say, Richmond would be an orderly city, but with 30 arrests for drunkenness daily, they think the prospects are bad for good order and quiet.

—— Miss Maria Baldwin, a graduate of Baldwin University, at Berea, Ohio, has filled the chair of Professor of the Greek and Latin languages in the Baker University in Kansas for the past year. She is only 21 years old.

—— A special train went through from Boston to Portland on Saturday with a single passenger—a gentleman who had engaged his passage on the European steamer, missed the morning train, and paid $300 to reach the latter place in time.

—— A negro sentenced to 40 days' confinement and labor, with ball and chain, at Macon, Ga., was recently allowed to ascend the second story of the prison, from which he threw himself down. He struck on the top of his head, and was, of course, unhurt. In consideration of the feat, he received a free pardon.

—— Eleven men were frozen to death in the vicinity of Hamilton, Fillmore County, Minn., on the night of the 20th ult. Six of them were frozen in a sleigh while passing along the road. Another man was found frozen in a standing posture, with his hands over his face, and only three or four rods from a house.

—— The Louisville, Ky., Journal says: "No matter, dear reader, what you see in the papers: Jeff. Davis won't have a military trial, and he won't be convicted. And if he were convicted, he would be pardoned. Though no card-player, 'we speak by the card.'"

—— Under a law of Rhode Island, which prohibits selling goods by sample without a State license, a poor clergyman at Providence, who was trying to eke out a scanty salary by selling some religious pictures, was arrested and compelled to pay a fine of $50 and costs.

—— A raft containing two women, three men, and a horse, which was drifting out to sea, was stopped and saved by a pilot-boat, off the harbor of Savannah, Ga., on the 4th inst.

—— The question "Is a death-bed marriage legal?" is being tried in the Circuit Court at Indianapolis. Considerable property is involved in the decision.

—— When Gen. Grant removed to his new house, he gave "a reception," and among others, invited ex-General Butler to attend. The card of invitation was returned to the Lieutenant-General, with the following indorsement: "I have the honor to receive your card of invitation. I beg to decline it as politely as I may; and I would further state that, in no event would I be willing to hold personal intercourse with youself, or any member of your family.—B. F. Butler. Lieutenant-General Grant."

—— A correspondent states that a company of Northern men, who went South with the view of investing their money and establishing homes, have returned, satisfied that the lives and property of loyal men are not safe under the government now established there. One of their number, who purchased a place within 80 miles of Vicksburg, was notified by a mob to leave within five days. He at once set his freedmen to work building a small fort, on which he raised the American flag. He then armed his freedmen, and notified the mob that he was ready to leave, if they were ready to force him away.

Foreign.—One of the anecdotes connected with the recent visit of the King and the Queen of Portugal to Paris, is as follows: The king and queen expressed a wish to admire M. Perree's collection of parures. The jeweler accordingly presented himself at the Pavillion de Marsan, and was at once received. As he handed a magnificent necklace of black pearls and diamonds to Queen Pia, it slipped from her hand and fell to the ground. M. Perree stooped to catch it, when Don Luis prevented him by remarking that the etiquette of the Portuguese Court gave the king or queen alone the privilege of raising whatever fell at their feet. Then, handing the ornament to his wife, he said: "What the queen has touched is hers."

—— An alarming incident occurred recently at the Zoological Garden of Stuttgard. A remarkably fine lion was confined there in a cage, surrounded by a glass framework to protect the animal from cold. M. Werner, the proprietor, was going through a performance, and was seated on a stool in the cage, when he lost his balance and fell backward. The lion immediately sprang on him and a terrible combat ensued. Mlle. Werner, seeing the danger of her father, took up a heavy seat and dashed it at the glass, and the animal terrified at the crash, released the man, who was then able to withdraw, only slightly hurt.

—— The London Sporting Life says pugilism has fallen upon evil days. The admirers of the "manly art" are disgusted with those who manage such affairs, and its sun seems to have set over the grave of Tom Sayers. To revive the Ring, it thinks, seems an utterly hopeless task, and, from one cause and another, that "institution" has sunk lower and lower since the date of the famous fight of Farnborough.

—— In Brittany, a very convenient matrimonial custom prevails. On certain fête days, the young ladies appear in red under-petticoats, with white or yellow borders around them; the number of these denotes the portion the father is willing to give his daughter; each white band, representing silver, betokens a hundred francs of rent; and each yellow band means gold, and stands for a thousand francs a year. Thus, any young farmer, who sees a face that pleases him, has only to glance at the trimmings of the petticoat to learn in an instant what amount accompanies its wearer.

—— There are 30,000 blind persons in Great Britain, nearly a tenth part of the number being in London. The great majority of these 30,000 persons are in a state of destitution.

—— The daily consumption of water in London is 100,000,000 gallons—filthy stuff, at that. It is proposed to bring a supply of pure water to the metropolis from North Wales; forming among it mountains a series of reservoirs aggregating over ten miles in length, and conducting the water 183 miles by aqueducts and tunnels.

THE ELLIPTIC IRON-ARCH ARCADE FOR THE ELEVATION OF STREET RAILWAYS.

Object.

Rapid intercommunication within a crowded city is essential to its development; and steam travel bears the same relation to its growth and business capacity, that it does to a country at large. The principal thoroughfare of Manhattan Island will always be overcrowded, and some engineering scheme must double its capacity and pleasantness. There is no reason why a metropolis should continue with only the slow coaches of ante-steam times, while the country about is availing itself of the improvements of the age. There is no reason why our means of travel or communication through our cities should be confined to one level, any more than our houses of residence or business should be confined to one story.

A structure, then, is desirable, which will become universal, by reason of its simplicity, economy, rapidity of construction, capacity, convenience, ornament, safety, durability, non-interference with the existing condition of property, movability and extensibility, according to the growth of the city and fluctuation of commercial travel. This is attainable in the Elliptic Iron-arch Arcade for the elevation of street railways.

The Structure.

The Elliptic Arches (A), give, over every other form of structure, the maximum of combined strength, convenience, lateral capacity and cheapness. They span the carriage-way from curb to curb, thus not taking up any of the present occupied space. They may be fifteen (15) feet high, which will admit under them the highest loaded vehicles. The ellipse of the arch gives sufficient height at the curb-stones to admit of vehicles driving close to the curb, and yet gives the strength of an arch in the top and centre. This double-T iron-arch is for the support of the main sills (B) and all the ground-work of the railroad and the roofing. The main sill (B) rests on top of the arch, and spans with it across the street, slightly cambered or bent down at each end, which rests on an elegant pillar of cast-iron, whose base is on the curb-stone at the base of the arch. This sill is also double-T, (I). On its upper flange are bolted the cast-iron stringers and binders, (C) which serve also as sleepers for the rails. On its lower flange are laid the glass plates (D) in their frames of iron in the manner of clap-boarding, thus forming a water-shed. The arches are placed every fifteen feet. This would be the distance between the fore and aft wheels of the dummy cars, thus always dividing the weight upon two arches, which, under the maximum loads—all the dummies meeting at one point—would give only four and a half tons to the track.

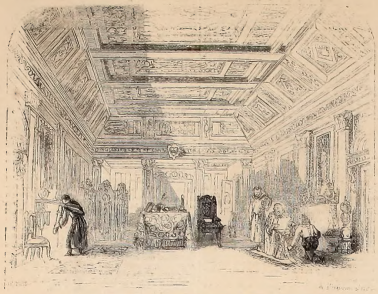
Cost.

The above four (4) pieces complete the structure. Their manufacture is simple, requiring no costly machinery, could be commenced in thirty days after adoption, and completed for any distance, according to the help employed, in less than six months, and can be furnished—without the glass—at the manufacturers for less than one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars per mile. Being of iron and glass, it is imperishable; would cost nothing for extra lighting, warming, or police, like the under-ground plan; destroys no property; requires no preliminary surveying; can be set up or taken down in a day, and if a failure, the material is all good for further uses. It saves many thousands of dollars in the cleaning of the streets, by catching the rain and snow, which runs off through the iron pillars. The crossings at intersecting streets are covered by landings, and thus much is saved through non-soiling of garments and tenements, which the universal cleanliness of this plan will effect. Scenes like those of the past month will be no more known to Broadway.

Light.

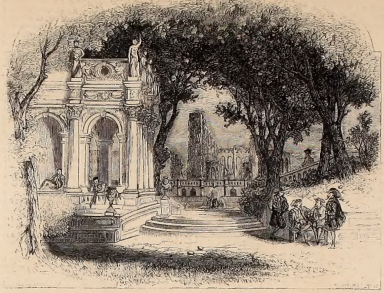
Being a light, open frame-work, painted white, and not covering the side-walks, and the body or floor of the structure being even with the second stories, the first stories are not perceptibly affected in their light. The rear end of the stores and shops get, as ever, the same reflected light from the opposite side, through and under the structure, there being an open view from side-walk to side-walk.

Convenience.



This structure could mount four (4) tracks in Broadway. Self-smoke-consuming dummies could be placed on them. The two outside dummies could be "accommodation," approached by elegant and easy stair-ways, and capacious landings, with settees, over each intersecting street. The two inside dummies could be through and fast; nothing ever has occasion to cross their tracks, which would always be clear, clean and smooth, and they could make South Ferry and Union Square, (say, stopping at Wall, Astor House and Canal street,) in ten (10) minutes! There are no more cars or omnibusses jamming up with the commercial vehicles; no more the picture of constipated streets; every thing is clear, open, speedy; the business capacity of the streets doubled. This structure thus becomes of vast business importance to a crowded city. There is no more a necessity for consuming a quarter of a business-day going to and from residence and place of business. This lowers rents in town, and builds up the suburbs.

Pleasantness.



The dummies are cosily warmed in winter, and are airy and free from dust in summer. The rails may be light, because no heavy vehicles ever cross them; they can rest on pads, and have sliding joints, so that the motion is as smooth and pleasant as that of a yacht. There is no more going out into a filthy, dangerous street for a bounding, thundering, corn-smashing omnibus, but the cars may be approached by children unattended. The passengers may look down upon the side-walks and their places of destination; and thither millions would resort for pleasure riding! thus relieving the sidewalks. The various tenements may have private landings into the second stories, direct from the cars. The street beneath is dry in winter and storms, and shady in summer, thus forming a pleasant drive for pleasure carriages.

Miscellany.

Even where there is no crowd, this structure is desirable, for the speed and comfort it will give. It could be extended to all the city railroads in one grand consolidated arrangement, with a uniform fare, say, of ten cents, throughout the city, for a stop-over, or transfer ticket, making the ordinary ride, or trip, five cents. It could be owned by the city, and the revenue would keep these [illegible] the city clean, relieving tax-payers.

SCENES FROM RICHELIEU.—1ST ACT.—THE CHAMBER IN THE PALAIS CARDINAL.

4TH ACT.—THE GARDENS OF THE LOUVRE.

EDWIN BOOTH AND RICHELIEU.

We furnish in this number a very accurate portrait of the great actor who absorbs the sensation of the hour—Mr. Edwin Booth—and sketches of the scenes of Richelieu, which has achieved so great a triumph for the present managerial career of the Winter Garden, and which is being nightly performed to the most crowded and enthusiastic audiences ever assembled within the walls of a theatre in New York. The manner in which this play is presented and performed, marks a new era in the drama, and reflects honor alike on the liberality of the manager, Mr. Stuart, on the ability of Mr. Hanley, the stage manager, who carried out the details, on the delicacy of design, and exquisite execution of Mr. Witham, the scenic artist, but above all, on Mr. Edwin Booth, whose genius conceived, and whose taste directed, and who has brought to the production of this piece, the second of his revivals, the same resources which had been already devoted in Hamlet to the illustration of Shakspeare's imagination, and of those scenic chronicles in which the great poet has set down the glories of Denmark. Few will look upon this piece without rejoicing at that generous exultation of feeling, so honorable to the heart of the people, which recently called out from retirement, and charged on to exertion, this great artist, and without being sensible of how great a loss insertion art would have had in the deprivation of his devotion. Even now, though but young, were he to close his career, history might apply to him those lines of the poet:

"Small [illegible] out in that small, most greatly lived this star."

The effect upon the progress of art of such productions cannot be too highly estimated. Charles Lamb attributed much of the imaginative spirit of Elizabeth's age to the palpable picturesque which was so common to us, and which acted, as he considered, as hints to thought and impulses to the fancy. Richelieu does not afford, of course, much scope for what are termed stage effects—for the skill of the scene-painter, carpenter, or property-man—as do Shakspeare's great creations, where even the ordinary reader must discover every where as he advances an opening for some striking and picturesque effect, that shall give greater scope to the fancy—while for the happy few who possess a congenial spirit with the poet, be sure that in every line he wrote there lies a hidden vein of poetry which is only capable of being brought to the surface in "act and complement extern." It was by working so successfully this rich mine in Hamlet, that Mr. Booth has entitled himself to recollection wherever Shakspeare is named, or his memory honored; and in Richelieu, though not offering such gorgeous opportunities, still we see how much can be done by artistic taste and genius employing, with intellectual correctness, the resources of our modern theatres. In the second scene of the first act, the Chamber in the Palace of the Cardinal, where Richelieu is discovered, seated by the old-fashioned fireplace, the magnificence of the man and the period is most thoroughly expressed, down to the smallest minutiæ, and as we strain our sight down the sweep of the long hall, every small trifle of ornament seems in keeping with the spirit of the whole, and to wear a look of reality. Nothing is officiously or gratuitously interposed. The general effect is made out by each separate detail.

Equally splendid as specimens of art are the Castle at Rueille—even the pictures with which the walls are hung, and the men of armor being, per se, of great excellence and value—and the Presence-Chamber at the Louvre. The View of Paris in the distance, from the Gardens of the Louvre, with Notre Dame glittering in the sunshine, is equally fine, though of a different school of picture. They will be all found represented in our engravings. Through each a gorgeous succession of ornaments and objects combines in a simple grandeur and comprehensive magnificence. Everything contributes to the life, vigor, and picturesqueness of the play. So also the minutest person on the scene has his proper task to perform, his distinct and allotted place in the general design. So with the costumes; the nobles are recognizable in dress as well as in name, nearly all of those of the leading characters having been purchased by Mr. Booth in Paris, and being exact to the paraxe and time. The splendor extends to the meanest attendant; the common soldiers wear chased morions, and the knights companions are casid in armor.

EDWIN BOOTH, THE GREAT TRAGEDIAN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY FREDRICKS.

Mr. Edwin Booth's Richelieu is well known, but was never appreciated as it will be now, equally from its gorgeous setting as from the, if possible, increased delicacy of finish it wears. It touches every chord in the character of Richelieu with the spirit of a true master. The line which, in this picture of a great Frenchmen, separates the poet from the pedant, statesman from knave, seriousness from wit, grandeur from frivolity, is discriminated with infinite nicety. In Edwin Booth's Richelieu, comedy trends with most graceful ease upon the heels of tragedy, and the mediated dreams of the philosopher and patriot are made to stand out in beautiful relief from the extravagance of playful humor and the turbulence of restless action. The transitions from strength to weakness, and vice versa, which bear so strong an impress of the time and scene, are given with that abrupt impulsiveness which characterized both.

We never saw a personation of greater reality, or one that so sensibly and variously moved an audience with its own emotions. Miss Eytinge, too, acts exquisitely well, and nearly all the parts are admirably fitted. No success, on any stage, within our remembrance, has been more decided, better merited, or more complete.

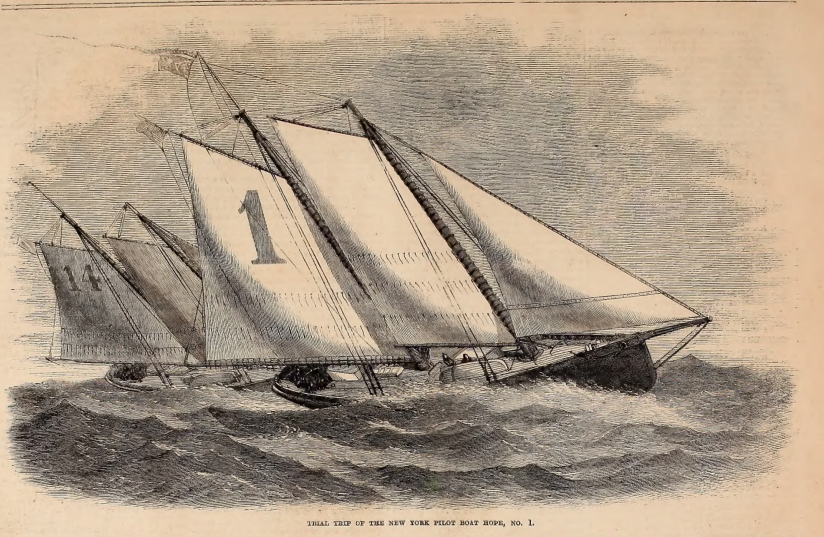
TRIAL TRIP OF THE PILOT-BOAT HOPE.

THE largest and finest of the New York pilot-boats made her first trip a few days since, and having proved herself the queen of all her class, we record the trip as a matter of history.

Ever on her anchorage, according to appointment, about ten o'clock in the morning, not, however, before a beautiful green battle-flag of one of the regiments of the Irish Brigade, bearing the shamrock, harp, and shamrock, was run up to her mast-head, amid the hearty cheers of the invited guests, and many others who occupied advantageous positions on shore, to witness her departure.

The sailing qualities of the Hope were fully tested by one of her experienced owners, Mr. Thomas Morley, of Brooklyn, in every possible way, and her satisfactory action called forth the expression from many pilots who were on board that she is to-day the best pilot-boat in the water.

This was tested on the trip by the fact that the T. F. Williams, Pilot-Boat, No. 14, which has always been reckoned and admitted the fastest of the pilot-boats, came out on purpose to give the Hope a brush, and was beaten on every point.



All the pilots in New York were on the look-out for this trial, and one or two of the fastest boats crossed the path of the Hope. The crew of the new vessel, nothing daunted, hoisted their pennant, which is the signal of a challenge. One of the two boats above mentioned, with a courtesy and courage that beautifully illustrates the "kindly sentiment on the seas," made a similar exhibition of her narrow bunting, which was interpreted as an acceptance. Both boats then "hauled close on the wind," when, after a short and exciting contest, the 3RD ACT.—THE CASTLE OF RUELLE.

5TH ACT.—THE PRESENCE CHAMBER OF THE LOUVRE.

TRIAL TRIP OF THE NEW YORK PILOT BOAT HOPE, NO. 1.

Hope shot ahead. The other, on seeing this, "put about" immediately, and "ran a free course," which move was soon noticed by the master of the Hope, who followed suit, giving to the former several hundred yards of advantage. The Hope was soon seen to gain on her adversary, and in an incredibly short space of time "sailed around her," when the master of the Hope ordered his pennant down, which was graciously acknowledged by the vanquished craft.

The Hope then headed for home, when the guests were invited to the cabin, where a sumptuous dinner was prepared by the spirited and, we would say, well satisfied proprietors, Messrs. Morley, Lyons, Keary, Samson, Roche, and Rush. Th good things, which were both numerous and abundant, were partaken of with a relish created by a "sharp sea breeze."

During the homeward trip the invited guests again assembled in the cabin, and after several pertinent and eloquent, though necessarily short speeches, a unanimous resolution was passed, thanking the proprietors for their kind hospitality, and congratulating them on the brilliant achievements of the Hope. The boat was then formally christened by breaking a bottle of wine on her bow, amid the enthusiastic plaudits of the persons on board.

It should be remarked that this trial did not show the exact speed of the craft, as her "bottom was foul," having lain at her moorings, buried about two feet in the mud, while undergoing the necessary alterations; besides she had a heavy "iron shoe" on her "fore-foot," to protect her from the ice, and which necessarily retards her speed. Notwithstanding these impediments, she sailed on this trip eighteen (18) miles in an hour and thirty minutes.

The vessel cost her owners $30,000; to-day her owners would not part with her for $50,000, so well has she done her work, and proved herself the pilot's boat.

A RECEPTION-DAY AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

"UNEASY lies the head that wears a crown," says Mr. Shakespeare, and he ought to know.

Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, does not exactly wear a crown, unless it be to his hat; but we venture to say the rule applies, and that our worthy chief magistrate would oftentimes gladly escape from the cares of state, and the too frequent contact with the sovereign people, and bury himself in some obscure spot for a while, where he could be, for a few hours, out of the people, and nothing more.

From the first establishment of our Government, there have always been certain days set apart for receptions at the White House, when all the world and his wife could come and shake hands with, and gaze upon, the President. Under some Administrations this privilege has been circumscribed, and it has been necessary to have an introduction or invitation before admittance could be had on levee-days to the sacred precincts of the East Room; but, in these democratic days, the exclusiveness has been broken down, and all are admitted who behave themselves, and dress is not en vigueur.

At these receptions it is customary for the heads of the different Departments, the Cabinet, Foreign Ministers, and all officers of the army and navy in Washington, to pay their respects to the President. The levee is sometimes held in the afternoon, and sometimes in the evening, lasting from three to four hours. During the session of Congress, when Washington is full of strangers, the receptions are oftentimes a perfect jam, and it amounts simply to a procession in and out of the room—no time or chance being given to loiter, or do more than march past the President and exit.

The levees of President Johnson are especially brilliant, and frequenters of Washington society declare that, under no former occupant of the White House has such good order and system reigned, as under the present.

A CHILD thus defines gossip: It's when nobody don't do nothing and somebody goes and tells of it.

A GRAND RECEPTION DAY AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON—THE EAST GATE.

"FRIENDS OR FOES."

[The following letter and poem reach us from Atlanta, Georgia]:

"In your Illustrated Newspaper of January 20th, I noticed some very good verses: 'Are we Friends or are we Foes.' I am honest in my wish to see the Union fully and completely restored. I think the Southern people are generally. I know not one, who, I think, would wish otherwise. The time was when we deprecated such a thing; but let the dead past bury its dead; our object now is to rest from the great toil which has rendered our land but a desolate waste. But if the North would have our love, we think they should not seek our utter humiliation. We are men, and to be lashed, and caricatured, as another Illustrated Newspaper considers it its bounden duty to do, galls us, makes us sore, and begets no particle of love."

"Are we friends or are we foes?"
North and South the question goes—
Are we foes or are we friends?
Tell me how the moral tends;
Standing in our garb of blood,
On the soil where freemen stood,
We, the question, ask of those
  Who would grind us 'neath their feet,
Are we friends or are we foes?
  Is the brotherhood complete?

By the blood that fell like rain
On Manassas trampled plain;
By the mem'ry—cherished still—
Of our dead at Malvern Hill;
By that hero's bones which sleep
In the valley, calm and deep;
By our flag, now laid to rest,
  Typing all our bitter woes,
And by every nobler test—
  We would be no longer foes.

We have known a torturing hour,
We have felt the weight of power;
Felt the blow which dashed the cup
As we held it trembling up;
Ours has been the fate which draws
Mourners round a conquered cause;
Madly as we may have fought,
  With the fight our hatred ends;
If our brotherhood is sought,
  We are ready to be friends.

Would ye have us cringe and bow?—
Lick the hand that struck the blow?
And, above our storied graves,
Clank our chains like willing slaves,
Till the dead shall start with fear
As the wailing sound they hear?
If this pledge ye would demand,
  If ye'd have us bend thus low,
Better were the fettered hand,
  While our manhood thunders—No!

Would ye have our love again—
Treat us as becometh men;
If ye'd set our hate aflame—
Taunt us with our burning shame.
"Rebels" we mayhap have been,
But we've known no greater sin;
Let the choice then be with you;
  Rising o'er our mutual woes,
Choose ye now betwixt the two—
  Be it friends or be it foes?

CIGARS FROM ELSINORE.

"Shaw! George, my boy, stop a moment! We have been hunting for you high and low!" said my kind old friend, Mr. Hanbury, who accosted me as I went by, with a gun over my shoulder, after a foray on the rabbits that abound among the sand-hills of the coast. He was an English merchant, residing in Copenhagen, who regularly spent his summers in a pretty villa that he possessed close to Elsinore. He and his family, who had known me well in England while I was a schoolboy, and they had not as yet settled in Denmark, had been very kind and hospitable to me during my sojourn at Elsinore.

"Shaw, my boy! you don't mean to leave us to-morrow in real earnest?" said the merchant, flinging down his newspaper, and coming out under the shade of the cool green awning—welcome protection on that sultry day. I shook my head, saying that I was afraid I must keep to my resolution. Mine was a long vacation ramble, and I was then a young barrister, by no means overburdened with briefs, but still I had some work to do, and there were papers on the table in my gloomy chambers in Pump Court, Temple, which demanded close study, even out of term-time. I had seen everything of note in and about the Danish capital, had made a hurried trip to Stockholm, and must now go southwards. Besides, I was anxious, if possible, to get a glimpse of the war, the Dano-German conflict of 1848-9, which was then going on. All things considered, I really must leave Elsinore and my kind friends.

"But not in such a hurry, I hope," said Mr. Hanbury, kindly. "You see, George, my wife and the girls are wild for one more picnic in those fine woods above Holgerness. And some very great friends of ours have but just arrived at their summer quarters—the Torfes—very pleasant people—people to whom I had always wished to introduce you. My poor old friend, the count, is not as good company as he was ten years since; but Madame Torfe is a charming person, and the young ladies are extremely pretty. So stay till Monday, George, and we will have a happy day to-morrow. Maria will be disappointed if you refuse us, and so will Jane and Carry."

I assented. After all, it was Friday afternoon, and to stay till Monday was no extraordinary sacrifice to make to friendship, the rather that Mr. Hanbury good-naturedly insisted that I should dine at his house every day until my final departure, so that I was saved from any apprehension of dull evenings at my inn. I therefore agreed to make one of the party at the picnic on the following day. It was the first link, this change of plan, in a chain of apparently trivial circumstances which, beginning in the most commonplace fashion possible, were very near having a tragic and fatal ending.

The day of the picnic dawned splendidly.

And I was duly presented to the Torfe family, and could not help owning that the good merchant's significant warning to take care of my heart with Miss Christina, the eldest of the daughters, was not wholly out of place. All three of the other Demoiselles Torfe, like their comely mother, were pretty, amiable-looking girls; but Christina was very beautiful in the national style of pure Danish beauty. She had the true Norse complexion of roses and lilies, the great solemn blue eyes, the fair hair that shone with a golden glint when a stray sunbeam fell upon it, and the broad white forehead, that make up the ideal of Scandinavian loveliness. Count Torfe, a deaf old gentleman with a black wig, an ear-trumpet, and a set of teeth so distressingly artificial as to be always flashing, or rattling, or slipping out of place, whenever their owner opened his mouth, was much older than his wife. He was an infirm old man, and one whose only conversation now was about his ailments. He had come to the picnic attended by his doctor; he was a personage of sufficient wealth to retain the exclusive services of a surgeon, as well as of a chaplain and secretary; and this doctor, a German by birth, had evidently great influence over him.

The day passed off merrily enough. There was a good dinner to be eaten on the grass, with sweet music ringing through the groves around, and with the softened sunlight struggling downward through the interlacing boughs, and forming a gold-flecked pattern on the smooth green turf. There was dancing presently to the strains of the band, and there were songs, and games for the children, and much merriment and laughter.

I can scarcely explain how it was; but the fact remains that everybody seemed to be in a conspiracy to bring Christina Torfe and myself together. My own inclinations may have had something to do with the matter, for the count's eldest daughter was unquestionably the belle of the party, more beautiful, more clever, more winning and gracious than the other girls, and by them also her superiority appeared to be frankly recognized. But Mrs. Hanbury and her daughters, and Madame Torfe as well, were perpetually inviting me to render Mademoiselle Christina some trifling service. At one time Carry Hanbury called on me to explain to dear Christina some passage in her favorite poets, Tennyson and Browning, the diction of which puzzled her foreign eyes. At another, I was entreated to sing a second to the same high-born damsel's performance of a German ballad. Then I was adjured to cut the pencil with which the young lady was preparing to sketch the merry groups beneath the gnarled bolls of the oak trees; and, in point of fact, I was appointed squire to Mademoiselle Christina by universal consent, and spent the greater part of the sunny hours by her side. She was really very accomplished, and not vain of her attainments; and as she spoke excellent English, while I was a tolerable proficient in German, our conversation flowed on easily and pleasantly.

"I have heard so much of you, monsieur, from our friends, those good Hanburys," said Christina Torfe, as the day wore on, "that I really feel as if we had been long acquainted. I am very sorry you mean to leave us—to leave Elsinore—so soon; for you are about to depart, Mr. Shaw, is it not so?"

There was a slight tone of sadness in her voice, as she said this in the most natural way in the world, just such a tinge of regret as we must all frequently feel when we are told at the outset of a pleasant acquaintance that it cannot last long enough to ripen into friendship. None but a coxcomb could have assigned any tenderer meaning to the words of the regretful accents; but, such as they were, they were pleasing to me when spoken by one so beautiful and admired. I replied that I was very sorry to go, but that a barrister's time was not always his own; and, further, that I wished to have leisure for at least a hasty view of the scene of war. Then I stopped short, and felt annoyed at my own awkwardness, for I was reluctant to speak to a Danish girl of events that must recall the defeat and sufferings of her country.

"You are going south—to Flensburg, Schleswig, and so to Hamburg—are you not? You will, no doubt, explore the battle-fields, and the spots that have become famous of late," she said, in a grave voice, but with no trace of pique or irritation. "You will doubtless obtain a pass from the German military authorities, so as to be able to see all that is worth notice?"

I replied in the affirmative. I was a pretty good German scholar, having received part of my education at Heidelberg; and I had German friends, one of whom had provided me with a letter to a staff officer of rank, serving with the Prussian force. I had no doubt of receiving permission, as a neutral spectator, to pass freely through the lines of the Schleswig-Holstein army.

Christina Torfe was silent for a moment; then she lifted her head, and turned her blue eyes beseechingly toward me, saying in a voice that was half playful, half agitated:

"M. Shaw, you will perhaps have it in your power to do me a great favor—that is—" and now she eagerly corrected herself, coloring slightly the while—"that is, not a great favor, nothing alarming; but I shall thank you as much as though it were a matter of life and death."

And these words were spoken in a voice that was all but irresistible. I had no desire to resist it. I expressed myself only too much flattered at having it in my power to be of service, even in a trifle, to Mademoiselle Torfe, and I envied the ease with which a Frenchman, in my place, would have rattled off a score of glib compliments. However, I made myself understood.

Still the fair young Dane did not appear in a hurry to explain the precise nature of the commission which I stood pledged to execute, and there were a few moments of silence.

"You are sure, I suppose," she said at last, "to visit the German camp at Eckernford, where," here her voice trembled again, "where the prisoners are kept?—our Danish prisoners, I mean?"

I replied in the affirmative, with some expression of sympathy for the sorrows of the brave and kindly little nation to which my fair acquaintance belonged.

"One who is very dear to me—my brother—is there, a prisoner of war," said Christina Torfe; and I noticed that she spoke with emotion, for her voice faltered, and her color deepened, and her blue eyes were downcast.

At that moment I heard a slight rustle among the bushes, such as a dog, or even one of those foxes so common in Danish forests, might have caused; but when I turned my head I could see nothing, and my fair companion was too much absorbed in her own thoughts, apparently, even to hear the faint sound. She lifted her eyes to mine at last, and, resuming her usual lively manner, though with a visible effort, she explained the commission with which she ventured to beg me to charge myself. It appeared that her brother, Captain Harald Torfe, fond of smoking, as most Danes are, had a very handsome and favorite cigar-case, a present from some old schoolfellow, and which was his inseparable companion. The cigar-case had, through the bungling of the stupid soldier-servant, who packed the young officer's portmanteau, been unluckily left behind at Copenhagen; and even before he was unfortunately taken prisoner, the young baron—he was a baron as well as a captain—had twice written to request his relatives to send him this missing treasure, but no safe opportunity had occurred. And now that poor Harald was in captivity, and his life monotonously dull, no doubt he was still more desirous of having his pet case restored to him, since he declared that no cigars taken from any other receptacle possessed the same flavor. Would I—I, George Shaw, of the Inner Temple—forgive Mademoiselle Christina's presumption in trespassing upon a stranger's good-nature, and convey the cigar-case safely to its gallent owner?

"My brother will thank you heartily, I know; and if, when this dreadful war is over, you should revisit Copenhagen, we should all be so glad," said Mademoiselle Torfe, and then suddenly started and turned pale, as the broad-brimmed hat, green spectacles, and snake-like head of Dr. Blumenbach were protruded from a neighboring thicket, and the doctor himself, blandly smiling and bowing, came pushing his way through the fern and brambles, to announce to the "hochwohlgebornen fraülein" that her very noble papa, his illustrious patient, had twice inquired for her. Nothing could be more politely deferential than the doctor's manner, and I could not help blaming Christina in my heart for the haughtiness with which she received his suave civilities. It was evident that he was no favorite with her, and the dry "Thank you, Herr Blumenbach; you will oblige me by telling papa that I shall return directly," was made still more repellant by the freezing glance of the blue eyes. The doctor took the hint in good part, however, rubbed his hands together, bowed, smirked, and, assuring the "gnädige fraülein" that he should have the honor of delivering her message, retired at a brisk pace. We followed more slowly; and as soon as the bony figure of the doctor had vanished among the smooth stems of the beech trees, my fair companion exclaimed, passionately:

"I hate that man; I am sure he is a spy!"

This speech was couched in the Danish tongue, and it seemed to be uttered as a soliloquy rather than addressed to me; but the emphasis with which it was uttered almost startled me.

"A spy?" said I, turning in surprise. "Surely not. In the first place, he must be known to and esteemed by Count Torfe; and, besides——"

"Had he but just come up at that moment? or had he been listening?" interrupted Christina, anxiously; and then, seeming to shake off her anxiety by a sudden effort, she told me that she was very foolish, that antipathies were beyond our own control, and that she was quite ashamed of her dislike to Dr. Blumenbach, who was, after all, a clever practitioner, and of much service to her father. As for his being a spy, she laughingly said that his being a German, and his wearing tinted spectacles, were the only grounds for such a suspicion; and even if he were the most ubiquitous of eavesdroppers, we had not been talking state secrets, and might afford to take all Berlin into our confidence. And then we rejoined the party, and the rest of that holiday afternoon was spent without the occurrence of anything worth mentioning.

On Monday morning I started for Elsinore, having in my portmanteau the much-valued cigar-case, which had been forwarded to me on the previous evening, along with a tiny pink note, that contained only a very few words of playful entreaty on the party of Christina Torfe that I would not forget her commission. I examined the cigar-case with some curiosity. It was a large and handsome one, of embossed silver, very splendidly emblazoned with the Torfe coat of arms, and with a baron's coronet, and the letters "H. T.," in Gothic characters, below the heraldic cognizance. It was lined with Russia leather, and contained six cigars, Havanas of very good quality, to judge by their pale amber tint and the delicate satin-like smoothness of the twisted leaf. I was scarcely surprised that the owner of this costly pocket companion should be attached to it, especially as it was the gift of an old friend. And I anticipated some pleasure in transferring my charge to its proprietor, whose name, with the number of his regiment, I had duly entered in my pocket-book.

I found but little difficulty in obtaining the pass which I required to enable me to come and go freely within the German lines. The Prussian staff-major, to whom I presented my letter of introduction, did not disguise from me, as he handed me the magic slip of paper, signed by Marshal—then Lieutenant-General—Wrangel, that the favor was not one granted every day to amateur sight-seers. However, I was a friend's friend, and he was satisfied with my word of honor that I was not the bearer of any secret despatches or private messages to any of the Danish partisans within the Duchies.

My thoughts frequently reccurred to that scene in the wood, on the day of the picnic at Holgerness. It was not alone that I remembered Christina's rare loveliness, and the affection for her brother, which had prompted her to seek every opportunity of alleviating the monotonous sadness of his captivity. But there was something strange in the manner in which the request had been preferred.

The more I thought of it, the harder did I find it to account for the marked agitation which Christina Torfe had displayed during the interview. The favor she had asked at my hands was a very petty one—one of those trifling services which cannot be refused without churlishness, and which would not, under ordinary circumstances, cost the person who should render them a second thought. Why, then, had there been so much excitement, so much hesitation, on the part of the fair petitioner? I instantly dismissed from my mind the idea, however flattering to myself, that Mademoiselle Torfe was not insensible to the personal merits of George Shaw, Esq., of the Inner Temple. Christina, with her thoughtful eyes and proud mien, was by no means likely, not only to give away her heart unasked, but to betray a preference for an absolute stranger. Besides this, the Danish aristocracy, though affable and unaffected in social intercourse, still retain their feudal prejudices when matrimony is in question. And the junior barrister, tenant of a grim set of chambers in Pump court, and thankful for a brief, was no fit match for the daughter of the rich Count Torfe. Still, why had the young lady shown signs of such evident emotion—emotion, too, which she would manifestly have been glad to hide, and which was intensified by the sudden appearance of that green-spectacled German doctor, who had, I could not but own, the very look of a spy.

"Halt! halt, there! Give the word!" called out a beardless Prussian sentinel, whose German had a strong Polish twang in it; and he brought his musket to the "charge" as he hailed me. I started at my reverie being thus roughly broken in upon, and saw the tents of an encampment close before me, clustered around a great old farmhouse over which a flag was hoisted, and which was probably the commandant's quarters. I had arrived at the camp I sought, and a young guardsman, from Posen, was preparing to prove his skill with the newly invented "needle gun" on my person, since I had invaded his post without observing him. I gave the word, however, which I fortunately had received from a civil commissariat officer at Eckernford, exhibited my pass, and was committed to the charge of a corporal and fatigue party, who happened just then to pass. My guide was paid and dismissed, since none of the peasantry, without special license, were suffered to enter the camp, and I was at once escorted into the presence of the officer on duty in the nearest guardhouse. This gentleman was polite enough. He read my pass carefully over, compared the signature with an autograph that he had by him, and returned it with a bow.

"You will excuse these formalities, I trust," said the Prussian, smiling good-humoredly. "We have our orders, and our commander, Major Rothenthurm, is not the man to permit any laxity in their execution. And only this morning special instructions—— But I will not delay you any longer, meinherr. You are at liberty to visit all parts of the camp, the grand guard and quarter-general excepted."

I was offered the services of an orderly, as it would be hard for me to find my way without guidance; and as the orderly was an intelligent young fellow, with a pleasant face and civil manner, I thankfully accepted the offer.

While conversing with him, and as we passed between the turfy hillocks and sandy hollows that intervened between the quarters of the Prussian guard and those of the Danish prisoners, we almost stumbled over an old man in black clothes of clerical cut, with a broad-brimmed hat, from beneath which fell his long iron-gray hair. He was on his knees, carefully digging up some roots with his pocket-knife, and a wallet half full of roots, bulbs, and other objects, lay on the ground beside him. He took off his hat and bowed politely to me as a stranger, and I returned the bow and the "golden daeg," and passed on.

"That is old Herr Pastor Kruse, the clergyman of Eppheim," said the orderly; "though he's a Dane, he's free of the camp, by special orders from headquarters. He is an odd old man, but a good pastor, though he certainly must be crazy about botany and entomology to hunt beetles and wild flowers, as he does, in the very middle of our batteries and battalions. But he is a corresponding member of every learned society in Europe, and Wrangel, Berg, and all the generals, know all about him, and he goes where he likes without being molested. But here are the Danes, meinherr. What was the name of the officer you desired to see?"

"Captain Harald Torfe," I answered, "of the regiment of ——" But here the words died away on my lips as a long loud shout came rolling from afar, and immediately afterwards followed the quick menacing rattle of the Prussian drums. My companion started, while even the Danish prisoners lounging in the sunshine clustered together with anxiety depicted in their faces.

"That is the 'alarm,'" observed my guide. "What can be amiss?"

This question was soon set at rest. Twenty soldiers, headed by an officer with his sword drawn, came hurrying up at a run, and several voices demanded:

"Where was the Englander?"

And before an answer could be returned, the captain at the head of the party laid his hand heavily on my arm and bade me consider myself under arrest, in the names of the König von Preussen and the commandent of Eckernfiord. My first impulse was to shake off his grasp, but the futility of resistance was but too plain.

"What is my offense?" I asked, angrily.

The sergeant, who had been interrogating my soldier guide, here broke eagerly in:

"Herr Captain, the orderly declares that this Englander openly avowed his wish to speak with Captain the Baron Harald Torfe, to whom he had something to deliver. That will make matters clearer to the honorable court-martial."

"Bring him along," cried the captain. And between a file of soldiers with fixed bayonets I was hurried away. My expostulations were quite unheeded. Indeed, no one listened to a word I said, and I soon desisted from the useless endeavor to explain my own innocence of all design hostile to the majesty of Prussia and the Germanic Verein.

I addressed myself to the aide-de-camp, demanding, as calmly as I could, the reason of my arrest. But the Prussian was not disposed to be communicative. He merely frowned, and ordered the sergeant to "keep the prisoner quiet;" and I determined to wait until I should be brought before some superior authority, when I could not doubt that the mistake, whatever it was, would at once be cleared up. I waited and waited, in a fever of annoyance and perplexity, while still the drums beat and the word of command resounded without, and still the military automata around me wrote and ciphered, filling up pages and columns with their neat, small handwriting, till the monotonous scratching of their pens upon the paper grew hateful to my ear. At last the door flew open, and I was bidden to "advance, for the court-martial was ready."

In another minute I found myself in a large room, in a condition of piteous wreck and disorder. Six or seven officers were seated at a table littered with papers, while a number of soldiers and one or two nondescript persons, like clerks in uniform, stood in the background. The most prominent figure, however, was a broad-chested old man, wearing several decorations, and whose white mustache and grizzled head, closely cropped, contrasted with his purple and swollen face. All the other officers were young men, and I could not doubt but that this savage-looking veteran was Major Rothenthurm, who commanded at Eckernfiord, and whom I had incidentally heard described as a tyrannical martinet.

Major Rothenthurm eyed me very sternly and grimly, much as a tiger might eye the victim lying crushed beneath his cruel paw, and cut short my efforts at remonstrance with almost a roar of angry imperiousness. He then curtly informed the "court" that the proceedings might begin, as the accused was before it; and at a sign from the major, a sergeant, who acted as greffier, dipped his pen in the ink before him, and prepared to write. The "interrogatory" began at once, and I, indignant as I was at the harsh injustice of my treatment, deemed it best to answer the questions. In answer to the president, I told my name and profession, whence I came, and why I had sought an interview with Captain Torfe, of the Danish service. The cigar-case was drawn from my pocket and handed to the president. The fierce old officer held it in his clutch, and continued to stare at me with the expression with which a cat surveys a half-dead mouse.

"You have nothing to add to your confession, Herr Shaw?—nothing, I mean, that may give you a claim to the mercy of the court?"

"Nothing, Major Rothenthurm," I answered, with rising indignation. "I want no mercy from you, but simply to be set at liberty. You are either under some strange delusion, or you are ——"

Here a hand was pressed upon my mouth so forcibly that my speech was cut short, while the major looked around, and said, sternly, to the greffier:

"Write that the 'suspect' Shaw, native of Warwickshire, England, insults the court and rejects its clemency. And now, sir, what say you to this proof that your artfully devised scheme to convey concealed dispatches to the Danish prisoners has failed to hoodwink the Royal Prussian officers?"

So saying, the major deliberately opened the splendid box of embossed silver, drew out a cigar, and carefully untwisting the outside leaf of amber-hued tobacco, disclosed a tightly-folded roll of delicate tissue paper, thickly written over in small characters, that had hitherto lain invisible in the centre of that treacherous Havana. A second, and third, and so on to the sixth and last, also gave to view, on the process being repeated, a similar roll of paper.

The papers were unrolled, and three of the officers present, being acquainted with the Danish language, undertook to translate the contents for the information of the court. As for myself, I was fairly struck dumb, and I cannot wonder that my surprise and confusion were attributed to conscious guilt. But my ideas had not yet had time to clear when one of the interpreters announced that the contents of the documents so cunningly concealed corresponded with the warning Major Rothenthurm had received. The dispatches were addressed to Captain Harald Torfe, and urged that officer, well known for his daring and address, to organize an outbreak among the prisoners, and to head a rising on a given day, when the guards might be overpowered, and the escape of all the Danes secured.

The writer further promised, that on the day in question, a flotilla of Danish gunboats and other small vessels would put into the fiord, prepared not only to embark the escaped captives, but to land a force of marines and seamen to their aid; and so well was the affair planned, that, but for treachery, the scheme might probably have been successful.

Nor was I long left in doubt as to the name of the spy who had played a traitor's part. One of the younger officers thoughtlessly said that "Dr. Jacob Blumenbach was a useful bloodhound;" and when those beside the careless speaker uttered a warning "Hush!" the president gruffly remarked that the indiscretion mattered little, since the English "suspect" would not have much chance of holding further intercourse with his Danish friends in Copenhagen.

Then I was removed, while the court should deliberate on my case; nor was I permitted to speak again. Indeed, it would have been of little use. I had already related the simple truth, which had been received with sneers and incredulity. I was marched away to the kitchen of the farm, then full of soldiers, who stared at me, but did not address me. Most of these men were convalescents not yet fit for duty; but there was a regular guard, and the sentries at the outer door were doubled. In twenty minutes a young officer, a lieutenant, came out of the farm parlor. His face was pale and his manner nervous, I thought, as he approached me, a written paper in his hand.

"It is my duty, Herr Shaw, to communicate to you the decision of the court-martial. It is a painful duty, but I cannot reject or modify it," said this gentleman, who seemed a kind-hearted young fellow, and who vainly tried to speak with official formalism as he went on, huskily, "you are found guilty on all the charges. The sentence is—death!"

"Death!" I repeated, incredulously. "You are trying to frighten me. This is a jest!"

"It is grim, hard earnest," said the lieutenant, shaking his head; "here is the sentence in writing. You can read German, I believe?" And I tried to read the writing which he thrust into my hand, but the written words danced before my eyes, and I was unable to decipher one letter. For an instant I was stupefied. Then I spoke out, and to some purpose. Solemnly I protested my innocence; angrily I inveighed against the glaring mockery of my trial. And I bade my hearer remember that I was an Englishman, and that my country was neither slack nor slow in avenging the blood of any of her people unrighteously shed, so that retribution would not fail to overtake those who should murder me under color of law.

To this the lieutenant replied, not unkindly, that the responsibility rested with Major Rothenthurm alone; that what I said might be true, but that the major was the very last man in the Prussian service to attach weight to the displeasure of a foreign power; that he had a strong dislike to England and Englishmen, and that he was thoroughly bent on making a severe example of me, that future attempts of the sort might be checked. Briefly, orders must be obeyed.

"When is it to be?" asked I, in a voice that did not sound like my own.

"At sunset this day," the lieutenant answered, and left me, directing the sergeant to allow me to sit down, and to let me have any refreshments that I might require, but on no account to lose sight of me for an instant. I was thrust into a chair, and there I sat like one who has received a stunning blow. Presently I heard the sound of a voice addressing me kindly, and I looked up and saw Pastor Kruse, the Danish clergyman, standing over me. He was speaking to me in English, but the words had to be twice repeated before I gathered their meaning.

"This is a sad affair," said the old pastor, "but I, for one, am convinced of your innocence. I have been speaking to the major, but he is obdurate. If you will tell me the plain truth, I may save you yet." And indeed, on hearing the whole story from my lips, the good old man declared his intention of setting off at once to General Berg, at Schleswig, an officer whose authority was paramount in the district, and of soliciting at least a respite of the iniquitous sentence.

"I know him well. We are brother naturalists, and he is a good man," said the pastor; "and old as my nag and I are, we have strength enough left to make light of the leagues on an errand of mercy. Keep a good heart. Your life is safe, or my name is not Ephraim Kruse."

But when hour after hour of that long sultry day went by, and no reprieve arrived, I began greatly to doubt whether or no I could depend on the pastor's cheery assurance.

Twice I earnestly entreated to be allowed an interview with Major Rothenthurm, in the vain hope of inducing him to hear reason, but this was denied. Otherwise I was not ill-used. Food was repeatedly offered me, and when I refused it, and asked for writing materials, these were supplied, though I was warned that the letters I wrote would be perused by the commandant, and forwarded or not, according to his good pleasure. I was told, too, that the Danish prisoners were now very closely watched, that guns loaded with grape were pointed at their quarters, and that half the troops in camp were kept under arms to frustrate any outbreak; also, that Captain Harald Torfe, and other captive officers, had been placed in confinement, and were to be questioned in the course of the day.

The day wore on. The shadows grew longer and more slanting, and the level yellow rays of the sinking sun streamed through the western window and fell on the brick floor; but still no signs of Pastor Kruse's embassy having been successful. My mind was growing weary. I had thought long and sadly of dear friends at home, whom I should never see again; of my life so rudely cut short; of my day-dreams never to be realized. I thought, too, of Christina's conduct. The trick was a cruel one; but I was convinced by her agitation, well remembered now, that she was averse to the part she played in the plot, and that others had persuaded her to dissemble thus. And probably but for the treason of that green-spectacled snake of a German doctor, the ruse would have succeeded, and——

"It is time, Herr Shaw," said the young lieutenant, coming in, with his sword drawn, and accompanied by three files of soldiers. Quite passive and apathetic, I permitted myself to be led away, followed by a murmur of compassion from the wounded soldiers in the kitchen. At the outer door the rest of the firing party stood in waiting, and I was conducted onward among the grassy mounds, to a spot where there was a deep sandy hollow. Here a grave had been dug. The pioneers had just finished this portion of their work, and they waited, leaning on their spades, to fill in the earth that should cover me from men's sight for ever. A rude coffin, of unpainted deal, lay beside the grave. The firing party was hastily drawn up, and as they faced me, the sergeant produced a handkerchief to bind my eyes. As he touched me, I seemed at once to become awake to the dreadful nature of my position.

I began, for the fourth time, to protest my absolute innocence of any military offense, but in vain. I was forced down on my knees, and blindfolded. They left me kneeling beside the trench, and I heard the words, "Attention! Order arms!" The muskets rattled. But then there was a shout, the tramp of a horse, and next a hearty cheer from the soldiers.

"Reprieved! A reprieve for the Englander! Huzza!"

The bandage was torn from my eyes, and I found myself in presence of an aide-de-camp of General Berg, who had ridden hard from Schleswig, as the condition of his reeking charger proved, but who was only just in time. The general had been absent from the city when Pastor Kruse arrived, and had not returned until it was almost too late to hope that the messenger of mercy should reach Eckernfiord before sunset. However, I was saved, and having been sent to Schleswig, was there set at liberty, General Berg being sensible enough to perceive that I had been made a mere scapegoat in the matter.

"You will make the best of your way to England, I suppose," said the general, good-humoredly; "and keep out of old Rothenthurm's way in future, I advise you. That old man—he won his way up from the ranks in the French war by sheer dogged courage—is a terrible Turk, and might have involved us sadly with your country, but for Pastor Kruse. But I see plainly how ill you have been used. Why, Mademoiselle Christina has no brother at all, as I am informed. The captain is a cousin, and the young people have been betrothed from childhood, in the old Danish fashion."

And such was the case; for, long afterward, I heard from the Hanburys, whom I found it hard to forgive for their share of the plot, that Count Torfe's eldest daughter had, at the conclusion of the war, been married to Baron Harald, her cousin.

"OLD SWEDES' CHURCH."

THE Old Swedes' Church, or as it was called by them, The Wicaco, or otherwise spelt Wicacoa, which name was given to the place by the Indians, was one of three churches built and used by the Swedes. Of the others, one was at Christina (now Wilmington, Del.), named after their queen, and the other at Tinicum, on the Delaware.

The first permanent settlement on the shores of the Delaware, appears to have been made by the Dutch, consisting of thirty-four persons brought over by Captain De Vries, in 1630-31; but he, having occasion to return to Holland, left the colony in charge of an inexperienced individual, and they were all, in 1632, exterminated by the Indians. De Vries returned in December of the same year, and entering the Delaware, found no signs of the colony he expected to meet, save their bones. We date, therefore, the first permanent settlement of the Dutch on the Delaware about the year 1633. This appears to be the earliest period claimed for them by their own historians.

It was in the reign of that illustrious king, Gustavus Adolphus (who lost his life in the battle of Lutzen, in November, 1632), that an attempt was first made to plant a colony of Swedes in America.

William Usselinx, a Hollander, had formed so favorable an opinion of this country, representing it as a fine fertile land, in which all the necessaries and comforts of life were to be enjoyed in overflowing abundance, that he presented the king the idea of a trading company. Upon his representation, a company was established, with power to trade to Asia, Africa, and the Straits of Magellan. The king issued his proclamation, or edict, dated at Stockholm, the second day of July, 1626, in which he offered to people of all conditions, liberty of shares, by subscription, according to their ability or inclinations.

The proposal was received with general satisfaction. The court, many civic and military officers of high rank, the bishop and clergymen, merchants, citizens, country gentlemen, and farmers, became subscribers. Ships and all necessaries were provided. An admiral, vice-admiral, commissaries, merchants, &c., were appointed. The work was ripe for accomplishment, when the German war, and soon after the death of the king, put a stop to the proceedings, and for the present defeated the intention of sending to America a Swedish colony.

About ten years later, Peter Menewe (or Minuit), the first Governor of New Amsterdam (now New York), after his removal from that position by the appointment of Van Twiller, and profiting by his knowledge of the country, went to Sweden, and informed some of the principal gentlemen that the Dutch had settled on the east side of the Delaware, but that the whole of the western side was unoccupied, except by the Indians. He urged a settlement there, offering to conduct the enterprise. The project was well received, and, in particular, was favored by the prime minister, Count Oxenstein.

He laid before Queen Christina the plan of a colony; she was pleased with it, and gave, in 1636, her orders for the execution of the same.

A ship called the Key of Calmar was fitted out from Gottenburg, and Menewe was appointed commander of the colony. The Key of Calmar was accompanied by a smaller vessel called the Bird Grip (or Griffin), fitted out in a like manner; Reorus Torkillus accompanied Minewe, as the first Swedish missionary, and died here in 1643, aged thirty-five years. They arrived in safety, obtained a grant of land from the Indians, extending from the mouth of Cape Hen open to the Fall of Sanhican (or Trenton Falls), and there fixed stakes and marks. The purchase was formally stated in writings, under which the Indians put their marks. The document was sent to Sweden, and preserved in the archives at Stockholm.

The people settled on the creek still called Christina, and erected a fort at the mouth of it; naming both in honor of their queen.

The manner in which Pennsylvania became settled by the English is well known. The large territory comprehended under this name was granted by Charles II. to William Penn, in compensation of a large sum owed by the government to his father, Admiral Penn. Penn came over in 1682, and founded the city of Philadelphia.

The Swede's, who were owners of the soil, opposed the undertaking, but by kind promises and other means were, after awhile, induced to agree to it. Penn offered the Swedes' a portion of land, where they might live together, and enjoy their own customs; but they preferred remaining as they were, which their descendants seem to have bitterly regretted.

About this time an impostor, who bore the name of Koenigsmark, arrived among the Swedes, and having gained many adherents, especially among the Finns, raised a sedition, though with what object does not appear. This man was apprehended, branded, and exiled.

His followers were fined, and some lost their land. The disturbances occasioned in this manner seemed to have lessened the good opinion Penn had formed of the Swedes. He continued, however, his good offices toward them; and having before this returned to England, sent them books and catechisms, and a folio Bible for their church.

It is not certain as to the exact time, but just before the attack of the Dutch, under Stuyvesant, or soon after, which is the most likely, from the growing animosity of the Indians toward them, the Dutch ordered the Swedes to erect a block-house at Wicaco, for defense against the Indians. As the distance to Tinicum rendered an attendance at public worship there very inconvenient, this block-house was converted into a church. They applied to the Rev. Jacob Fapritius, of New York, who accepted a call to Wicaco, where he preached his first sermon on Trinity Sunday, in the year 1677, in the Dutch language, which the Swedes, from the intercourse they had with that people, and the close affinity between the two languages, well understood. He officiated as their pastor for fourteen years, nine of which he was blind. He died about 1692.

Three others were chosen by the Archbishop of Upsal, with and by the consent of King Charles XI., of Sweden, as clergymen of the Swedish churches in America, the 15th day of July, 1696: Jonas Auren, for Racoon or Penn's Neck Church; Erick Biork, for Christina Church, Wilmington, Del.; and Andrew Rudman, for the Wicaco Church.

They left Sweden in the ship Palmbottom, Capt. Hogen, on the 4th day of August, 1696. They encountered a violent storm in the North Sea; were compelled to put into London, England, and there they were detained by the authorities until the 4th day of February, 1697, when they sailed in the ship Jeffris, Capt. Cooper. After ten weeks, they reached the coast of Virginia, and, entering the Chesapeake bay, they landed at Annapolis, Md. After remaining about two weeks, they obtained a shallop, and landed at a place called Transtown (probably Frenchtown), situated on the Elk River, from which place they were taken by their friends to their new homes, on the 27th day of June, 1697.

In 1697, the church at Wicaco was a half mile from the city of Philadelphia, and the minister's garden and mansion-house were four miles from the city, at Point Breeze, on the Schuylkill river. The population was very thin, and scattered all along the river-shore, so that some of them had to walk or ride sixteen miles to church. Nevertheless, Mr. Rudman says: "They very regularly attended divine service on Sundays," &c.

On the 28th day of May, 1698, they laid the corner-stone of the Old Swede's Church, at Christina (now Wilmington, Del.), and on Trinity Sunday, of the following year, 1699, it was dedicated to service.

The Swedes near Philadelphia commenced preparations for the building of a new church, at the same time with those of Christina; but the undertaking was delayed a year or two, on account of their not being able to agree among themselves as to where the building should be erected. Those who resided on the banks of the Schuylkill, and lower down, wished the church built at a place called Passyunk (now Point Breeze), and those on the other side wished it built on the Delaware, at Wicaco. After several fruitless attempts by each party, a general meeting of the congregation was called on the 17th day of May, 1698, when the lower inhabitants proposed to have the matter decided by lot. Accordingly, two pieces of paper were prepared, on one of which was written Wicaco, and on the other, Passyunk; these were shaken in a hat, and thrown upon the ground, when, upon taking one up, and opening it, the name of Wicaco appeared. Dissension at once ceased, and all joined in a cheerful hymn of praise.

The same bricklayers and carpenters who had built the church at Christina, were employed to build the one at Wicaco; and on the second Sunday after Trinity, in the year 1700, the Rev. Erick Biork, of Christina, preached the dedication sermon, from 2 Sam., v., 29. Mr. Biork says "The churches at Christina and Wicaco will cost us about $20,000" (Swedish money). He mentions the fact of the two Governors and their suites visiting the church at Christina, Francis Nicholson, Governor of Maryland, and Governor Blackstone, of Virginia, the former being their great patron.

The church alluded to above as dedicated in 1700, is the one of which we give an engraving.

There is still preserved in this church, on the front of the west gallery, an antique representation of two cherubs, with their wings spread over what is intended to represent the Holy Bible, on one of the open pages of which is the following passage from Isaiah, in Swedish characters: "The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light," etc.; and on the other page, that passage, also in Swedish characters, from the New Testament, in which the angels, at the birth of the Saviour, are spoken of as celebrating the event in the anthem of "Glory to God in the Highest," etc.

The present bell of the Wicaco church has the following inscription upon it: "Cast for Swedish Church in Philadelphia, styled Gloria Dei, partly from the old bell, dated 1643. G. Hedderly, Fecit, 1806.

"I to the church the living call,
And to the grave do summons all."

The Rev. Andrew Rudman preached his farewell sermon at Wicaco, on the 19th day of July, 1701, and departed the next day to enter upon his duties in New York and Albany among the Dutch. How long Mr. Rudman officiated in New York is not known. He found the climate did not agree with his constitution, and his health becoming impaired, he took measures to obtain for them a Dutch clergyman to supply his place. After leaving New York, Mr. Rudman officiated for some time at the English Church at Oxford, and afterward, upon the Rev. Mr. Evans leaving this place for England, he took charge of Christ Church, in this city. He continued to officiate in that until his death, which took place on the 17th day of September, 1708, aged forty years. His remains lie beneath the chancel in the Wicaco church. The parsonage still remained at Passyunk until 1733, when they finished another, which stood, until about 1821, when they erected the one which now stands beside the Church. There is but one stone in the yard that contains a Swedish inscription; and the oldest stone contains the following:

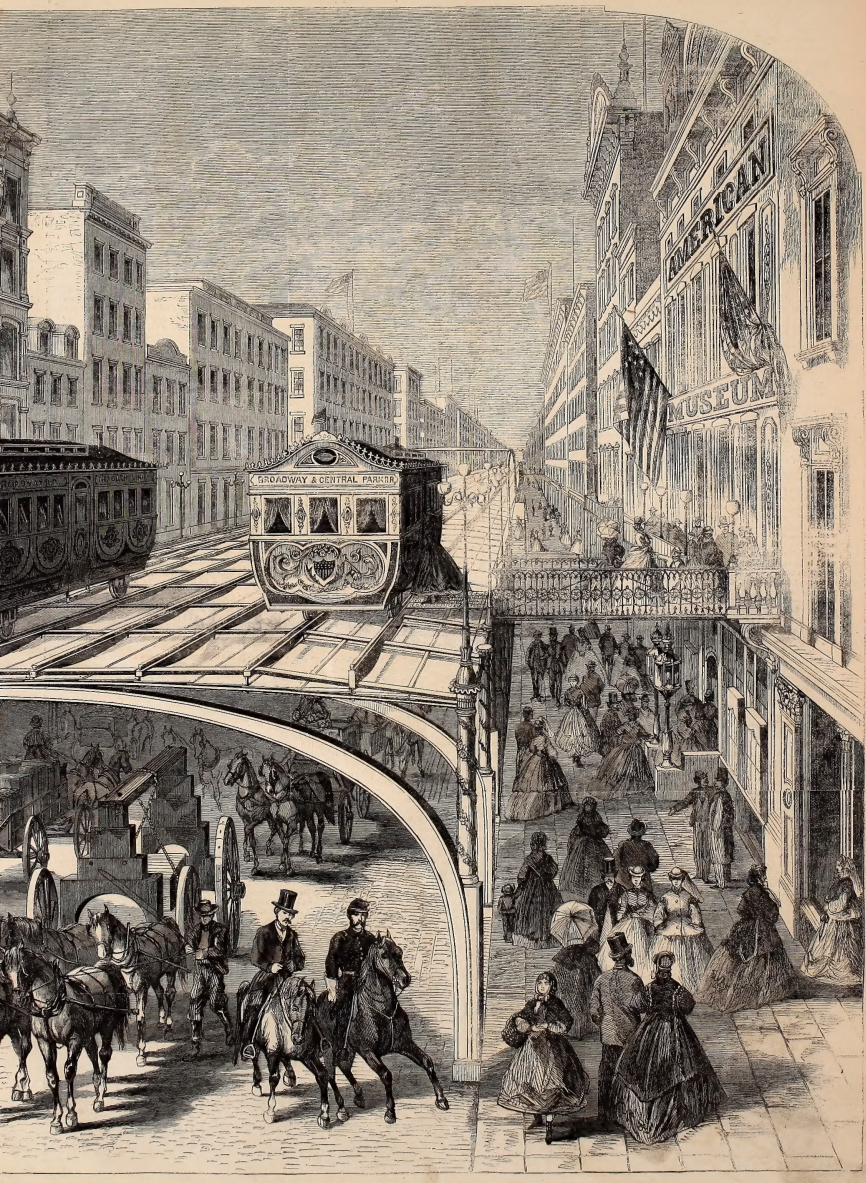
"Here lyeth the body of Peter, the son of Andreas Sandal, Minister of this Church, who dyed April ye 21, A.D. 1708, aged 2 years and 4 months.

"Here also lyeth the body of Andreas, son of Andreas Sandal, who died August 13, A.D. 1711, aged 2 weeks and 2 days."

There are several stones that are under what was formerly the central aisle, the present being a wood flooring, built above the original one, which was of tile or slabs.

The Old Swedes' Church, as it is familiarly known, is the oldest church in Pennsylvania by several years. It has had twelve different rectors during the last 166 years, and is known in its connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church in these United States. The church has a gallery running on the north and west side, also on the west end, in which is placed a small organ. The congregation comprises about 600.

When Jenny Lind was in the city of Philadelphia, she attended service at this church, and although she took every precaution to prevent the public from knowing of her intended visit, by driving in a different direction to that of the church, yet, upon her arrival, it was soon spread, and they were forced to close the doors leading to the galleries, for fear of their breaking down with the crowd, anxious to catch a glimpse of the Queen of Song.



In front of the door stands the sexton, who has been connected with the church for thirty-four years in that capacity.

On the 14th day of November, A. D. 1831, a meeting of the congregation was held, and among other matters of interest, "they feel the necessity, from the little knowledge of the Swedish language remaining among them, of having clergymen set over them who had received their education in this country, etc." Up to this time they had been supplied from Sweden.

On the north side, and adjoining the church, was a two-story brick house, used during the occupancy of the city by the British as a picket-post and picket-quarters. Among the officers was one young man who had been very earnest in his attentions to a very pretty young lady in the vicinity, and who finally seduced her under promise of marriage. He was in the habit of walking in the grave-yard each day, and while doing so, a report was heard, and the officer fell a lifeless corpse; his body was carried into the house, and every effort made to discover the assassin, but to no purpose, and it remained a secret as to where from, or by whom the shot was fired. At length the property was sold, and the order given to tear it down. While the workmen were removing the roof, a rifle was found stowed away between the rafters and sheathing, well rusted, and showing unmistakable signs of long disuse; there were also found blood-stains upon the floor, just under a small window, looking down upon the church-yard, but who placed the rifle in that position, or whose life-blood left its indelible stain upon the floor, has never been revealed; yet, those who related the story just given, and which has passed into the annals of Philadelphia, say that that young lady had a brother, who was never seen after the occurrence of this tragedy.

BROADWAY RAILROAD—THE GRAND ELEVATION OF THE OVERGROUND RAILROAD.—DESIGNED AND PATENTED BY WILLIAM HEMSTREET, BROOKLYN.

OUND RAILROAD.—Designed and Patented by William Heinstreit, Brooklyn.

NOT YET.

BY MISS R. V. ROBERTS.

Not yet! not yet
The time hath come to cease this weary toil.
The daily struggle 'midst the world's turmoil,
To shake from off thy mind its grasp and soil—
Not yet!
The constant fret and worry—cark and care,
Like sculptor's chisel, delicate and rare,
Fashions thy soul to lineaments more fair—
Not yet!

Not yet, not yet
Hath come the time to say: "It is enough,
I weary of this battle—long and rough;"
A true brave heart is made of firmer stuff;—
Not yet!
Thou must not lay thy trusty weapons down.
However weary of the combat grown,
Thou canst not claim the palm—the victor's crown,
Not yet.

Not yet, not yet
Thy finished work appointed hath been done;
Nor the long, persevering race, been run,
And the sure peace of patience won—
Not yet.
Then hast not plucked away all noxious weeds,
Then hast not sown thy measure of good seeds,
Nor filled thy stint of self-denying deeds—
Not yet.

Not yet, not yet—
Not till each wayward thought hath been subdued;
Till thou hast trampled down each bitter mood,
And learned to count each trial, sweet and good—
Not yet.
Till free from envious wish—suspicion mean,
Thy spirit hath been purged, all pure and clean,
And thou o'er conquered self art absolute queen—
Then—but not yet.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAKE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER LXVI—CONTINUED.—UNDER PRISON BARS.

"Do you believe me guilty?" demanded Anthony.

Sleuth's soul had rightly divined what was coming, and what he would have to prevent—the asking himself of Anthony a corresponding question, supposing he avowed at once his belief in Anthony's innocence.

"Anthony, reflect, I pray you, just one moment. You have been charged before me—me, a magistrate—with the commission of one of the most awful of crimes. I do not know—I don't want to know, till obliged—what duties this may impose on me as a magistrate, but I think I may safely say that I cannot, at once, be a party to your prosecution and a secret sympathizer who tells you—whether he may believe, and hope to see proved—that you are innocent."

"Perhaps I might agree with that, Dick, if you weren't so long-winded. I will not follow your example, if you are going to say—"

"I am not going to do anything of the kind, Anthony—not now. But when you are acquitted —and you shall see that not a thing shall be left undone, to discover all facts that may—say, must —tend in that direction, if you are innocent—then, indeed, I will be on the question; and then, if I get my full acquittal from you, it will be dearer to me than if I had stood in the felon's dock, and there delivered the verdict: 'Not guilty!'"

"The felon's dock! By heavens, Sleuth, at times I think you come here to drive me out of my senses. Your words are admirable, your acts seemingly beyond reproach, your aims kind—yet you throw in, every now and then, words, tones, looks, that, if I could doubt myself or my fate, would impel me to do so."

"Perhaps there may be a reason for that."

"What is it?"

"Bear with me, and I will confess—ay, all. do not think, then, you sufficiently weigh your danger."

"What!"

"Let me tell you this. When the whole subject was gone into, at the doctor's, Mr. Macguire and myself, through the movements of that wretched vagabond, Stonor, whom we had before us, the weight of seeming facts were so fearfully heavy, that I felt crushed by them to the earth; and though I hope the best, it would be no true act of a friend to urge you to do other than be prepared for the worst."

"Ha, ha, ha!"

"Laugh not, Anthony; I shall be glad, even, if it is my words that excite you to harmless mirth. But is it harmless?"

There was a cold, steely glitter in Sleuth's eyes that checked abruptly Anthony's bitter laugh. He didn't understand it, but he paused, thought about it, and was altogether more guarded through the rest of the interview.

"What do you want me to do or say?" he said, after a painful silence.

"I want you to get time."

"Time! For what?"

"For the discovery of fresh facts."

"Why, the assizes don't begin for two months yet. What more can I want than that?"

"Listen, Anthony. What I have to say must not go further." The magisterial attitude of mind here so far overpowered the instinctive individual attitude, that Sleuth drew Anthony to him, instead of himself going nearer to Anthony. "Mr. Macguire's clerk, who was present, said to me afterwards: 'If those facts are all proved, and no opposite ones brought to smash them, there's evidence to hang a dozen men! So, for heaven's sake, don't you or he underrate the danger.'"

It would be wrong to conceal the fact that Anthony's face did blanch a little at this, that his words became abrupt—full of agitation and brief fits of wild excitement—that his bones trembled, and his limbs seemed to own no master.

For a moment, however, only. With a strong effort of self-control in the midst of his impetuous wanderings to and fro, with a brief pause, in a dark corner of the cell, while he offered up a prayer, like a cry of agony, that appeal against wrong, he came back with a smile on his face, thinking of Clarissa's letter.

"Well, Dick, I will fight, anyhow; trust me for that. Anything more?"

"Can you ask me, Anthony? Do you not yet see what I want to say, but have not the courage to bring out?"

"I do not," said Anthony, simply; for he was already recalling expressions of his mistress's letter. And, to own the whole truth, Anthony wearied of Sleuth's visit, and rather wanted to evade fresh surprises leading to nothing that he could rest on satisfactorily. But Sleuth's first half-dozen words sent Clarissa and her young forgetfulness, and revived in sudden vividness all his interest in the dialogue.

"Anthony, you are wise, you'll evade for the present this trial!"

It was almost with a laugh of surprise that Anthony exclaimed:

"Evade! Well, that is cool! Do you mean I shall put my hand in my pocket, and find there the keys that will unlock every gate and set me free?"

"I say, Anthony, that, for the honor of the family, for the sake of your future life, and ultimate good name, you must—"

"Ay, what?"

"Fly!" whispered Sleuth, but without the slightest gesture other than a lifting of the eyebrows. "Fly. I will risk all that is involved in securing your escape. I will, even, if closely pushed, say plainly: 'Well, I own I did give my cousin a chance to do at a future day what he can do to-day."

"Don't be too sure of that," interposed Anthony. But Sleuth went on, as if he would not be interrupted:

"And if I must resign my commission as a justice of the peace, I do it willingly."

"This would not only save me, but you, Dick!" said Anthony, in a low, penetrating voice, that seemed to go to Sleuth's marrow.

"Of course, I do not mean that. If no present trial takes place, I am necessarily left unquestioned. What then? Does that alter the fact that you—the only one of others at present most deeply interested in the discovery of facts to prove your innocence—are crippled by being here, so long as you only wait developments, and will be a prey, therefore, to the worst of all miseries—that of losing inactive while in the greatest danger?"

"Grant that, it is—you must own it, Dick—a very convenient arrangement for you. I escape, while you fall. You are left to work out what was best when it came to the push,' My character gets a new and blacker dye. You stand before the world safe—distinguished, your office—a martyr to your love of me. Admirable plot, if only the chief actor would play in it. I won't, and I tell you honestly, Dick, that nothing shall induce me— But enough; we had better separate."

"And you will not, even for her sake, save yourself and punish her?"

"Sleuth, by the Lord, I'll break every bone in your body if you dare again hint at that. You understand, Sir? Not a word more against my wife! Nothing you, I wish to be calm, so I ask you quietly what you mean when you say I can punish you?"

"If, Anthony, you can believe this thing, what could be finer—more truly poetic in its justice than that you should take me at my word, get out, save the family name, and, by sound your secrecy, then to commit me—if I am the true criminal—by hunting up, and marshaling into a state of irresistible proof all the facts that must be denied you where you are now?"

Anthony was struck, and was silent. He could not deny that Sleuth had touched the truest heart of an innocent prisoner's anguish in these words. A hundred times already had he said to himself, "If I were but free! If I were but free to investigate!"

Sleuth pursued his advantage:

"On your honor, Anthony, and I are the true enemies, who must now fight a deadly combat. Very well. It is a fair combat? You a prisoner, I a free man. You, in the meantime, clapping over your name, I, a respected, and, I may say, a popular magistrate. You prepared, I venture to think, with an amount of knowledge of the paper with the evidence that made Mr. Macguire's clerk speak so strongly. Anthony, I am not a fool. You can trust my honor, and be glad to shake hands with you, and hurry out with the conviction that you were a lost man, and that I was only to guard you against a fatal spirit or remorse."

Anthony began now seriously to question himself. He began to think that somehow Sleuth was not only dominant in this meeting, but dominant partly through the superior moral position he had taken up. His thoughts were turned to a new channel by the next words he heard:

"Anthony, I am very—very miserable. I lament the day my uncle came to seek me at the chemist's shop; I lament my own silly dreams of social splendor; I lament that the discovery of the coldest gave me such realization of my dreams, as alone they were capable of. If that had not happened, I also I have had one true friend to this hour. No. I am alone! Unfit for the world I live in, unfit for the world I quitted. A stranger to the one man whom I have loved."

"Well, Dick, let us wish the next few weeks safely over for both of us, and then—"

"Ay, that's it! That is what I want to hear. You accept, then? You will go, if I can open the Hemdon doors?"

"No!" exclaimed Anthony, hastily, and with a passionate gesture, as if he were thrusting from him an idea that, for the moment, had tempted him. "No; I wouldn't have come here if could have helped it. I would have let the past sink to oblivion, and have trusted to time and my own character to have kept my future unompromised. But the blow had been struck that compels me now to look first to the enemy, whoever he is. I am charged publicly. I will now defend myself publicly. Dick, I thank you all the same. Perhaps I have used angry and unjust words. You must not measure me too much by what I have been in such things. I feel at times as if I should lose my senses, but that is only a passing mood. I am calm now. Feel my wrist pulse, and you will be satisfied that all is well within."

"Anthony, whatever I may say or do—I mean in fulfilling my duty—shall remember you at this moment, and feel sure of your innocence."

"You say so? You really say so, Dick?"

"I do."

"Then you can say no more. And if the seeming truth kills me, I will say it is that, and not Dick Sleuth, who has struck coldly. I trust to God, and his knowledge of my absolute innocence."

They shook hands. Sleuth went away, and Anthony sat down on his narrow bed, and tried to collect his thoughts, that had been so strangely distracted, and so unnerved by Mr. Stamp's arrival, who was, however, otherwise engaged.

CHAPTER LXVII.—IN CONCLAVE.

MR. STAMP'S private business room at Hengston, where was the favored legal representative of most of the county families within a large surrounding circle, usually previously had persons in it who had assembled there on business quite as momentous to them as that which now calls three persons to it at present; but certainly the presiding genius of the place (Mr. Stamp) had never before felt so deep a personal interest and anxiety as he did in the one that belongs to Harris's story of Anthony's arrest, and in looking on the bright, saucy, intelligent face M'Dean, now somewhat changed, while also taken into the confidence and who he was—the alderman's grandson, and the son of the very man who had originated this charge against Anthony Hemdon.

Mr. Stamp's first impression was that the whole story was trumped up by Bob, and that he had been induced by him to take a position to be compelled to own their share in the robbery, and that therefore they had, as he (Bob) must have anticipated, taken up Alderman and knowledge of the murder.

"If you see, my friend," he said to Harris, "that Bob has the keen acute enough to know that the law, having caught them, and transported them for one offense, won't care to go into another offense, and that Bob's murder is a very different thing. So they own the robbery, and stoutly deny the murder; and Bob, having got to the mercy of others, is having exhausted his son's patrimony, comes back to speculate on this charge of murder. I'll lay my life on it, if we know all, that Bob just as much brought the charge against Mr. Sleuth as against Mr. Anthony Maude, but for private reasons of his own."

"And what may those be?" asked Harris, in his usual matter-of-fact way.

"Well, it's a ticklish subject to go into. He may have thought one gentleman could be frightened, and the other not. He may have thought one would pay well, the other not, to have the charge hushed up."

"I'm sure no doubt, sir, you understand these things a deal better than I do; but if I may be so bold as to suggest—"

"Well?" and I confess to you I am at present utterly in the dark."

"Well, sir, it's this. This man—Bob, or Stonor —hasn't been seen since. But I can speak to: and if he has been to this Mr. Sleuth, he must have failed there, or why did he go on?"

"Ah, Harris, I see you're keen, as if he thought he had himself a case against our friend, and one that he wasn't inclined to compromise. I have sent a clerk to Bob's to get me any particulars of what is doing. I'll inquire if he has come back."

He rang the bell, and the clerk referred to entered, as if he had been waiting for the ring as a signal.

"Only this, sir," he said, handing to Mr. Stamp a great poster, which he held, lightly doubled by holding the two ends, between the tips of his fingers.

Mr. Stamp spread it out on the table; and Harris and Esau, seeing his look of wonder, approached and read:

ONE THOUSAND POUNDS REWARD.

Whereas, late in the night of the 22d of June, 1816, Silas Maude, Esq., commonly known as Mr. Alderman Maude, was feloniously murdered by a shot from a fire-arm, in his bed-room at Rock Villa, Hengston, Surrey, aforesaid, and whereas it was supposed at the time that he was killed by two men who had broke into his dwelling, and carried off various articles of property, but that there is reason now to believe that other unknown parties were concerned in the crime, either as concert with the burglars (which they deny), or acting independently of them, the above reward will be paid by the nephew and heir of the said Silas Maude, Esq., to such person or persons as may bring the murderer to conviction and punishment; or, failing that, from any unforeseen cause, to such person or persons as shall be able to prove, to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace, who is, in his opinion, the real criminal. Dr. Pompeus, of Eddington, (the nearest friend of the said Silas Maude), has consented to act in this capacity, and he will also gladly aid in any inquiries, and be responsible for any expenses that may seem to him legitimately calculated to promote discovery.

"Hem! hem! hem!" coughed Mr. Stamp; "this is about the shrewdest thing I ever met in a long professional life. What say you, Mr. Harris?"

Harris shook his head, and was evidently unable to think of anything but the secret connection between this placard and his friend and partner, who seemed to him in greater danger than ever if, as seemed to be the case, the man and just men who had sensed this bill were also the men who had advised the issue of the warrant for the arrest; for he and all had been at one with that, although Mr. Macguire's had been the hand, the decision had been that of Mr. Macguire, Dr. Pompeus, and Mr. Harris.

"Well," said Mr. Stamp, "what say you to this idea: suppose this worthy gentleman (Mr. Bob) has tried it on upon Mr. Sleuth, and has extracted this? Eh?"

"You do not mean it?" said Harris, starting up in affright.

"I said, 'suppose.' On the theory that the burglars did not murder the alderman, people generally will say that it is the case, who did."

"Who?" asked Harris, in an agitated voice.

"Why, they will say that it must be one of the two gentlemen who were in the house that night. I go further. I say the public will promptly conclude that it is that one of the two who was, as we say, 'left out in the cold;' one who had a as important limitation—who thought himself so. For it is quite conceivable the man who shot the alderman, did so, thinking the estate would pass from him if he did not, and then, too late, discovered his error."

Then, seeing Harris's distressed look, he added:

"But this is over-refining. The broad facts are, that our friend, Anthony Maude, is in prison; that it is this Bob who put him there, and that he will get a reward of a thousand pounds from Mr. Sleuth, if he succeed in proving his guilt before a court of justice."

"Awful! It's really awful! But the bill says he may get it even by satisfying Dr. Pompeus."

"Yes, and that is enough. It is intended to prepare for such a contingency as the guilty man's flight or death before conviction, and so on."

It was a singular coincidence; but, since these words were uttered, the time was the same, or very nearly the same, as that in which Sleuth was in the prison, urging on Anthony to flight.

"Well, gentlemen," continued Mr. Stamp, "I thought I would see you before I went to our unfortunate friend, who now waits for me, and is cursing me, I fear, for my inhumanity; but I will now, if you please, ask you to amuse yourselves as you can for an hour or two, while I go to the prison."

They were separating, when Mr. Stamp exclaimed, hastily:

"Stop! there's Miss Pompeus!—at least, I think it is her, although she is so closely veiled. Excuse me one moment."

He went out, and almost immediately returned with Clarissa, who, seeing Harris, went up, took his hand—that was so shyly stretched out, as if in doubt of the propriety of the action of the eyes, while he felt how she trembled, and continued to tremble, while he, fearing she was fainting, seated her. Then she beat her hand, but they and the spectators all turned away in respect, sympathy, and awe of the passing storm.

She did not long remain thus. She drew herself up, raised her veil, and Harris almost forgot, in the wondrous sweetness of that face, and of its calm, the bitter misery evidence of the eyes.

"I am so glad to see you," she said, in a low, quivering voice, that gradually strengthened as she proceeded. "I—I—my brother thought he had better not come himself; but—but he knows I am here."

Of course no further explanations were needed.

"And this is Esau, too, my old acquaintance, is it, and Mr. Maude's kinsman?"

"And friend!" said Esau, with some pride.

Clarissa looked at the animated face, but could not think of him—not then. She sighed deeply, and turned to the lawyer.

"Mr. Stamp," she began, authorizes me to say he will be glad to see you at any time, and he will always be at your service, if you think he can in any way promote the interests of your client, which he is beginning, even now, to believe will be the interest of truth."

"Well, Miss Pompeus, I have little to say at present, and I would have preferred to reserve that little till after my interview with Mr. Maude; but, as you have favored me with this visit, I will try to put the case into a nutshell:

"Supposing the burglars to speak truly—and I won't say that they do not—but supposing this, I say, the two facts on which it is most desirable instantly to obtain additional information are these—who was it that the landscape saw going to the safe-room, immediately after the murder, and before any warning had been given? Mrs. Milton at first thought it was Mr. Milton, but I have, perhaps, from the sound of his step, or some slight indication of that kind, subsequently forgotten; but what she saw the man, lastly, and in half darkness, she thought it was Mr. Anthony, mainly, I judge, on account of the light coat which the man wore, and which was of the same kind to the same shoe Anthony wearing, as he knelt by the bedside of the murdered man. That is the first critical question. And as Mrs. Milton, but I have no hope of fresh light from that source. We are to the second question: Who was it that wrote that pencil memorandum in the back of the cheque, so strangely discovered? My dear Miss Pompeus, you know, without a word from me, what I think. Improbable, as absolutely as you can, the belief that Mr. Anthony Maude was really the party concerned in either of these transactions; but if we cannot clear him up—"

The lawyer was silent. So, also, was Harris. So was Esau. Clarissa turned away, and again seemed to undergo some fearful convulsive of feeling, but which she mastered so heroically that, almost before any one was conscious of the fact, she was gazing on them with a face pale, but also seemingly as impassive, as marble.

"It would be a startling solution of the whole," said Mr. Stamp, "if Bob himself should prove to be the murderer. Most likely he knew of the robbery, and he may have fancied it a splendid opening for wreaking a bloody vengeance on the old man for his unforgiveness to his daughter and that daughter's husband."

They all caught at this, but just when they were beginning to think the case was getting quite clear, Mr. Stamp threw all back into confusion by saying:

"I fear that hypothesis must be dismissed, for none but a born idiot would willingly himself re-open such a matter, though, if it were re-opened, he might gladly enough jump to the idea of obtaining safety from suspicion by getting somebody else into the dock."

"That's just Mr. Sleuth's position—is it not?" said Harris, a little incautiously.

"Mr. Harris will please to remember he speaks of a magistrate and highly-respected gentleman."

Then, seeing how the poor man was taken aback, he said, graciously:

"Of course, were Mr. Sleuth in question—which he is not yet—it would be advisable to say what has been said. But we must be very cautious. I don't want to give Mr. Sleuth the remotest occasion for showing jealousy of our proceedings. I wish, indeed, to see a little of Mr. Sleuth's own views and attitude before I go any further."

Then, after a pause, he said:

"I suppose no one sees how either the lightcoat question or the penny-pencil-marks and cuticle question can be cleared up."

"Ask Miss Phillis?" suddenly said Esau. "I think she knows more than you'll easily get out of her."

Mr. Stamp was greatly interested in this suggestion, however, and could get nothing further from Esau than that the latter had seen Sleuth at one time kissing Phillis—Esau colored a little as his sawyy, inquiring eye just then turned to Miss Pompess—and at another he had seen them in quarrel, and Phillis in wild distress.

But what Mr. Stamp heard from Miss Pompess what he had not known before—of Phillis's late attack on Sleuth, and her arrest, and committal to prison, and maiden—his whole manner and countenance underwent a great change. He became wonderfully cool, self-possessed, airy, used few words, would not let Miss Pompess finish, but promptly brought the meeting to a close by a few words of his own:

"Miss Pompess, if I did not say before what was in my mind, about your conduct in coming here, let me say it now—not by words, but by a suggestion. Mr. Sleuth—I don't care not go further—but it is possible, I say, that you may have Mr. Maude's fate entirely in your hands."

"I? Indeed, sir!"

"You. I know what I say, and I say less than I think. It is no time to be sanguine. It is a time for reserve, hard work. I see many things to do, which I shall begin on the very moment I leave our captive friend. But they are all slight, I may say; yours is not. We don't think that woman probably lies the solution we all seek. But you say she is mad. That, probably, is only the first of a long series of sober, grave shocks of disappointment. She may get better; but she will require very careful handling for some months to come. She might talk to you, might confide to your things— But you understand?"

"Yes, yes, sir, I think I do."

"I have a most intelligent clerk, Mr. Goaden, whom I will place at your service. He is a most discreet young man, fully—old enough, young half to be your father. So if you want aid without waiting or wishing to consult me, call him to you. He'll be prepared, ready or to go on an inquiry into the next street here, or to start by tomorrow's Indiaman to Bengal."

"Thank you. Please let me see him before you go."

"Come, then, if you please, with me. Mr. Harris, we may see more to-day—unless I do this: let none of us at present tell even to our right hands what our left hands know."

CHAPTER LXVIII.—BEHIND THE PRISON SCREEN.

CLARISSA'S courage almost failed her when she began to realize the true character of the duty she had undertaken. Though she said nothing to Mr. Stamp about her father's objections, she knew they would prove most formidable when she began to talk to him and mixed her up in Anthony's position and fate before the whole world—and that, in addition, threatened to be to himself a constant source of moral vexation and anxiety, by taking her away from his society.

One by one, however, she accepted all her tasks, and fulfilled them. She had a long interview with Mr. Goaden, the clerk, which ended in his departure that night for Phillis's home in Chamberlad, to fetch Mrs. Hilton, the goddess, who might be not only help them in their endeavors to release Phillis, but who might be otherwise useful during the next few critical weeks.

Then Clarissa addressed herself to her father, and kept up an unceasing fire upon him for a couple of days, in suggestions of the importance to a magistrate of discovering the actual truth. These heavy attacks she followed up by lighter ones, full of coaxing solicitude and lavishness. Then, by artful insendees as to her father's sympathy with a man in misfortune, whom in prospect by he had quarreled with, by smiles and tears, and protestations as to her future prudence, if he would only allow her to be a little imprudent now, she wrung from him, before he well knew what he was about, permission to go to the prison, some fifteen miles off, where Phillis was confined. And then, though he repented, Clarissa was so grateful to him—so loving—so altogether charming, particularly whenever she saw signs of relapse, that he hadn't the heart to say any more—not that night—but went to bed, nevertheless, determined to fight the whole over again at breakfasttime, when, however, she was nowhere visible. She had guessed the danger, and evaded it by an early departure.

Two hours later she and Mr. Goaden stood in the waiting-room of the prison, while a matron went to the governor to ask for permission to see the two visitors. Clarissa had taken care to fortify the request by sending in a card that showed who she was—the daughter of Dr. Pompess, the well-known and highly-esteemed medical man.

Prisons were not then quite the formal, routine-governed places they are now. But the new ideas were penetrating through those hideous walls, slowly and fitfully; and one of the customs that had been recently established was likely to prove a barrier to all further advance to Clarissa's part. She and her companion were led through one dreary corridor after another, hearing at times the wild moans of female maniacs, that could hardly have been more horrible than it was if she were at the moment enduring some unutterable torture. Clarissa trembled, and began a list-ener to it—shrick following shrick, each louder and madder than before, as if in accumulating ecstasy of anguish, terror, or utter senselessness.

"Don't be afraid, miss; it's only a mad woman lately come in. Nobody's meddling with her."

"It's not only that," said Clarissa.

"Oh, dear, no—not the young person you come to see. She's quiet enough now, poor thing! She's even got over, I hope, getting off of her hair, which distressed her very much."

Clarissa said no more, and presently, after more passing through three doors, which the matron were unlocked and relocked as they moved, the three persons stood in a place dismal enough naturally, but with the misery of the scene made by a thick wire screen, which shut off a space beyond.

"If you will wait here," said the matron, "I will fetch Phillis Conyngham. You will see her the other side of the screen, but I must warn you that you must not touch it. I have been stationed at the door and heard what all that passes."

As the matron went away, Clarissa could not help wringing her hands in distress, and whispering to Mr. Goaden:

"I can do nothing! I can do nothing! I shall never be able to say what I have come to say—never for thinking of the other woman there, who is watching us. Cruel, cruel fate! Who could have foreseen this!"

"Pardon me, madam," said the clerk, drawing her a little aside, "but you must not forget that the matter is, after all, not so alarming in appearance than in reality. The main things sought are, I have no doubt, the observance of certain prison rules—to prevent improper things passing from hand to hand, check evil talk, and generally to guard the interests of justice. I think you must do just as you have done with her; and if you checked, you can but take heed of the precise error, and go on again. Your presence, you may depend on it, will trouble herself little, knowing who you are."

Clarissa's eyes were drawn away by the light that entered through an open door behind Phillis's place, and that literally dazzled by the pathetic beauty of the disfigured head that appeared, and which, the instant it caught sight of Clarissa, began to work over again all the former pangs of shame at the loss of the hair. An exclamation, as if she could not help herself, but broke down her, was followed by sobs; and for a time Clarissa could see little, and hear only the kind voice of the matron, trying to make Phillis calm, and regain her composure.

"I think she's better now," said the matron, after a little while, advancing, and speaking through the wire.

"Phillis," murmured Clarissa, in tones that seemed literally to plead to the unhappy woman to have faith, and take comfort, and recognize a sister.

"You, miss," was heard at last.

Clarissa saw the matron had moved as far away as she well could, and she reminded herself of Anthony, and his possibility as she might never again be able to influence this woman, and then she felt suddenly her fears and timidity die out, and her own faith and courage return.

"Phillis, I come to you as a friend."

"God help me! I want friends."

"Are you friendless?"

"I'm no longer mad."

"Would you like to get away—"

The matron interposed. But Clarissa said, with a smile:

"Oh, no, my dear madam; I am no prisonbreaker, Phillis, I say, can and you will see my aim is a very innocent——"

"And perfectly legal one," observed the clerk, in a low tone.

"And perfectly legal one," repeated Clarissa, "as a very respectable gentleman and lawyer, who is with me, assures me."

The matron was silent, and drew back, but evidently in a watchful attitude.

"Phillis, Mr. Sleuth does not prosecute you, is there any one else that can?"

"No," said Phillis, sharply, for she had, at that moment, caught, amid a fresh beam of light, a glimpse of Clarissa's face and hair, and she thought of Sleuth, and his admiration for this beauty, and it seemed to her that she remembered the sweetness and kindness of the tones and words addressed to her.

"And if you were set free, do you think you could throw any light on the charge brought against Mr. Anthony——"

"What?" almost shrieked Phillis. "What charge are you talking of?"

"His arrest for murder."

"Murder! Murder! Is it you who are mad, or my wits again failing me? Murder of whom?"

"Of Mr. Alderman Maude," said Clarissa.

"Merciful—merciful—merciful heaven!" Phillis murmured slowly, with hands pressed against her temples, and her eyes raised heavenward.

"You think him innocent, Phillis, do you not?"

There was no answer, only low and inexplicable murmurs of sentences, out of which even the matron could make nothing.

"You think him innocent, don't you?" repeated Clarissa, while she listened, as if a single word in answer might clear up the horrible mystery.

"I know he is. I—I—— What did I say? I think he's going as it went before. Sweet Lady, I mustn't let it do that. No, no. I can tell you nothing. Murder! I am very sorry both, for you and him."

"Then, even if I could move the authorities to release you, you cannot hold out to me any hope of helping to clear up this dreadful mystery?"

Noticing there was no immediate answer to this, the clerk whispered, so that no one but Clarissa could hear:

"Move as if to go away."

"Phillis, I came here, I repeat, as to a friend; but if you wish to be friendless——"

"Oh!" moaned the miserable woman behind the screen.

Clarissa yearned to tear down that screen, to clasp her, warm her with the glow of love, and then appeal to her; but she saw her duty, and shut up, or to speak, her feelings.

"You know my father, Phillis, is a magistrate, and I thought he might have spoken to Mr. Sleuth, but he would not listen to me on any point unless I can go to my father and say, 'If this unhappy girl be forgiven and released, she will be able to render me valuable aid as regards Mr. Maude.' But it is not so. Farewell, then."

Clarissa waited, but there was no appeal to her to stop.

"I'm going, then, Phillis," she moved a few yards as she spoke. "You'll wish me good-by?"

No; Phillis would not part at silence.

The door was reached. Then, and then only, was there a piercing cry of misery raised that compelled Clarissa to turn and wonder.

"I think," said the compassionate matron, "if you'll give her time, she'll speak to you."

No, no, Clarissa knew, as if uttered under the breath.

Yes, you will. Now I understand the lady's object; I am sure to you that, if she can obtain your release, by stating truthfully that you can give information——"

"Ay, truthfully!" echoed Phillis, in a hard, strange tone of voice.

"God knows, Phillis, you shall never say a word untruthfully at my instigation."

"May I ask you a question?" said Phillis, suddenly, in a tone so peculiar, so intensely quiet in the surface, so full of concentrated agony below, that all listened in wonder.

"Yes."

"Does he—not Mr. Maude; I don't mean him—does he love you?"

Clarissa felt, in an instant, the full force of the query and its immense significance. She had only to say, "Yes, he says so," to know that the woman before her, on whose action hung all, would probably leave the door flung all caution to the wind, and become her very slave, through the thirst for vengeance.

But, after the emotion in Clarissa's face, and guessed the truth; but, with exemplary taste and judgment, said not a word.

Clarissa now could have conceived of a more cruel position. Was it not possible Phillis might even become untruthful, and try, in her thirst for vengeance, to make out the truth, but to ruin Sleuth, and so only to save Anthony?

"You won't answer that?" said Phillis, with an air of malignity.

"I will, so far as I can. I do not love him."

"Yes, yes; I understand. Quick! What do you want of me?"

"Stay, Phillis. Let your kind friend there, the matron, hear me now assure you that it is truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, that is asked from you. Therefore, let no secret feeling move you to speak falsely to me——"

"You waste precious time. There is no need to fear you can blacken him. I can speak! I will!"

"About the light coat?" murmured Clarissa, almost breathless with the agitation of her thought; she was afraid to speak.

"Ay, and more."

"Do you solemnly say that to me now, after my warning to you, and in the presence of these persons, in the presence of your own aroused sense and conscience, in the presence of God?"

"I do say so."

"Enough. Calm yourself, Phillis, dear. Trust to me, not only now, but hereafter."

"Hereafter!" said Phillis.

Laughter and cries of infensest anguish, jostling with each other, answered that unfortunate word.

"Phillis."

"Yes."

"As to Mr. Sleuth?"

"Ay, as to him."

"It is from him, perhaps, may have to come the order for your release. I don't understand these matters; but it is certain he must be persuaded you are repentant."

"Oh, tell him I am very repentant."

"Full of penitence that you have done, on recovering from your temporary aberration of mind——"

"Say I'm sorry; that'll do, I think. I am sorry be you sure of that now."

"And if it were to do over again——"

"Would do very different. Be sure you say that."

"In fine, I may say that, if you are released, you will not, under any circumstances, repeat your violence, but trust you will tell the whole truth?"

"That is all! All! God knows that is all my heart's earnest desire now."

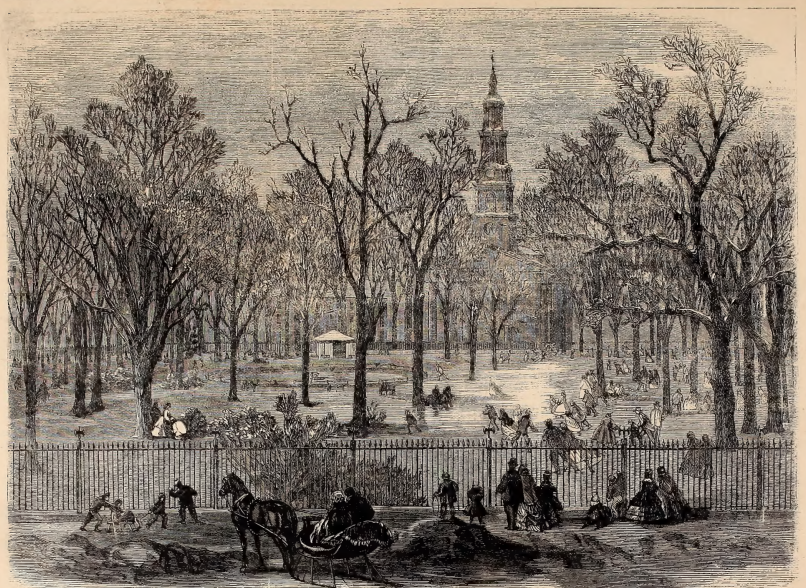
"And will you trust me? I don't think you will send me undercurrent."

Phillis's heart smote her. All the fierce passions that had been raging during the last few minutes, below the forced outward demeanor of calm, appeared, under Clarissa's last slight and last sound, in that prison, were the spectacle of the passionate-hearted woman praying for her, and almost choked with the violence of her grateful emotion.

THE HIPPOTAMUS AND ITS YOUNG.

THERE can be little doubt that the "Behemoth" of Scripture, in destinct with the animal we have named Hippotamus. In the fortieth chapter of the book of Job, Behemoth is spoken of as an animal "that lieth down in the shade of the trees, in the covert of the reeds and fens;" "whose bones are as tubes of iron;" "He eateth grass like an ox;" "He shady trees cover him with their shadows, the willows of the brook compass him about;" "Behold, he drinketh up a river, he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth."

Although the researches of geologists have put it beyond doubt that, at a remote period of the world's history, the hippotamus was common in Europe and Asia, it is now found only in Africa, and there not universally; with the exception of the Nile, none of the great rivers that fall into the Mediterranean producing it. He is a shy brute, and retreats rapidly before civilization; though he is found in the large and solitary rivers and lakes, running from the confines of the Cape Colony to about the twenty-third degree of north latitude, that hippotamus is found at home and at his ease.



And no beast of the field can boast of a home so vastly grand and luxuriant. The great silent lake spread out on every side, with fairy islands dotting between—islands covered with trees of the largest growth, and with dense vermillion, and some the color of flame. Fancy coming and passing the night in such a retreat! Savage scenes lake some at one's time, and the effect was not lost on that observant traveler. He says: "We were close to the reeds, and could listen to the various sounds which we often heard there. By day I had seen waterspouts cutting up their heads and swimming about, and at night the voices of others with all their little snores all over the plains, in search of the fatten among the tall grass. Large flocks of crowned crane birds, too, jerked and wriggled amongst these reedy masses, and we heard human-like voices, and unearthly sounds, which, in the jungle, pah, as if one were going on in their uncouth haunts."

Hippotamuses commonly found in families of from ten to thirty. Cramming once had a prime opportunity of observing the discovery of these animals on the banks of the Limpopo. "Presently, in a broad and sleigh-shaded part of the river, we heard the snorts and blowing, and on approaching somewhat nearer, the whole family of hippotamuses, about a dozen, in a semi-promontory of the island, stood about thirty cows and calves. They were in great opposition, and before them, stood about twenty more sea-cows, with their heads out of the water, and their ears flying, their forfurs down the river, again showing out their heads, were about a dozen more bulls, which I knew were all bulls and about a hundred yards below these, in the direction of the island, stood another herd of cows and cow with calves, and two large bulls. The sea-cows were large, long-bodied, low-legs, and as black as the mire, have not the least objection to their neighbors galloping their heads on their necks and tails."

They always choose a convenient landing-place, one where the bank slopes long and very gently, and that they use till they have eaten up all the provender which is due in that locality. They remain ashore, they, when for an hour, and sometimes two hours, near the landing, remaining about themselves, and listening for danger. The slightest token of the hunter's presence, on such occasions, is sufficient to drive away the herd. If danger appears, they begin to wander ashore in two and threes. Mr. Cumming, when Dr. Livingstone's Essential Africa, he observed a peculiarity of this brute before leaving the water. When wallowing, and that for a great many times, the movements of the hippotamus are so unwieldly, and so much like those of a ship, which give its mouth so savage an appearance, are developed that he took up the long-range gun, on which these animals feed in great part. Often I have seen one descend to the bottom, remain there a minute, and re-appear with its tusks strong with grass, which they then balance on their nose.

It has been asserted of the hippopotamus, that he is even more dangerous than the pig, but experts in modern and trust-worthy explores decidedly negative this assertion. The reader may please himself about panning his faith to that great marvel-monger, Pliny, who tells us that the long cunning and sagacity of this beast is so great, that he will walk backward in order to mislead his enemy." The hippopotamus certainly, in these go-a-head times, is too enlightened to indulge in this trifling, and scrap-preventive, at least he has not been observed at the trick latterly. They are however, wonderfully keen in scenting danger, and will pause at the brink of the most naturally covered pit, for fear of treading on the weak crust. In fact, if it be a man discovered in their regular paths, is enough to rouse the suspicion of all the animals in the vicinity of the neighborhood, and taking their young ones on their broad backs, they will migrate—several miles sometimes—to safer quarters. Nor will it in a hurry return to a pool that has once been approached by the human enemy, man. "When once a hippotamus has been surprised in his watery dwelling," says Mr. Samuel Smith, "it will rarely be guilty of the same indiscretion a second time; and although the animal may again be approached by hunters till after a long period has elapsed, the latter survey such opportunities to perform the movements necessary for its respiration with the greatest caution, which nearly equals that of a bear, and has not forgotten the misfortunes to which an opposite course had exposed it."

A COW THAT HELPED TO CONQUER THE REBELLION.—The New Albany (Ind.) Ledger gives the following: "At the industrial fair at Jeffersonville, Indiana, now, decorated with blue and red ribbons, was the observed of all observers. She was purchased by the rebels by Sherman's army near Corinth, Miss., in the early part of 1862, and has since been with the army in its marches, countermarches, raids and expeditions from that time up to the final abandonment of the army at Washington. She is the property of Gen. Clark, of New York, who, expecting to go on duty at New Orleans, had this cow sent westward with a view to taking her on the new field of duty. But the general being ordered back to New York, the cow will be sent thither and placed in his Central Park. This cow, during all her journeyings through Mississippi, Tennessee, Georgia, South and North Carolina, and Virginia—a period of three years—has never ceased to give milk, averaging the a gallon a day, which she still gives. She is certainly a noble animal, and wears her ribbons great-fully."

CITY AMUSEMENTS—SKATING AT ST. JOHN'S PARK, HUDSON STREET.

SKATING AT ST. JOHN'S PARK.

ALL New York has been running mad over skating at the Central Park, skating at Hoboken, skating at Brooklyn, and half a hundred other places; but how many of our skating citizens or citizenesses know that in our very midst we have had ice and skating rivaling Central Park, and far surpassing many of the ponds we go miles to find?

When the late cold snap came, the keeper of St. John's Park—we don't know whether he is a Yankee or not—in Hudson street, just below Canal, and in the very heart of the city, having obtained permission from the trustees, who, no doubt, thought physical as well as mental exercise good for the soul, had the whole Park flooded with water, and in forty-eight hours had a skating pond, comprising several acres in extent, of capital ice. To this pond he admitted the general public, for the ridiculously small sum of ten cents, legal stamps, for unlimited enjoyment; and we are happy to say his enterprise was properly appreciated, for on the glassy surface some hundreds continually disported, while in the old man's pocket a variety of small currency did the same, adding something to his not over princely income, and, without doubt, contributing as much to his enjoyment as he has to that of the lads and lasses of that locality.

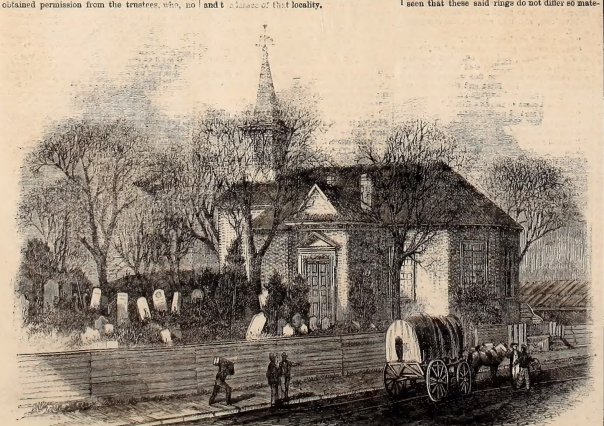
THE MODERN NOSE-RINGS OF Nubian and Egyptian Women.

ONE of the most interesting books that has found its way from the London press for a long time, is "Up the Nile and Home Again," by F. W. Fairholt, F. S. A.

Mr. Fairholt has started out, not only with the vein and vigor for travel that allows him to tell his story pleasantly, but with the education to follow out his sittings. From his book we take a little gossip about nose-rings, with the engravings representing those worn by the belles of that vicinity in this day. On examination, it will be seen that these said rings do not differ so materially from the ear-rings now fashionable among our own dainty fair ones; and who can tell but in some not far distant day, Fifth Avenuedom may adopt the nose-ring? Now for Mr. Fairholt and the Nubian ladies of Edfou.

In their noses is invariably placed a ring, generally of copper, sometimes of gold; to which are appended small metal ornaments of red earthen beads. Two specimens of these rings are here given; it will be noted that they are never hung, as most Europeans imagine, from the centre cartilage of the nose, but always through the right nostril. Miss Martineau, who should be, as a lady, a more competent authority than myself on the subject of becoming female costume and its accessories, is inclined to look more favorably on this fashion (remembering the taste of the European ladies for heavy ear-rings) than most others have done and argues, not without reason, that if the flesh of the fair sex be ever rudely punctured, to hang therefrom any extraneous ornament, there is really little difference between the ear and the nose, except as custom reconciles the practice.

NUBIAN EAR-RINGS.



NUBIAN NOSE-RINGS.

The ear-rings worn by the ordinary classes are large and peculiar; they are very cheap—about the rate of four-pence per pair. They are made of plates of gilt copper, struck up in a die, with a few ornamental protuberances, and having a row of smaller pendents attached to the lower part. This love for pendents is universal, and indulged whenever there is a chance of doing it. Rods as these things are, the boldness of their design gives them an exceedingly good effect, the dark skins of the wearers acting as an excellent foil, and the general poverty of their attire lending a sort of idea of value even to articles of such rough workmanship as these. Between the ear-rings is placed a finger-ring of the value of one half-penny; it is cast in pewter, the central jewel being a bit of glass, colored beneath with a tint of yellow, upon which some red spots are dashed. The necklaces are generally earthen beads, sometimes glass, of various tints; the bracelets and anklets simple bands of copper; the girls having attached to their ankl w of small bells, which ring

NUBIAN NOSE RING.

A RELIC OF THE OLDEN TIME—THE OLD SWEDES' CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA—SEE PAGE 375.

CAPT. JUAN WILLIAMS REBOLLADO.

as they run; small pebbles and fragments of stone are placed in them to give the due sound. At Kahlaba I obtained a very good example of a nose-ring. It is as flexible as pewter, and decorated with small indentations: from the same wearer was obtained the larger ear-ring, (both being represented to a scale of one-half the size of the originals); it is of silver, decorated with reeded open-worked ornament at one end, which terminates with a red bead. It is too heavy to hang to the ear, so the lobe of it was inserted in the aperture, and the ring kept in place by a thin strap of leather, which passed over the head, another ring in the centre giving a means of securing it there. The woman from whom they were obtained, when with difficulty persuaded to part with them, had to secure the approbation of her heirs-at-law, who had reversionary interest in them (for they pass from mother to daughter, or next relative, and are consequently sometimes of ancient workmanship); and a large group of them assembled to witness the sale, and take a share of the proceeds.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON'S BIRTH-PLACE.

WOOLSTHORPE Manor House, the birthplace of Sir Isaac Newton, is situated in a little valley in the parish of Colsterworth, near Grantham, in Lincolnshire, at the distance of about 103 miles from London. The building itself presents nothing to attract notice, but as the house in which one of the best men and one of the greatest philosophers of modern times first saw the light, it will be viewed with affectionate reverence by all who esteem high genius and true nobleness of heart.

MOSSEL MEIS IN FRANCE.

The Newtons appear to have located themselves at Woolsthorpe as early as the year 1651, having come thither from Westby, in Lincolnshire.

Sir Isaac Newton was born on Christmas Day, 1642, O. S., nearly three months after the death of his father. He was an extremely weakly child, and for some time it was thought he would not live; he is also said to have been so small for many days after his birth "that he might have been put into a quart pot." He did, however, at last spring up, and as he grew, gradually mastered the natural weakness of his constitution.

He used to relate that he was always very negligent at school, and very low in his class, until he happened to be insulted one day by a boy above him, when he determined to be revenged, not only by giving his superior a sound thrashing (which was promptly administered on the spot), but by the more noble method of superseding him in his studies. This determination gave a new bent to his character, and from that day he continued rising in the school till he was head boy. When he left the Grantham school, it was determined by his mother, after great deliberation, and at the earnest solicitation of his uncle, who had observed indications of his great genius, to send him to Cambridge, whither he repaired in 1660, being admitted to Trinity College on June 5 in that year. Here he remained several years, applying himself closely to the acquisition of the more abstruse branches of knowledge, to the dissemination of which, means are appropriated in that university. The fruits of his studies were not made public until a very late period, and even then, only at the persuasion of his friends, and against his own well-known desire. Yet it is remarkable that nearly all the theories and opinions which have ranked his name first among modern philosophers, were conceived, and the demonstration of them considerably advanced, while he was yet a young man.

In 1665 he left Cambridge for a short time, in consequence of the plague, which in that year committed such ravages in all the great towns and cities throughout Europe, and retired to his house at Woolsthorpe (having inherited it in 1663 from his mother), where he passed the autumn of that year.

It was on this occasion, and while sitting in the garden, that the falling of an apple from a tree led to that train of thought which ultimately produced his beautiful theory of gravitation.

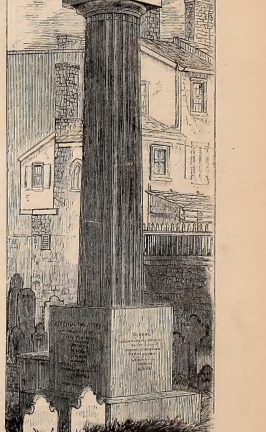
"Sir Isaac lived in London ever since the year 1696, when he was made warden of the mint; nobody ever lived with him but my wife (his niece), who was with him nearly twenty years before and after her marriage. He always lived in a very handsome, generous manner, though without ostentation or vanity; he was always hospitable, and upon proper occasions gave splendid entertainments."

When he first came to London he lived in Jermyn street, but he afterward removed to a house in St. Martin's street, Leicester square, where he built an observatory, which still exists in its original state. Here he continued to reside till within a short period of his death, when he retired to Kensington, at which place he died March 20, 1727, in the 85th year of his age.

In person Sir Isaac Newton was of middle stature, rather inclining to corpulency in his latter years. He had a benignant expression of countenance, to the effect of which his hair, white as silver, greatly contributed. He was blessed with a strong constitution, and to his last illness had the bloom of health mantling in his cheeks.

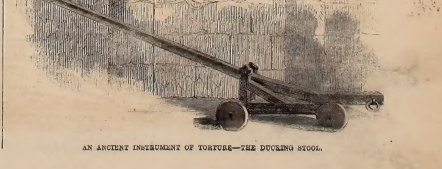
SCENES IN AFRICA—HIPPOPOTAMUS SWIMMING A RIVER WITH ITS YOUNG.

CAPTAIN JUAN WILLMS REBOLLADO.



THE gallant capture of the Spanish war vessel Covadonga, by the Chilian frigate Esmeralda, has shown Spain that she cannot trifle with even the smallest of the South American republics. That success is the presage of greater success in the future, now that Peru has joined her fleet to that of Chile. The Esmeralda was commanded by Capt. Juan Williams Rebollado, who was born in Ancud, capital of the province and island of Chiloe, in the year 1830. His father was an English officer of Marines, John Williams, who entered the Chilian service, and was for some time commandant of the port of Ancud. Young Williams may be said to have been born and reared on the sea, as are most of the inhabitants of the archipelago. In 1848 he entered the Chilian navy, serving through every grade up to the rank of captain. He was put in command of the Esmeralda on the appearance of the Spanish squadron on the coast, and succeeded not only in evading their attack with superior strength, but, through enterprise and vigor, was able to inflict on it a severe and humiliating blow. In the contest thus begun, we may expect that Capt. Williams will play an important part, and that the Spanish squadron will never return to Spain.

THE DUCKING STOOL.



IN these days of reverence for women, it can hardly be realized that in "the good old times" instruments were invented for their torture, and that not only men allowed them to labor under all their natural disadvantages, but added to them in every way by persecution, especially if she happened to be old and ugly.

It was not alone in England that the ducking-stool was used, but in this land of the free and the home of the brave, the vile instrument was made a medium to extort confession, when the object seized upon was to be convicted as a witch, a scold, or any of the numerous obsolete crimes it was fashionable at that day to fasten on the weaker sex.

The manner of its use was to seat the woman in the chair, binding her fast, of course, and by wheeling the cumbrous carriage to the edge of the river or pond, hold her suspended over the water. At a signal, the lever upon the front of the machine was raised, and the poor victim was soused into the element below. Sometimes—as in the shower-bath punishment in prisons—this would produce death; but as in the case of the minister, who, in baptizing, allowed the convert to slip out of his hands and drown, there was nothing to do but hand along another.

THE TOMB OF STEPHEN DECATUR.

AN ANCIENT INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE—THE DUCKING STOOL.

The last instance positively known of the use of the ducking-stool was in 1754, when a woman was ducked at Kingston, England for being a common scold. The sentence was carried into effect in the Thames.

TOMB OF STEPHEN DECATUR.

In St. Peter's Churchyard, Philadelphia, there rises a stern granite column, to mark the spot where lie the remains of Stephen Decatur, a man whose memory is cherished within the hearts of all his countrymen, and who needs no stone to perpetuate the services he rendered our country in its early and trying need. We feel that there can be no history of him written so well, as to give the inscriptions from the stone that marks his resting-place:

(North Side.)

STEPHEN DECATUR.
Born January 5th, 1779.
Entered the Navy of the United States as Midshipman,
April 30th, 1799.
Made Captain
For Distinguished Merit,
Passing over the rank of Commander,
February 16th, 1804.
Died
March 22d, 1820.

(West Side.)

A Name
Brilliant from a Series of Heroic Deeds
on the coast of Barbary, and Illustrious by achievements against more Disciplined Enemies:
The Pride of our Navy.
The Glory of the Republic.

(South Side.)

The Gallant Officer, whose prompt and active valor,
always on the watch,
was guided by a wisdom
and supported by a firmness
Which never tired!
Whose exploits in arms
Reflected
the Daring fictions of Romance and Chivalry.

(East Side.)

Devoted to his country
by a Patriot Father,
he cherished in his heart,
and sustained by his Intrepid Actions,
the inspiring sentiment,
"Our Country! Right or Wrong."
A nation
gave him, in return,
its applause and gratitude.

BOY LOST.

Edwin W. Roome left his home, at No. 10 Cherry street, Boston, on the 24th of June, 1864, almost two years since, and his mother writes to us, sending the photograph of him, which is accurately engraved on the last page of this paper, asking help from all the world to find her boy.

Edwin was 12 years of age on the 14th of the same month he went away in. He wore away a navy blue cloth pants, coat, and vest, light-colored straw hat, had light straight hair, large blue eyes, round, full face, small-featured, with a scar on the right side of chin, caused by the kick of a horse. He was four feet eight inches high, weighed sixty-five pounds. He was of a very quick, smart turn in his ways. Information can be sent to his mother, as above, or to this office.

THE MUSSEL NETS OF FRANCE.

In this country we have become familiar with piscis-culture, or the breeding of fish, and are advancing so bravely in it, that the New York market is beginning to be supplied with trout cultivated in its vicinity; but so far, we have not known much about the culture of oysters, and less of that of mussels, the last-mentioned not being esteemed a delicacy in American markets, while in France it is not only so esteemed, but is cultivated, and many contrivances used for improving and taking them.

Mussel-culture has been carried on with immense success on a certain part of the coast of France, for a period of no less than seven centuries! So long ago as the year of grace 1135, an Irish bark was wrecked in the Bay of Aiguillon. The cargo and one of the crew were saved by the humanity of the fishermen inhabiting the coast. The name of the one man who was thus saved from shipwreck, was Walton, and he gave to the people, in gratitude for saving his life, the germ of a marvelous fish-breeding idea. He invented artificial mussel-culture. The net, or bag-trap, which he employed in catching the night-birds which floated on the water, was fixed in the mud by means of tolerably strong supports, and he soon found out that the parts of his net which were sunk in the water, had intercepted large quantities of mussel-spat, which in time grew into the finest possible mussels, larger in size and finer in quality than those grown upon the neighboring mud. From less to more, this simple discovery progressed into a regular industry, which at present forms almost the sole occupation of the inhabitants of the neighboring shores. The apparatus for the growth of the mussel, with which the bay is now almost covered, is called a bouchot, and is of very simple construction. A number of strong piles or stakes, each twelve feet in length, and six inches in diameter, are driven into the mud to the depth of six feet, at a distance of about two feet from each other, and are ranged in two converging rows, so as to form a V, the sharp point of which is always turned toward the sea, that the stakes may offer the least possible resistance to the waves. These two rows form the frame-work of the bouchot. Strong branches of trees are then twisted and interwoven into the upper part of the stakes, which are six feet in height, until the whole length of the row is, by this species of basket-work on a large scale, formed into a strong fence or palisade. A space of a few inches is left between the bottom of the fence and the surface of the mud, to allow the water to pass freely between the stakes when the tide ebbs and flows. The sides of the bouchot are from 200 to 250 metres long, and each bouchot, therefore, forms a fence of about 450 metres, six feet high. There are now some 500 of these bouchots, or breeding-grounds, in the Bay of Aiguillon, making a fence of 225,000 metres, extending over a space of eight kilometres, or five miles, from the point of St. Clemens to the mouth of the river of Marans.

The various operations of mussel-cultivation are designated by agricultural terms—such as sowing, planting, transplanting, etc. Toward the end of April, the seed (semence), fixed during February and March to the stakes of the bouchot du bas, is about the size of a grain of flax, and is then called naissain. By the month of July it attains the size of a bean, and is called renouvelain, and is then ready for transplantation to a less favorable state of existence upon the bouchot batard, where the action of the tide would probably have retarded its growth if transplanted earlier. In the month of July, then, the boucholeurs direct their canoes toward the isolated stakes, bearing the semence, now developed into the renouvelain, which they detach by means of a hook fixed to the end of a pole. Care is taken to gather such a quantity as they are able to transplant during low water—the only time when this operation can be carried on. The semence, placed in baskets, is transported by means of the canoe to the fences of the bouchot batard. The operation of fixing the renouvelain upon the palisades of the bouchot batard is called la batrisse. The semence, enclosed in bags of old net, is placed in all the empty spaces along the palisades, until the hurdles are quite covered, sufficient space being left between the bags to admit of the growth of the young mussels. The bags soon rot and fall to pieces, leaving the young mussels adhering to the sides of the bouchot. The mussels by-and-by attain a large size, and grow so close to each other that the whole fence looks like a wall blackened by fire. They are then ready for gathering, and are thinned out by the owner, pretty much the same as fruit is gathered by the farmer.

FACTS AND FIGURES RELATING TO NEW YORK CITY.

The following are some interesting facts about New York furnished by the City Mission:

Until we have the official returns of the State census lately taken, we must rely on the United States census of 1860 to furnish the number of the people of New York, which was at that date 813,668. Of the population of the city in 1860, 429,952 were born in the United States, and 285,717 were born in foreign countries, of 42 different nationalities. The number of marriages in the city in a year is 3,272. The number of births in the city during the year is 6,434. The number of deaths in the city during a year is 26,196. There are 54,388 dwelling-houses in the city. There are 155,707 families living in the city. There are nearly three families on an average in every dwelling. There are nearly 15 persons on an average to every dwelling. There are 15,000 tenant-houses, containing 486,000 persons. The city taxes are $18,000,000 a year. The money spent in public amusements is $7,000,000 a year. For the support of the Police $2,000,000 a year is required. 17,000 immigrants per month land at Castle Garden. There are 350 churches, chapels and missions of all kinds with accommodations for 300,000 persons. There are 275 Protestant places of worship, with accommodation for 200,000 persons. There are 216 regularly organized Protestant churches, with an average membership of 300, which would give a total of 64,800 communicants. There are 350 Sabbath schools, of all denominations, with an attendance of 87,000 pupils. There are 280 Protestant Sabbath schools, with an attendance of 70,000 pupils. The number of children in the city between the ages of 5 and 15 years is 146,460. In the schools, under the care of the Board of Education, there is an average attendance of 84,973. In parochial schools, industrial schools, private schools, colleges, &c., there must be 20,000 more. In the public schools and private schools, &c., there are probably 104,973 regularly in attendance. Of the 41,487 of suitable age still remaining unaccounted for, we may estimate that 25 per cent are detained at home by sickness and poverty; 25 per cent are at work, and the balance are found among the vagrants, beggars, pilferers, and rowdies. Twenty-four per cent of the population are between the ages of 20 and 30 years. Taking the census of 1860 still as our basis, 24 per cent of 816,669 yields us 195,260; the sexes being nearly equally divided, this proportion would give us, say 97,500 young men. It is probable there are as many as 10,000 places where intoxicating liquors are sold. Suppose the receipts of these upon an average to be only $500 each, and we shall have $5,000,000 as the gross amount expended in that direction. There are hidden works of darkness that elude all scrutiny, and yet, from police investigations and medical testimony, we can make some calculations of the numbers of those who are leading a life of shame. It will be safe to say that there are 7,500 prostitutes, and 2,500 other women who visit houses of assignation, &c., making a total of 10,000. The value of the real and personal property invested in the business cannot be short of $5,000,000. And the amount of money spent in houses of ill-fame, and the amounts required for the expenses of criminal and humane institutions growing out of the terrible evil, must make a total of $5,000,000 more. The average duration of life after entering on a life of prostitution is four years; so that more than 1,880 of these miserable women die every year.

EFFECTS OF NON-RECIPROCITY.

The Toronto British Whig publishes the following humorous account of the probable effect of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty between Canada and the United States:

"It is all up with us, ladies and gentlemen. Our days are numbered, our doom is sealed. On the 17th day of March next, the Reciprocity Treaty ceases, and the sun of American prosperity shines no more on our benighted Canada. No more shall American greenbacks provide us with the necessaries of life; no more shall the American Eagle take us under the shadow of his protecting wing. The United States Senate has spoken, and Canada's place on the map is henceforth to be a blank. On the 17th day of March, vegetation ceases north of the St. Lawrence. Grain will refuse to sprout, and potatoes and turnips will turn into stones. The water will dry up in the streams, and non-reciprocity, like a plague, will attack the cattle, killing them off by thousands. The wells of Bothwell and Enniskillen will stop their flow of oil so completely that not even a sheriff's writ could find an indication, and the Tecumseh will be turned into a poor-house for the reception of destitute oil speculators and their families.

"Steamboats shall ply no longer on our waters, and the rails of the Grand Trunk and Great Western roads will be sold for old iron, to help to pay the war debt of the United States. The trees shall all disappear from the face of the country, and Senator Sumner will be found on the last stump, with a copy of the act annulling Reciprocity in his hand, advocating the Monroe doctrine, and explaining the beauties of non-intercourse, and a high tariff. Starvation will stalk through the land from Sandwich to Gaspe. The inhabitants will dwindle to skeletons, and so emaciated will they become, that not even Bryant's Pulmonic Wafers, Canadian Painkiller, nor Dr. Potts can restore their lost animation.

"There will be no property-holders, no voters; the vexed question of representation by population will be set at rest, and the Hon. George Brown will retire into private life. There will be no more weddings, no whisky cocktails, no old maids, no cigars, no bribery at elections, no Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup, no babies, no lawyers, no young ladies promenading the streets, no washing days, no 24th of May [except the 4th of July], no sun, no moon, no anything else. The cities of London, Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, &c, will crumble to pieces, and Phineas T. Barnum will be found among the ruins picking up the bones of the inhabitants as relics for his museum. Canada will be a wilderness to be avoided by travelers, as they would the Sahara, and future explorers will look in vain for any traces of past civilization. Angry mothers will quiet squalling babes with the threat of sending them to Canada, and political offenders in the United States will be sentenced to banishment to this desolate region, as a punishment worse than death. Let us be prepared, then; let us expect our fate with becoming resignation, and show Andy Johnson, and Seward, and the rest of them, that Britons may be starved, but they never, never, never shall be slaves!"

Why is President Johnson like Chimborazo? Because he is the greatest of all the Andies

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

Sir James Macintosh invited Dr. Parr to take a drive in his gig. The horse became restive. "Gently, Jimmy," said the doctor; "don't irritate him; always soothe your horse, Jimmy. You'll do better without me. Let me down, Jimmy." Once on terra firma, the doctor's view of the case was changed. "Now, Jimmy, touch him up; never let a horse get the better of you. Touch him up, conquer him, don't spare him; I'll walk back."

A New Jersey paper tells a story of a well-known character, who frequently figured on juries in New York. When on a jury, as soon as they had retired to their room to deliberate, he would button up his coat and "turn in" on a bench, exclaiming: "Gentlemen, I'm for bringing in a verdict for the plaintiff (or the defendent, as he had settled in his mind), and all creation can't move me. Therefore, as soon as you have all agreed with me, wake me up, and we'll go in!"

The finest idea of a thunder-storm was when Wiggins came home tight. Now Wiggins is a teacher, and had drank too much lemonade or something. He came into the room among his wife and daughters, and just then he tumbled over the cradle, and fell whop on the floor. After a while he rose, and said:

"Wife, are you hurt?"

"No."

"Daughters, are you hurt?"

"No."

"Terrible clap, wasn't it?"

The writer of Punch's "Table-Talk" says: "I knew a young lady who said she didn't like turtle soup. Affectionately rebuking her, I was answered, piteously, that she didn't much object to the taste, but that she thought it so cruel and wicked to kill turtle-doves."

A temperance lecturer, descanting on the essential and purifying qualities of cold water, remarked as a knock-down argument:

"When the world had become so corrupt that the Lord could do nothing with it, he was obliged to give it a thorough sousing in cold water."

"Yes," replied the toper, "but it killed every darned critter on the face of the earth."

A son of Neptune, who was in the habit of quarreling with his better half, was one day remonstrated with by the minister of the parish, who told him he and his wife ought to live on more amicable terms, as they were both one.

"One!" said the old salt, shifting his quid; "if you should come by the house sometimes, blast my tarry top-lights, if you wouldn't think we were about twenty."

A drunken French soldier, quarreling with his corporal, ended by saying:

"Hold your tongue, you are not a man."

"I will prove the contrary," returned the corporal, getting angry.

"Never," replied the soldier, "you cannot. What does the major say when he orders out the guard at parade? Doesn't he always say, 'four men and a corporal?' That shows that a corporal is not a man."

"Bill Dad, the Scribe," of the Golden Era, lately visited a school in San Francisco, and made a speech about as sensible as half that are made on like occasion. He said: "Young Ladies and Gentlemen—You are gathered here for the purpose of obtaining an education. Education consists in being educated to respect education, and learning, and education. Education teaches us that education comprises all things learned from education. Educate yourselves, and when you have a good education, you will bless the day that you learned a good education."

Miss Fawcett, the English actress, was one evening dressing for a part, when a boy attached to the theatre knocked at the door.

"Please, miss, there's a woman at the back, who says she wants two orders to see the play."

"What is her name? Go and ask her. I promised no orders."

"I did ask her name, but she said it was no use telling it, because you didn't know her."

"Not know her? and she expects orders? Has the woman her faculties about her?"

"I think she have, ma'am, for I see her have a bundle tied up in a pocket handkerchief under her arm."

The following is a verbatim ad liberatim report of the evidence given in the Magistrates' Court, by a negro man named Doctor Jones, who accused another negro named Washington, of stealing his watch:

"I'se name Doctor Jones—name so 'cause old master named Doctor. I was settin' in de shop; my watch hanging on the wall. Dat nigger (pointing to Washington) come in, sot down, got up, went out, an de watch was dismissed. Dat's all I know about."

Rev. Robert Collyer tells a story of a Yorkshire woman—wanting to make bread—who sent her husband with a mug to the tavern to get some yeast. On his way the press-gang met him, knocked him down, then put him on board a ship, and though his fate was suspected by his wife, seven years went by without a word from the lost husband. But he lived through it, served out his time, was paid off, and started for his old home, procuring on the way a mug as near like the one lost as possible, procuring the yeast that had cost him so dear, walked into the house with it, saying:

"Here, lass, I brought thee that yeast;" and the lass said, "I knew thee would bring it, John, if ever thee came back alive."

Here are some samples of the Jokes of Merry England in the yere of our Lorde," a MCCCCC. and XI:

"How many calves tayles, asks Demaundes Joyous, behoueth to reche from the erthe to the skye? R.—No more but one, an' it be long ynough. D.—Why dothe an oxe or a cowe lye? R.—Because she cannot sytte. D.—What people be they that loue not in no wyse to be prayed for? R.—They be beggars and poore people, whan men say "God helpe them," when theye aske almes. D.—What space is from ye hyest space of the see to the depest? R.—But a stones cast. D.—Whiche be the moost profytable sayntes in the chyrche? R.—They that stande in ye glass wyndowes; for they kepe out the wynde from wastynge of the lyght. D.—What is it that freseth never? R.—That is hote water. D.—Why dooth a dogge tourne hym thryes aboute or that he lyeth hym downe? R.—Because he knoweth not his beddes head from the fete."

Why is a petroleum speculator like the Secretary of the Navy? Because he is giddy on wells.

"Pray, sir," said a judge angrily, to a blunt old Quaker from whom no direct answer could be obtained, "do you know what we sit here for?"

"Yes, verily, I do," said the Quaker; "three of you for four dollars each day, and the fat one in the middle for four thousand a year."

Arabian Laughing Plant.—In Palgrave's "Central and Eastern Arabia" some particulars are given in regard to a curious narcotic plant. Its seeds, in which the active principle seems chiefly to reside, when pounded and administered in a small dose, produce effects much like those ascribed to Sir Humphrey Davy's laughing-gas; the patient dances, sings, and performs a thousand extravagances, till, after an hour of great excitement to himself and amusement to the bystanders, he falls asleep, and on awakening, has lost all memory of what he did or said while under the influence of the drug. To put a pinch of this powder into the coffee of some unsuspecting person is not an uncommon joke, nor is it said that it was ever followed by serious consequences, though an over-quantity might, perhaps, be dangerous. The author tried it on two individuals, but in proportions, if not absolutely homœopathic, still sufficiently minute to keep on the safe side, and witnessed its operation, laughable enough, but very harmless.

Notice to the Trade.

On the 1st of March will be issued the first number of an Illustrated Monthly Periodical, for the Young, entitled,

Frank Leslie's Children's Friend.

This will be the cheapest, most instructive and amusing Magazine ever published for young folks; full of interesting matter, with numerous illustrations. Although the object of the publisher is to please children exclusively, yet the publication will have sufficient general interest to amuse grown-up people. The instruction, as well as the recreation of children, will be combined in Frank Leslie's Children's Friend.

There are several admirable periodicals for youth of advanced years, but there is a real want existing: of something within the reach and capacity of younger children, which they can read and appreciate, and which shall be sufficiently cheap to be within the reach of the poorest families.

The Children's Friend will be conducted by persons whose experience in the direction and guidance of the young gives unusual advantages in adapting the contents and illustrations to their awakening intellect.

It will contain 32 pages, small quarto, price ten cents. Yearly subscription, one dollar.

This work will be indispensable to every school and household.

For sale by all Newsdealers.

Liberal arrangements made with Teachers and Clergymen taking a number of copies.

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.—G. C. Merriam & Co., of Springfield, Mass., have just published another new edition of this more than valuable work. They say it contains "over 3,000 fine engravings; 10,000 words and meanings not found in other dictionaries; over 30 able American and European scholars were employed upon this revision, and 30 years of labor expended upon it. Among the collaborators are Dr. Mahn, of Berlin; Professors Porter, Dana, Whitney, Hadley, Lyman, Gilman and Thacher; Capt. Craighill, of West Point Military Academy; Judge J. C. Perkins, Professor Stiles, A. L. Holley, Esq., etc., etc. Several tables of great value, one of them of 50 quarto pages, explanatory and pronouncing of names in fiction, of persons and places, pseudonyms, etc., etc., as Abaddon, Acadia, Albany Regency, Mother Cary, Mason and Dixon's Line, Mr. Micawber, etc. Containing one-fifth or one-fourth more matter than any former editions. From new electrotype plates and the 'Riverside Press.'" And as we find, on examination, that all they say is correct, we can only feel that we are doing the public a great benefit by calling their attention to it. There is no work in the English language of its kind to bear comparison, and none so essentially necessary to every person.

Executions among the Jews.—The Hebrews had no executioner. When a man was guilty of homicide, the execution devolved on the next of kin, by the right of blood-revenge; in other cases, criminals were stoned by the people, the witnesses setting the example; and when the king or chief ordered a person to be put to death, the office was performed by the person to whom the order was given, and this was generally a person whose consideration in life bore some proportion to that of the person to be slain. Thus Solomon gave the commission to kill Joab, the commander-in-chief, to Benaiah, a person of so much distinction, as to be himself immediately promoted to the command which the death of Joab left vacant. In fact, the office, even of a regular executioner, is not by any means dishonorable in the East. The post of chief executioner is, in most Oriental courts, one of honor and distinction. Thus, when there was no regular executioner, it came to be considered a post of honor to put a distinguished person to death; and, on the other hand, the death itself was honorable in proportion to the rank of the person by whom the blow was inflicted. It was the greatest dishonor to perish by the hands of a woman or a slave. We see this feeling distinctly in the narrative where the two princes much prefer to die by Gideon's own hand than that of a youth who had obtained no personal distinction. As to the hero commissioning his son to perform this office, it was, perhaps, partly to honor him with the distinction of having slain two chief enemies of Israel, as well as because the rules of blood-revenge made it necessary that the execution of those who had slain his own brethren should either be performed by himself or a member of his own family. It seems very probable, from all that transpired, that Oreb and Zeeb had slain the brethren of Gideon, after they had taken them captive, in the same way that they were themselves slain.

A Compliment to a New York Artist.—We take the following from the Missouri Republican, of Jan. 28th: "One of our citizens, who has excellent artistic taste, and feels an interest in the encouragement of merit, has, in his collection of paintings, two very elegant works by a New York artist, showing genius of a high order. The subjects are, 'The Shipwreck' and 'Drifting Ashore.' The last is a rare, bold, and masterly conception. Prominent is a tall, beetling cliff, lashed by the mad waves of ocean, which rush upon it and spend their fury among the rocky ledges of the shore. In the foreground, clinging to a portion of a wreck, is descried the form of a sailor. The artist has grandly delineated the presence of the tempest in the clouds and in the water, and with a delicacy and fidelity of coloring that equally demand wonder and admiration from the beholder. The rush of the billows, flinging up their white caps, and surging upon the rocks, is a splendid piece of painting. A more detailed and less imaginative subject is 'The Shipwreck,' but the same faithfulness of coloring is to be seen in that, as in the other. They are the work of Mr. Granville Perkins, of New York, for whom it is easy to predict a career of remarkable success, taking these as specimens of his claims to distinction as an artist."

New Trajan's Column.—A celebrated pork contractor for the Federal army presented himself a short time ago at a sculptor's atelier in Rome, and stated his intention of sending a durable memento of himself to adorn his native place in America. With an amiable candor he explained to the artist that he had begun life as a poor boy selling matches, and by lucky speculations had attained his present gigantic greatness. "Now," he continued, "I've seen a muniment in this city as suits my views to a nicety. A kinder column with little figgers runnin' up all round it, and a chap at the top."

"Trajan's column," suggests the artist.

"P'r'aps it may be; and I wish you to sculp me jes such another, a workin' out the whole o' my biograff, beginning at the bottom with a boy a-selling matches, and then keep on winding it up till it ends with me in an easy attitood at the top!"

Street Cries of Cairo.—"The lupins of Nuball are sweeter than almonds?" a blue caftain, with a sack on his back, announces. Soon after is heard the cry of a water-carrier, "May God requite it to me!" accompanied by the clatter of cups. Almost at the same moment I heard the cries, "May God grant that I easily get rid of them, oh lemons!" and "Fragrance of Paradise," with which the leader in the henna-blossom tries to induce the passers-by to purchase. "Oh, arouser of compassion, oh Lord!" a beggar grunts, and a member of the same guild, possessed of greater self-respect, shouts almost simultaneously, "I am the guest of God and of the prophet!"

It is stated that Alfred Tennyson has given two private readings, at a guinea a ticket, full dress, and only the invited admitted. His two entertainments netted him 380 odd pounds sterling—about $1,700. He wrote a poem for George Smith, of the Cornhill Magazine, at a guinea a word. He has also had an American indicted who, in reverence for the poet, climbed into Tennyson's garden and broke a twig for a keepsake.

UTILITY AND BEAUTY.—The usefulness of sewing-machines is acknowledged. To get the best among the many, is very desirable. To cover the whole ground is very hard. We are told that the Florence approximates to complete perfection. Its workings are wonderful. There is no snarling or breaking of the threads. The machine takes care of itself. It will gather and sew a ruffle at once. It sews both ways. It makes four stitches. The universal satisfaction it gives guarantees its simplicity, its capacity and general perfection. The interested, we say, go and see; it is worth looking at.—505 Broadway.

No Remedy in the World ever came into such universal use, or has so fully won the confidence of mankind, as DR. J. C. AYER'S PECTORAL for the cure of Coughs, Colds and Consumption.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. Open from 8 A.M. to 10 P.M. Admission in the New York Herald. Change of Time. The Afternoon Performances hereafter will be at 2½ o'clock, instead of 3, as formerly. Evening performances at 7½ o'clock. Every day (Sundays excepted) at 7½. The Biblical Historical Drama of MOSES IN EGYPT. 13 SCENES. Magnificent Scenery, Costumes and Appointments. In the course of the Drama, a MOVING PANORAMA THREE MILE. Amongst the incidents depicted are the Scriptural Tableaux of the Hebrew Children, Departure for the Land of Midian, Vision of Moses, The Burning Bush, Crossing the Red Sea, Destruction of Pharaoh and his Hosts, Triumph of Israel. W. B. Harrison, Extraordinaries for the Great Exciting Curiosities: Three immense Giants, Three Dwarfs, Two Circassian Girls, Living Skeleton, Mammoth Fat Woman, Glass Blowers, Albino Boy, Connoisseurs, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquarium, and Curiosities. Admission, 50 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

Best Black Ink. Five cents a gallon. Recipe sent free for five cents. Address Box 12, Hinsdale, N. H.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, AND NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $300,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents and a Postage Stamp, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time put your Circular and Terms and particulars, also Terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
No. 335 Broadway, New York.

VIOLINS!

Including Bow, Strings, Rosin, Boxing, etc., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and Europe. Also, Guitars, Banjos and Accordeons:

GERMAN—Best or Brown, $2 50, $3, $4, $5, $6, $8.
DOUBLE LINED—$5, $7, $9, $11, $13, $15.
FRENCH—Finished and Lined, $5, $6, $10, $12, $15, $20.
ITALIAN—Inlaid, $13, $14, $16, $18, $25, $30, $35.
OLD MASTERS—Very fine tone, $40, $50, $75 to $300.
MUSICAL MERCHANDISE—Every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price list.
FREDERICK BLUME, 508 Bowery.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen— Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (3¼ views), $1 25 per dozen. Ambrotypes, also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of Price.
FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York.

TRY IT!—MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the great Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary and Family Newspaper. Ably conducted, finely printed and illustrated—over Forty Engravings in the four 1st pages of Jan.! Adapted to whole continent—both Town and Country. Largest circulating clubs of any Journal in the World, and thousands added every week—its cash receipts for 10 days ending Jan. 13, 1866, were $13,859.01! Sent 13 Cts. a year—or, if you wish to know more of it first, the 13 Numbers of the present Volume (1865) will be sent, Gratis, for only 70 cents. TRY THE RURAL and see if it is not the paper you want.
Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

THOSE CURIOUS FASTENERS
—Hooks and Eyes—
Good Books 16 cents each. Courtship Made Easy—Bridal Etiquette—How to Win and Woo—How to Behave—Married Life—Secrets of the World Made Easy—How to Write Letters—Everybody—How to Become an Actor—Mesmerism Made Easy.

The Library of Love,
Three Amusing Volumes for 75 cents.
Poet's Corner, 25 cents. Parlor Theatricals, 25 cents. Fireside Games, 25 cents. Shakspeare's Proverbs, 25 cents. Love Scrap, 10 cents. 100 Curious Puzzles, 25 cents. Guide to Beauty, 25 cents. Parlor Pantomimes, 25 cents. Art of Love, 25 cents. Comic Recitor, 25 cents. How to Converse Correctly, 25 cents. Mammoth Cities, 25 cents. Shakspeare's Sweet Books, Pictures, Plays, Home Amusements, &c., sent with any of the above. W. C. WEMYSS, 979 Broadway, N. Y. 564-567

Agents Wanted.—$150 per Month, to sell the Celebrated Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machine. It will hem, stitch, fell, tuck, quilt, bind, braid and embroider beautifully. Price, only $30. Every Machine is warranted for three years. For terms and circulars, address C. ROWLES & CO., 285 South Fifth street, Philadelphia, Pa.

300 Per Cent. Profit for Agents.—Three Articles needed in every household, and sell at sight. All sent free, by mail, for 30 cents. Address F. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H. 8tf

4,753 Agents Wanted.
Business now, light and desirable, and to energetic persons $150 per month will be guaranteed. Full particulars by addressing, with stamp, P. T. COLLINS & CO., No. 79 Nassau street, New York.

Fun! Fun! Fun!—THE MAGIC WEB; a most curious Puzzle. No one can guess it. Two kinds—18 cards each, or both for a sum; all for $1; 100 for $5. Mailed, post-paid. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H. 564-7

COLORED CARTES DE VISITE
SIXTY CENTS PER DOZEN.
I will send upon receipt of 60 cents 13 Cartes de Visite of French Generals in different positions, or the whole set of 50 different pictures, $2.
541-4 H. ALLEN, 91 Nassau street, New York.

Vivo Drower; or, Life in the Concert Saloons of New York. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78. HOLLAND, N. Y. 542-51

Rato Vaugh, a Racy Novel, 73 pp.; only 15 cents; sent free. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Somnology, Psychologic Fascination, Magnetism, How to Mesmerize, Fortune Telling, the Opposite Sex, Marriage, &c. This queer, useful, and curious book sent for 15 cents. Address EVANS & CO., Box 1,312, Philadelphia. tf

Employment at your own Homes—either suitable for a livelihood, or leisure hours in every city and town. Large profits realized. Address, with red stamp, for particulars, DR. WARNER, 54 East 12th street, New York. 544-7

10,000 ALREADY SOLD. Eighth Edition now ready. MAGIC MADE EASY: A complete expose of Modern Spiritual Humbug. It tells how to cut the cut, cut your nose, rope-tying feats, and nearly 200 other astounding magical performances. Price 20 cents. Sold everywhere, or mailed, free of postage, by HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H. 542-45

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND
Contains One Hundred Valuable, Practical Recipes for the Housekeeper; Horse Taming—complete; Parlor Magic—Twenty-five Tricks; Fortune Telling by Moles; Kind of Liquors without the use of poisonous articles; How to Detect Counterfeit Money; Confectionery; Art of Boxing; Gamblers, Pocket-book Droppers and Peter Funks exposed; Dye for all kinds of Feathers, Bonnets, Sashs, Curling Fluids, Hair Dyes, etc; How to make the Mustache and Whiskers grow; all kinds of Sympathetic Fortune Teller; Twelve Golden Maxims; over 400 Highly Amusing Puzzles; List of all Nations, Poetical Questions, Anecdotes, Conundrums, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 5413, New York. 535-6

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in "THE LOUNGER." Send free for it. Address
ADDRESS, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

JOE MILLER, JR.
A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Puns, Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 5,057, New York.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry to their happiness. Directions for accomplishing it. Sent in advance, by WM. EARL, M.D., 260 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 13 White Street, New York.

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a cure. Sent free. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.
You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and see. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 529tf

GROVER & BAKER'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES.
495 BROADWAY, N. Y. off

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue &c. Address BLACKER & CO., 718 Broadway, N. Y. tf

A Household Necessity exists for the Use of DURNO'S CATARRH SNUFF,
Which, in the first stages of a cold, acts like magic—Headache, Hoarseness, Impediment, Soreness, Dullness of Eyes, Deafness, Bad Taste and Smell, being the result of Catarrh. This snuff removes and prevents all these, and insures a healthy Head. Its effects are pleasant and safe, even for infants, who suffer from Scrofula.
It has the highest professional testimonials. Sold by all Druggists, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S., for 30 cents, for one box, or $1 for four boxes. Address DR. DURNO, P. O. Box 1238, New York.
Wholesale, by D. BARNES & CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y. 534-45eow

Employment for Both Sexes—Energetic persons of either sex in want of safe, respectable and profitable employment, can procure such by sending 10 cents for sample of the Patent Novelty Knife. tf

A Sure Method of Winning at All the various games of Cards, Dice, &c., sent free. Marked Cards $1 per pack, or $9 per dozen. Address W. J. CRAWFORD, Manufacturer of Playing Cards, Nos. 65 and 67 Nassau street, New York. 544-7

50 cent SAMPLE, sent free, with terms, for any one, to Clear $25 a day in three hours time. Address LA MONTE, RAYMOND & CO., No. 29 Broadway, New York. 544-7

Guide to Beauty. 100 pages. Mailed for 25c. Address C. JENNISON, Box 5,074, P. O., New York. tf

FRANK LESLIE'S
Chimney Corner
FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5
THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 11, 1861; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with Gauging Attachment, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is sometimes in error called a Shuttle Machine, but is, in fact, a new and original, sewn with Double or Single Thread of ALL SIZES, from the finest Silk sewn perfect and reversible than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each revolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Skirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c.; in short, every machine made. Warranted not to get out of order for THREE YEARS. It has taken the PREMIUMS at the State, County and Town Fairs, and received the FULL APPROVAL of ALL the principal Journals, and of those who have seen these rare. The only Low Price Machine Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All others are the same old SPRINGFIELD DESIGN.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, securely packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Local agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to the
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
No. 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.
Independent

"Psychonancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing control over others, marriage, etc., free by mail for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unerring art of becoming rich. Address, with stamp, FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y. 543-4

10,000 SOLD.
I will send by mail, post-paid, a beautiful Military Album, containing Portraits of Our Leading Generals, for 50 cents, or $2 per dozen to Agents. Address
541-4 P. O. Drawer 6,368, Chicago, Ill.

IVANS' TOILET GEMS
Consisting of Diamond, Ruby, Emerald, Ruby, Royal Azure, Gold and Silver Powders. These gems are sprinkled in the Bath, and imparts a soft and brilliant transparence. For Balls, parties, and social gatherings, they are indispensable. Sold only at HUNT'S, No. 10, N. Perfumer, 192 South Seventh street, Philadelphia. Sample box of either sent by mail for $1 50; sufficient to dress the hair twenty times. 8tf

FUN, "O," FUN.
HURRAH for the new Phunney articles which are now just out; they sell like wild-fire. "The Pocket Picture Gallery" is the most valuable thing on earth. Over 1,000 "Phunney Specimens of Wit, Humor, and Eccentricity" illustrated. Only 50 cents. "The Magic Pocket-book," a rich thing. Price 50 cents. "The Phunny Phellow" is the most phunny thing on earth. Price 50 cents per pack. "The Old Salmander" he beats all. Price 50 cents. "The Phunny Album," with 24 assorted Pictures. Price 50 cents. "The Phunny Life Boat" is one of our great cries. Price 75 cents. A beautiful bound book: M. "M." E.; it tells the end of the world, showing how to win your sweetheart, and make your money like dirt. Price only 75 cents. "30" Sensation Book, beautifully bound. Price $1. I will send any of the above articles by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, or I will send the whole lot for $4. These articles are just the thing to make a wild Indian white. I hope to hear from you all soon. Address orders to
H. G. GRAHAM,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,368, Chicago, Ill.

65 Secret.—Agents and others can have for only 15 cents, the best 65 secret money making information whereby they can clear $20 a day, or circulars free. Address STEPHENS & CO., 259 Broadway, N. Y. 511-4

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 20 cents; 20 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Actresses for 25 cents; 26 for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Horses for 25 cents. Address 636-45 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?
MY ONGREEF will cause hair to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

New Editions!
The Fictorial Double Numbers for Jan. and Feb. FIRESIDOLOGIST, for Jan., with Physiognomy and Ethnology. Physiology, and Psychology, now ready. Terms cash and stamps. Address
FOWLER & WELLS,
543-4 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Catarrh Cured for One Dollar.
This is no humbug! Read! For One Dollar, per mail, I will send a safe, sure and mediciue that will cure the worst cases of Catarrh in the Head or Bronchia. This is a new discovery. I am a doctor, have cured me, and, as I believe, saved my life. I know it will cure others. I want only to aid in the relief of others from that tormenting and dangerous disease. Address J. F. SIMMS, No. 193½ Fulton St., N. Y. 543-5

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without cider, or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Cosmetics and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism made Easy; Information of importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c. Price 25 cents, sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.
Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By enclosing a post-paid addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

Cough No More
DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Pneumonia and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.
For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
534-37

Short-Hand Without a Master.
By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-first edition; write Shorthand. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
651 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK.
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,
War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.
Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American surnames.

An Album for Thirty Cents! NEW! BEAUTIFUL! EXQUISITE! CHEAP! A beautiful Gilt Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs in metal frames, and HIGHLY PERFUMED, opening with Spring Clasp, sent, post-paid, for 30 cents. Address CALVIN, WILLIS & CO., No. 167 Broadway, N. Y. 543-8

"FANDANGLE."
Gentlemen, send for a "Fandangle," which will make them fall with your friends laughing until they sour saw. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 501, Boston. 543-8

"FANDANGLE."
Ladies, send for a "Fandangle," and gratify your propensity for fun. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 501, Boston. 543-8

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MADAME M. H. FERREGAULT.
Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now returned, and may be located at No. 2 N. Madame Ferregault, by the aid of her wonderful interpreting Planetary Chart of Destiny, which produces a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, &c. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can attest. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the date is truly given. Persons will please state the complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamp for return letter (if required), you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. FERREGAULT,
542-51o P. O. Drawer 209, Albany, N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was considered incurable before the discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment based upon the world. Diseases which baffle the skill of the Medical Schools yield to these peerless remedies. Bad Sores, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Itch, and all cutaneous eruptions are speedily banished.

A CURIOSITY!!
Free to All. A Rare Treat.
Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature and rare illustrations. Send Cents,
CHARLES E. MACKEY,
337 Broadway, New York.

$5 or Something New $25
For Agents and Dealers to sell, a Novel and Useful Article; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses.
A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; prepared expressly for years and warranted perfect. Price $1 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. tf HUNT & CO., Perfumers, tf 133 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

SIAMESE TWINS.
Two men grown together. A Life Photograph sent by mail for 25 cents.
C. BRIGGS,
541-4 P. O. Drawer, 6,368, Chicago, Ill.

$1,500 PER YEAR! We want agents everywhere to travel and to sell our improved Family Sewing Machines. Three new kinds. Under and upper feed. Warranted for three years. Address the Commissioner paid. The ONLY machines sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All others are infringements, and dangerous to purchase. Address, or call upon SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Matrimony Made Easy:
Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with specimens of Letters. Price 18 cents. Send orders to Box 3,410 P. O., N. Y. tf

Royal Havana Lottery.
Official Drawing of December 21st, 1865,

No. 14865	drew	$100,000
No. 20346	"	50,000
No. 18580	"	20,000
No. 2	"	10,000
No. 16316	"	5,000
No. 7921	"	1,000

Being the six capital prizes.
Prizes and information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Goods. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 and 28, N. Y.

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.
Sample and Catalogue sent for 20 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address tf JAS. F. HANGERS, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S
Sporting Album
FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

SKATES FOR THE MILLION!
DEPOT FOR
Lovatt's Patent Skates,
WITHOUT STRAPS, AND
NEW YORK CLUB SKATES,
WITH OR WITHOUT STRAPS.
A fine assortment of all desirable styles of Skates. Purpose for the "Latest Kink" and "Patent Foot Saddle." Wholesale and Retail.
ALFRED WOODHAM, 424 Broadway, Skates Ground and Repaired. 6

Chickering & Sons,
[Established 1823.]
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANOFORTES.
WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.
Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the superiority of their Instruments over all competitors, fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. 6

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Portress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Jeetherne, Fort Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates. 6000

TO CURE
Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Diseases arising from excesses, use
SMOLANDER'S
Extract Buchu.
Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BULLRICH & ROGERS, Boston, General Agents. 353-176

WHISKERS and MUSTACHES forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SEYGNE'S RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the elite of Paris and London with the most flattering success. Names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials sent free. Address DEPOT, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 342-340

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 337-336

NEWSDEALERS AND BOOKSELLERS ARE INFORMED THAT
The American News Co.,
Of New York, are ready to supply, at the earliest moment, and on the very lowest terms,
Newspapers, Daily and Weekly,
Magazines, Dime Novels,
Books, Cheap Publications,
School Books, Envelopes,
Pens, Writing Papers,
And everything wanted by a Newsdealer or Bookseller.
PRINTED TRADE LISTS, describing the nature of the News Business, how to do it, names of Papers and Magazines, with their price, &c., will be sent FREE to all who ask for them. Address
THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY,
6 119 and 121 Nassau St., New York.

FLORENCE
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES.
Highest Premium Gold Medal.
PARIS AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.
The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting shuttle tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
337-180 505 Broadway, New York.

TUCH! SALT RHEUM! RHEUMATISM!
Cured by REDDE'S CRIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 85 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 350-176

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S
AGRAFFE PIANOS.
101 Fleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. 160

LADIES'
PAPER COLLARS
& CUFFS
WHOLESALE & RETAIL
WARD, 387 B. WAY, N.Y.

One Lady's Collar sent free to the Trade, with list of prices and drawings of different styles.

MISSING BOY.
EDWIN W. ROOME, OF NO. 10 CHERRY STREET, BOSTON, MISSING SINCE JUNE 24, 1865.—SEE PAGE 382.

"A Scientific Wonder."
EUROPEAN POCKET
TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.
(Patent applied for June 24th 1865.)
An EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to REMAIN RELIABLE TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Announced by the Press and all who have seen it. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is now being promoted by "Royal Letter Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors, 6 120 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 693 Broadway, (late 58, N. Y.), wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $30 each.
6339-43

50 PER CENT SAVED By Using
B. T. BABBITT'S
LAUDRY-SAVING SOAP.
This Soap is made from pure and pure materials, containing no adulteration of any kind, will not injure the most delicate fabric, and is especially adapted for woollens, which will not shrink after being washed with this Soap. It may be used in hard or soft water. It will remove paint, grease, tar and stains of all kinds. One pound warranted equal to two pounds of ordinary family soap. Directions: cut with a case for making three gallons handsome soft soap from one pound of this Soap. Each bar is wrapped in a circular containing full directions for use, printed in English and German. Ask your grocer for "B. T. Babbitt's Soap," and take no other.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, 74 Washington St., New York.

MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP. Pays per cent saved by using B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH OR READY SOAP MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 3 pounds, 5 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions. Sold by all first-class grocers and making hard and soft soap. One pound will make 14 gallons of soft soap. No boiling is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest article in the market.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington St., New York.

50 PER CENT. SAVED BY USING B. T. BABBITT'S best Medicinal SALERATUS, "made from common salt." Breed made with Saleratus contains, when baked, nothing but common salt, water and flour. Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington street, New York.

50 PER CENT. SAVED BY USING B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDERS. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. Nos. 64 to 74 Washington street, New York.

PINEAPPLE CIDER, 70 Washington street, New York. A delicious substitute for Cider, Dyspepsy, Heart Disease, Bilious Spells, and excellent for Old People, as it produces the clearest of the blue brook. 6

The Little Joker and a FINELY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057, P. O., New York. 6

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, on an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Vineland Lands.
To all wanting Farms.
Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $30 to $50 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.
CHAS. K. LANDIS, Proprietor, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

Ladies & Gentlemen
OUT OF THIS CITY,
TAKE YOUR OWN MEASURE AND SEND TO
E. A. BROOKS, Agt.
Importer and Manufacturer of
BOOTS, SHOES, &c.
575 Broadway, New York.
Directions for Measuring the Foot.
First. Place the foot upon a piece of paper and trace the outline of same with a pencil, which will give the length and spread of the foot, as shown in figure 1.
Second. Make the following measurements, in inches and fractions, with tape measure, as shown in figure 2, viz:

1st—The Ball of the Foot.
2d—The Instep.
3d—The High Instep.
4th—The Heel.
5th—The Ankle.
6th—The Calf.

MUSICAL BOXES.
351-196 SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON INSIDE PAGE.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.
If you want the best fitting, strongest, and most serviceable paper collar ever offered to the public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR
The most Economical Collar ever Invented.
Showing the embossed or printed stitch equally well on both sides.
The following styles are now made:

Patent REVERSIBLE Embossed PAPER COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Bank Note Paper COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Printed Stitch PAPER COLLARS

To be obtained of Furnishing Goods Dealers throughout the country.
HARCH BROS., PIERCE & Co., Agents,
641-830 Whitney Square, Boston.

BEAUTY.—Attention, Gentlemen, Fiction, and Silken CURLS produced by the use of Professor DR. BRECK'S ORIENTAL OR CHEVELURE. One application warrants it to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does not injure to the hair. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ, & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 342-340

$7 FINE WATCHES $7
AT OLD PRICES.
English Silver Watches - $6, $8, $10
Pure silver Hunting Lepine - $11 Each
Fine 18 Karat Gold-Plated Watches - $15, $18, $20.
Fancy Compass and Thermometer Watches - $35, $90.
Silver Hunting Levers - $30, $35.
Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches - $30, $35 to $75.
Coin Silver American Levers - $36.
All kinds of Good Watches now.
to CATELY BROTHERS, Importers, 6 182 Nassau street, N. Y.

TUCH! (WHEATON'S) ITCH!
Salt Rheum, CHITTENDEN'S Salt Rheum.
Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cure Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 30 Cents; by sending 60 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists. 351-180

Good stocks.—Guide to Beauty, 25 cts.; Love Guide, 25 cts.; Love Letters, 25 cts.; How to Converse, 25 cts.; Rules of the Billiard Table, 25 cts; Guide to the Stage, &c., How to be an Actor, 25 cts.; Parlor Dramas, table characters only, 50 cts.; female characters, 50 cts.; Burlesque Dramas, 50 cts.; Operatic Tom Thumb pieces, 10 cts.; Life of a Showman, 50 cts.; Perfect Fascinators, set, $1. Mammoth catalogues sent to every lady and gentleman, free. Send for them. W. C. WEEKES, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 6

MICROSCOPES 60 cts.
THE FRENCH PUBLISH MICROSCOPE, a very powerful instrument, mailed for 60 cents; two for $1. Address
GEO. D. WASHBURN & CO., Box 3,496, Boston, Mass. 341-330

Great American
PRIZE CONCERT!
AT
CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,
Chicago, Ill., March 28, 1866.
20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $20,000 will be presented to Ticket Holders.
100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD!
One Gift, in Greenbacks, ... $10,000
One Gift, in 7.30 Bonds, ... 5,000
1 Gift, Residence three miles from Chicago, ... 5,000
2 Square Grand Pianos, 9 Gifts, $500 each, ... 4,500
50 Keg. Pat. Lever Gold Watches, $250 each, ... 12,500
100 Hunter & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each, ... 10,000
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches, ... 5,000
50 Gifts, 50 Fine Lever Watches, $50 each, ... 2,500
6,000 Gifts 5,000 Thr. Morocco Gold Clasp Albums, $5,000
8,000 Gifts, 8,000 Clasp Albums, $1 each, ... 8,000
10,000 Gifts $10,000 Cash, $1 each, ... 10,000
20,000 Gifts, Total value of which, ... $100,000
The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public.
1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.
2d. All of them are genuine Bonds, Watches, and goods, the very best manufactured. The Pianos and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers assure us sufficient guarantee that they are surpassed by none.
3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate No., these are placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed, a disinterested person selected by the ticket holders present at the Concert, draws these duplicate No.'s from the wheel, the first one drawn out gets the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in like manner all the rest are drawn.
To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first have collected a large list of names, to each of whom all the Prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—enabling all of our Gift Ticket holders, on your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietor needs a friend now of the 20,000 gone, consequently you seldom if ever get anything worth what you order of us.
Dont throw your money away on valueless concerts, and send out your orders for tickets soon, as we could secure them; over 50,000 already sold. Every ticket is returned before being sent out, the number, name of party purchasing, and address, and all will be notified by mail of the result of drawing.
Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and 10 cents for postage.
BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.
144 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.
P. S.—The above concert will positively take place on the 28th of March. Parties at a distance sending us funds for tickets—should they be sold—will have the money returned to them.
344-346 BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.

BRAGUR & STARR'S
Patent Self-Changing Cancelling Stamp.
Also, Stamps in any style. Embossing Presses, Letter Presses, &c.
Engravers and Agents Wanted.
6 O. B. GRAY, 20 Broad Street, New York.

ROGERS'
FRAGRANT
ODONTOLINE
OR TOOTH PASTE
For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers.

CHOLERA! CHOLERA!!
Do not die with the cholera. Save your life. Dr. Charles' European Cholera Remedy has cured the worst cases in from 10 to 40 minutes. Everybody should send at once and receive it by return of mail, for we know and what time it will come upon us. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 50, or six for $7. Address all orders to the agent.
CHARLES I. BRIGGS, Agent,
6 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

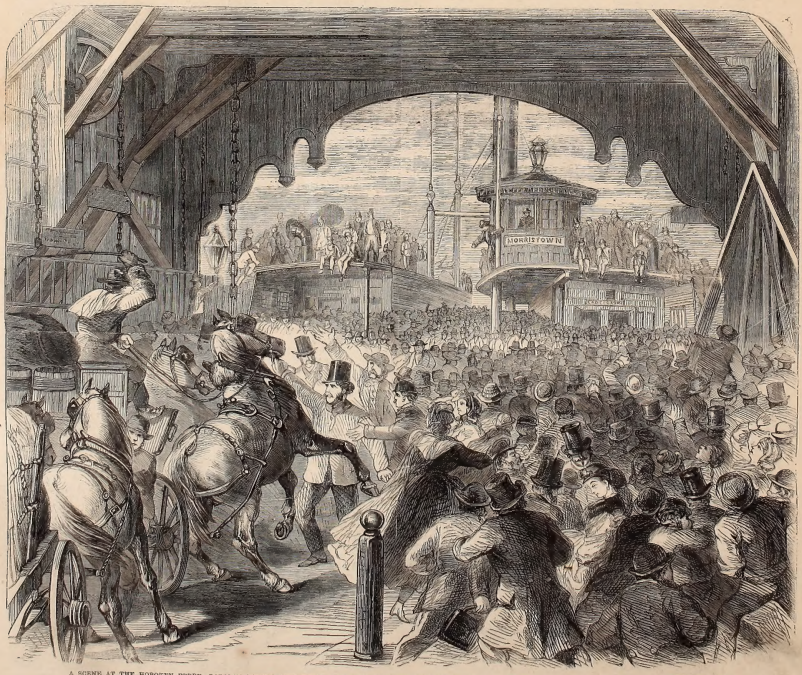
Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 545—VOL. XXI.] NEW YORK, MARCH 10, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS, $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00

The Executive and Congress.

THE country learns, with regret, that irreconcilable differences exist between the President and Congress. The split, long anticipated by close observers, took place on the "Freedmen's Bureau Bill," which, after passing both branches of Congress by a vote of more than two-thirds of their members, was vetoed by the President. The veto will be accepted with a certain satisfaction by the South and its sympathizers, and will receive a qualified support from a large part of those occupying places dependent on Executive favor. The prospect of organizing a new party, in which the South will be, as for many years it has been, a unit, and will throw its whole weight steadily in one direction, is too tempting a one not to dazzle professional politicians. The President will head this new political organization, and will ultimately, if he does not already, look to a re-election as one of the conditions of his adhesion to it. It was so with Tyler and Fillmore, and will not, unnaturally, be so with Johnson. For "men, as a general rule," so philosophized an ebon sage, "possess a great deal of human nature."

On the other hand, the party dominant in Congress is determined that the results of the war shall be commensurate with its cost, and that emancipation shall be real—in other words, that the negro shall be, at least, invested with civil rights, and that, if denied political privileges, shall not still remain an element of political power. In other words, if not allowed to vote, he shall not enter into the basis of representation. Or still clearer, that the lately insurgent States shall not come back into the national councils with thirteen additional members, as a consequence of the emancipation, itself a consequence of the rebellion. That Congress will not recede from its position, is clear, and as the stand taken by the President will encourage the late rebel States to hold out against the Congressional conditions of restoration, we may expect to see them unrepresented in this Congress.



That Congress suspects the President of a desire to secure his chances for a second term is only too evident from the fact that, on the day following the submission of his veto, Senator Wade introduced an amendment of the Constitution, providing that no President shall be eligible for a second term, even though his accession to the Presidency may be through the Vice-Presidency.

That Congress is determined to admit none of the Southern representatives, except on its own terms, is further evidenced from the fact, that, on the day succeeding the presentation of the veto, and with pointed reference to it, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 119 to 40, passed a concurrent resolution, setting forth that in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the 11 States which have been declared in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of the said States until Congress shall have declared such States entitled to such representation.

Reviewing the political condition impartially, we see the solid South, with its Northern sympathizers, a portion of the "War Democrats," who have acted for a few years with the Republicans, with a considerable accession from the ranks of the office-holders, which will grow larger as the test of adhesion will be applied, all gradually coalescing into a party which, no doubt, will seek to retain its potent name of "The Democracy."

On the other hand, we see the Republican party, without patronage, much weakened by the withdrawal of a considerable part of its "War Democrats" allies and disappointed or ambitious original adherents, but strong in the fact that it will continue to direct the legislation of the country, and can perpetuate its power by a persistent exclusion of Southern representatives—an inherent and constitutional privilege, which can only be set aside through revolution, or an Executive coup d'etat.

The result of this state of affairs will be one greatly to be deplored. The political quiet of the country cannot be secured while open disagreement—to use no stronger word—exists between the President and Congress, whose calmest judgment and heartiest co-operation

A SCENE AT THE HOBOKEN FERRY, BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK.—PASSENGERS TAKING POSSESSION OF THE FERRY-BOAT AND PREVENTING THE TEAMS FROM CROSSING.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

UNPRECEDENTED ATTRACTIONS.

Three Splendid Gift Plates.

WITH NO. 29 OF

FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER

each purchaser is entitled to receive the great National Engraving,

"Grant in Peace,"

The most exquisite and attractive work of the time.

With this number commences a Splendid Original Romance of Three Women, a new and highly exciting Story, by one of the most popular Authors of the day.

Every purchaser of Numbers 1 and 2 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER is entitled to a gratis, the splendid Gift Plate of "President Lincoln's Grand Reception of the Nobilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865."

With Number 33 of FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER each purchaser is entitled to receive a most elegant engraving, entitled "His Only Pair," the English prints of which cost Thirty Dollars.

Subscriptions to the CHIMNEY CORNER, or FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER (for one year), will receive the above three splendid Plates, gratis, all adapted for framing.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Monday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent, on that person Wishing to subscribe; or, by taking the back numbers from the commencement, will be entitled to receive the Presentation Plates.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Pub-lisher,

FRANK LESLIE,

537 Pearl street, N. Y.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, MARCH 10, 1866.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no travelling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner.

THE wonderful extent to which this new and well-conducted paper has secured the popular favor, may be judged by the fact that, of No. 28, no less than

150,000 copies were sold

within a few days of its publication. Its varied and attractive contents, embracing contributions of the highest character, illustrated with care, and adapted to the genial amusement and sound instruction of the home circle, make it indeed the first family paper in America.

To meet so immense a demand would be impossible to an ordinary establishment; and, indeed, it taxes the resources even of the publisher, seconded by strike of with proper care, the elegant Presentation Plate, "Grant in Peace," which has elicited such universal praise.

Suppression of the CLIQUE in Congress.

We are glad to learn that a peremptory order has been given to the officers and police of the Senate Chamber in Washington, to peremptorily eject all persons who may hereafter be guilty of the indecency of applauding in applause, or other manifestations of approval or disapproval of the proceedings of the Senate, or the speeches of its members. Apart from the fact that the speeches of the representatives, and after last exhibitions, we may add, members of the Cabinet, and even Presidents, are all too apt to talk for popular effect, or to harangue the mob, and that speeches generally in Congress are directed more to the galleries than to the sense and judgment of the members themselves, or to the country—we say apart from all this, there is danger in permitting a Washington mob, however composed, to sit in criticism on the acts of Congress, which is assembled to legislate for the country. It is mostly gathering of contractors, office-seekers, claimants and office-holders, which makes up the bulk of the population of the capital during the winter, is not the kind of jury we wish to have decide on the doings or sentiments of the National Legislature.

The student of history is not ignorant of the influence exercised upon the mob over the deliberations and conduct of the French Representative Assembly, and in the recollection of the scenes enacted in Paris, will be little disposed to tolerate the first approach to them in this country. It was to avoid the improper influences of temporary popular excitement on the deliberations of Congress, that our fathers fixed the capital away from our great cities, where excitements are most easily created, and a mob most easily raised.

It certainly is not proper that the people should be wholly excluded from witnessing the legislation of the country, nor from listening to the debates of their representatives. But the privilege of admission to the halls of a deliberative body should not be so extended as to convert it into a popular mass meeting. The galleries of the halls of both branches of Congress are absurdly and injudiciously large, and calculated to encourage the great and growing evil of which we complain. It is idle to say that legislation can go on with just deliberation in a pit surrounded on all sides by broad galleries, filled with a staring, whispering, rustling, moving crowd of both sexes, and under the hum of a great gathering of sightseers. More than one gallant Senator has been tempted to make an idle notice, or a silly speech, because he detected the pink ribbons or bright eyes of some favorite Jemima in the gallery; and more than one generally grave and prudent legislator has been tempted into sonorous but unmeaning, not to say rash and unbecoming eloquence, simply that his ears may be tickled and his vanity gratified by the clique of the gallery.

We can understand how, on some such impulse, certain occasion, for instance, the passage of the great Constitutional Amendment, the earnest, almost painful tension of the feelings of the spectators, might find relief in spontaneous and irrepressible applause. Such an occasion might justify what, under ordinary circumstances, would be indecorous and offensive, and sternly to be repressed.

The fact is, that the real origin, of the abuse we are condemning is due to the faulty plan of the Senate and Representative halls. The first is too large, and should be reduced by partitioning off the end and rear galleries, leaving only that in front of the desk of the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. The decoration of both halls would be thus improved, a more even temperature secured, the vulgar clique abolished, and the two bodies become deliberative halls in fact, as they are designed to be in theory.

Military and Civil Services.

THERE was lately a passage at arms in the House of Representatives between Gen. Rosseau, of Kentucky, and Mr. Grinnell, of Iowa. Gen. Rosseau was one of the first Union men of Kentucky, if not the very first, to come out boldly in support of the Government, and in the first to draw sword in the scale in its behalf. He organized the first regiment of Kentucky volunteers for the preservation of the Union, and has fought and bled steadfastly although not a native of the country. We know of no man or officer who has a better record. And his countrymen have not been slow to repay his efforts and services. They have not been niggard in doing him honor. He has a right to be proud of his antecedents and of his present position.

Dr. Mr. Grinnell we know nothing, except what is implied from the fact that he is the representative of an educated and loyal community, in a faithful and intelligent State. We have no reason to believe that he is a true man and honest, who, in his sphere, has worked as faithfully and devotedly as did Gen. Rosseau in his, to vindicate the imperiled integrity and honor of the country. There may have been a thousand good and sufficient reasons why he was not with Gen. Rosseau in the heat and front of battle. General would have had small chance there, and certainly would never have reached his present position and achieved his present reputation, if there had not been men behind him to produce, supply, and pay. Attending the farm and the workshop, filling up of depleted ranks, healing the wounded, comforting the bereaved, and feeding the rebel army, were tasks hardly less likely to glorify those who undertook them than the struggle in the "imminent deadly breach."

Gen. Rosseau and Mr. Grinnell, therefore, were equally essential to the salvation of the country, and it is for neither of them to assume that the country is most to the great and happily reached through the efforts of all. And when Gen. Rosseau taunted his compeer on the floor of Congress as a "stay-at-home man," or as one who had not periled his life in battle, he was guilty, not only of an impropriety, but of ingratitude to a class of men, without whose aid the objects for which he so gallantly struggled would never have been attained, and without whose votes he would not now occupy the distinguished seat which he holds. The true soldier, and we do not doubt that of the purely ideal one, is as generous as he is brave. He is as modest as he is generous, and he lowers his character and dishonors his profession, when he mounts his services in the field, or institutes invidious comparisons between himself and others.

Soldiers should not forget that there may be military, as well as political demagogism. As well observed by a contemporary: "The cause of the Union, freedom and humanity, was assailed, insidiously, covertly, and openly, maligned by many who did not, as it was by many who did, gird on the sword. Something besides courage is needed to promote a successful war. There is a public sentiment to be kept true by pen and speech. There are material resources to be provided. There are charities to be sustained. In a word, there is as much to be done in the rear as at the front; and but for faithful work at home there could be no victories in the field. Therefore it is that there was an ununiformed home-guard, with its faithful leaders, not surpassed in numbers or efficiency by the valiant armies with bristling steel."

The National Income.

THE receipts of the Treasury of the United States from the Internal Revenue have averaged upward of a million a day, since the commencement of the current fiscal year, on the 1st of July. Assuming the rate to hold good, the aggregate revenue for the year will be $325,000,000, or $114,000,000 more than was derived from the same source last year, and three times as great as was obtained in 1864. The returns from customs since July 1st have been $85,500,000, in gold, for the single port of New York, and it is calculated that the total for the current year, throughout the country, will reach $180,000,000 in gold, equal, at present rates, to $248,000,000 in currency. From customs and the internal revenue, therefore, we confidently expect to derive $573,000,000, which sum, from other sources, may be augmented to $600,000,000 in round numbers. It is now pretty certain that the total expenses of the Government for the year, including interest on the public debt, will not exceed $350,000,000, which will leave two hundred and fifty millions to be appropriated to the reduction of the public indebtedness. At this rate the national debt would be paid off in ten years. The expediency, however, of thus hastening the regeneration of the debt, after it has supported the shock of war, is questionable. Every year the country will become better able, through increase of population and the development of its resources, to support the burden of debt. Our children will not complain if called on to pay something of the cost of preserving and perpetuating the Union.

This exhibit of the national finances, nevertheless, is gratifying and encouraging, and must react favorably upon the public credit. Its various securities will soon be regarded as the best in the world.

Mr. Bancroft.

THE oration of the Hon. Geo. Bancroft, before both Houses of Congress, on the Life and Services of Abraham Lincoln," has greatly aroused the ire of some of the foreign diplomats resident in Washington. The representative of Austria is especially vindictive, on account of the speaker styling the so-called Emperor of Mexico "an Austrian adventurer." The representative of England winces under the pungent allusions of Mr. Bancroft to "British neutrality," while the agent of the Emperor of Russia is enraged at the confident prediction that "the republic of Mexico must rise again." The Pope, unfortunately, has no alter ego in Washington, who would consent to a necessary, under the criticism of the times of the people, to get in a rage over the reflections on the rather premature coronation of the "Southern Confederacy" by the successor of St. Peter. In order that our readers may see for themselves what these diplomatists are so excited about, we copy the remarks of Mr. Bancroft about Mexico and the question of Southern recognition:

"And while the enemy of America is indestructible, the British Government hurried to do what never before has been done by Christian people, to put an end to the conflict with its own expostion of public law in the time of our utmost need for independence. Through the insurgent States had not a ship in an open harbor, it invested them with all the rights of a belligerent, and on the ocean; and this, too, when the rebellion was not only directed against the gentlest and most beneficent Government on earth, without a shadow of justifiable cause, but its chief object was to found a system of human nature itself for the perpetual enslavement of a race. Under the British flag recognized as free, there is themselves piratical, found shelter in British courts of law. The successors of British shipbuilders, their own shops, their armories, their private arsenals, their ship yards, are now busy in the interest of the enemy. The British harbor in the wide world became a safe port for the insurgent privateers. British subjects armed with British guns, to prey on our peaceful commerce—even on one unarmed passing fresh, British port, freighted with British products, or that had carried gifts or grain to the British poor. The Prime Minister, in the House of Commons, sustained by cheers, scoffed at the thought that the British Government needed an inquest, so as to preserve real neutrality; and to remonstrances, now known to be true, the Queen and her Secretary answered that they could not change their laws on explosion.

"Let us not forget that when these wrongs, for they always have wished, as they still wish, friendly relations with the people of the United States, and have never ceased to act in more strongly than I. This country has always been ready to negotiate with England on any terms, only, in all its history has that yearning been fairly met—by the Prime Minister of the Whig party, by the first ministry of the elder Pitt; and once again in the days of Peel and Aberdeen. Not had negotiations at all times been just men among the peers of Britain—liss as Lord Chief Justice of Queen's Bench, the statesman Argyll, or a Houghton in ours; and we cannot be insensible to the fact that public opinion in England like Cobden and Bright. But the best bower anchor of peace with the people of England, which, fortunately, comes from our civil war, but who, while they kroke their fetters, have not forgotten with sorrow, and cannot up to persevere.

"The subject of recognizing the rebel belligerents was connected with France—France, so beloved in America, on which has just completed the grandest link that one people ever conferred on another—France, which has been engaged in the consistent effort to secure the solidity of her culture, as well as for the bravery and generous impulses of her race, which for centuries had been moving steadily in its own way to a constitutional and political freedom. The policy regarding further colonization of America by European powers, known as the Monroe doctrine of America, had its origin in France; and if it takes any man's name, it was the name of Turgot. It was not Jefferson, or Louis XVI., in the cabinet of which Vergennes was the most influential minister. It is emphatically the policy of France: to which, with transient deviations, the United States has ever adhered, and to which it will have ever adhered.

"Even when the President was perpetually harassed by rumors that the Emperor Napoleon the Third desired formally to recognize the States in rebellion as an independent power, and that England held him back by her reluctance, or France by her fruitless act of freedom, or he himself by his own better judgment and clear perception of events. But the republic of Mexico on our borders, was, like ourselves, distracted by a rebellion, and from a similar cause. The monarchy of England had fastened upon our slavery, which did not disappear with the abolition of the slave trade. The ecclesiastical policy established by the Spanish Council of the Indies, in the days of Charles the Fifth and Philip the Second, retained its vigor in the Mexican republic. The 50 years of civil war under which she had languished, was due to the bigoted system which was the legacy of monarchy, just as here the inheritance of slavery kept alive political strife, and culminated in civil war. As with us there could be no quiet but through the end of slavery, so in Mexico there could be no prosperity until the crushing tyranny of intolerance should cease. The party of slavery in the United States sent their emissaries to Europe to solicit aid; and so did the party of the church in Mexico, as organized by the old Spanish Council of the Indies, but with a different result. Just as the Republican party had made an end of the rebellion, and was establishing the best government ever known in that region, and giving promise to the nation of order, peace, and prosperity, word was brought us, in the moment of our deepest affliction, that the French Emperor, moved by a desire to erect in North America a buttress for imperialism, would transform the republic of Mexico into a secundo-geniture for the house of Hapsburg. America might complain; she could not then interpose, and delay seemed justifiable. It was seen that Mexico could not with all its wealth of land compete in cereal products with our northwest; nor in tropical products with Cuba; nor could it, under a disputed dynasty, attract capital, or create public works, or develop mines; or borrow money; so that the imperial system of Mexico, which was forced at once to recognize the wisdom of the policy of the republic by adopting it, could prove only an unremunerating drain on the French treasury, for the support of an Austrian adventurer.

"Meantime, a new series of momentous questions grow up, and force themselves on the consideration of the thoughtful. Republicanism has learned how to introduce into its Constitution every element of order, as well as every element of freedom; but thus far the continuity of its government has seemed to depend on the continuity of elections. It is now to be considered how perpetuity is to be secured against foreign occupation. The successor of Charles the First of England dated his reign from the death of his father; the Bourbons, coming back after a long series of revolutions, claimed that the Louis who became king was the eighteenth of that name. The present Emperor of the French, disdaining a title from election alone, is called the third of his name. Shall a republic have less power of continuance when invading armies prevent a peaceful resort to the ballot-box? What force shall it attach to intervening legislation? What validity to debts contracted for its overthrow? These momentous questions are by the invasion of Mexico thrown up for solution. A free state once truly constituted should be as undying as its people; the republic of Mexico must rise again.

"It was the condition of affairs in Mexico that involved the Pope of Rome in our difficulties so far that he alone among temporal sovereigns recognized the chief of the Confederate States as a President and his supporters as a people; and in letters to two great prelates of the Catholic Church in the United States gave counsels for peace at a time when peace meant the victory of secession. Yet events move as they are ordered. The blessing of the Pope at Rome on the head of the Duke Maximilian could not revive in the nineteenth century the ecclesiastical policy of the sixteenth; and the result is only a new proof that there can be no prosperity in the State without religious freedom."

Some more correspondence about the "Shenandoah," the Anglo-rebel corsair, has been published. On December 28, Mr. Adams submitted to Lord Clarendon an important affidavit about the fitting out of the Shenandoah, made by William A. Temple, a British subject, who remained with Captain Waddell during the whole cruise. This affidavit states that of 127 persons on board the Shenandoah, no less than 78 were, and were known to be, British subjects; that the principal guns used during the cruise of the Shenandoah were on board when she sailed from London; that the British Governor of Melbourne was privately entertained by Captain Waddell on the Shenandoah; that the Government Engineer of Melbourne was on the vessel two or three times a day and gave his advice about the necessary repairs, and that the Shenandoah captured and burned 19 vessels after receiving the information of the end of the war. The acceptance of the surrender of the Shenandoah is acknowledged by Mr. Seward in these terms:

"We accept the vessel, but I regret to say that the acceptance is not attended with any sense of satisfaction on the part of this Government. It would have gratified the President if her Majesty's Government had caused proceedings to be instituted for the condemnation of the Shenandoah. The course, however, which the British Government has heretofore pursued in regard to our applications for justice was such as to discourage on our part an expectation of such a disposition of the vessel. We accept her now simply and exclusively upon the prudential consideration that, being reduced into our possession, she will not again depart from British waters in a hostile character."

In response to which Lord Clarendon throws himself on his dignity, as follows:

"It is impossible for her Majesty's Government to avoid expressing their surprise and regret at the tone and style which throughout characterize it [the dispatch of Mr. Seward.] The dispatch imputes to her Majesty's Government, in plain terms, a determination to disregard 'applications for justice' made by the United States Government, and an intention to shelter from the punishment due to their offense persons known to be guilty of piracy. Her Majesty's Government think that by not replying to this extraordinary and unfounded charge, they shall best consult their own dignity, and exhibit their desire to maintain friendly relations with the Government of the United States."

President Juarez, of Mexico, has written a letter, full of confidence, in which he says that the Mexicans, without the United States taking any direct part in the war now going on, will be able to weary out, if not destroy their invaders and adds: "Although Napoleon, from his pride and the habitual depreciation with which he has treated us, may not be ready to propose terms, yet the time is soon coming when he will be glad to accept those we proposed before the war. For ourselves, we will neither propose nor accept anything, absolutely nothing, which, in the slightest degree, can imply any recognition of the intervention, or that may be contrary to the honor and dignity of the country."

The following are the passages in the speech of the Queen of England, delivered at the opening of the session of Parliament, referring to the United States:

"I have observed, with satisfaction, that the United States, after terminating successfully the severe struggle in which they were so long engaged, are wisely repairing the ravages of civil war. The abolition of slavery is an event calling forth the cordial sympathies and congratulations of this country, which has always been foremost in showing its abhorrance of an institution repugnant to every feeling of justice and humanity.

"A correspondence has taken place between my Government and that of the United States, with respect to injuries inflicted on American commerce by cruisers under the Confederate flag. Copies of this correspondence will be laid before you."

The reference to the abolition of slavery is in striking and favorable contrast with the corresponding reference in the speech of the French Emperor.

It seems that Admiral Pareja, the commander of the Spanish squadron in the Pacific, and through whose arrogance Spain became involved in a war with Chile, fatally under-estimated his Republican adversary. His easy triumph, through bravado, in Peru, led him to confide in a similar policy toward Chile, where, however, he was met by unflinching resistance, war, and the humiliation of the capture of one of his vessels. Before committing suicide, he wrote the following letter:

"This letter will convey to you the news of my death. The errors of judgment, and not of will, with which I have unfortunately misguided the Government of my Queen, cannot have any other expiation. I have been prejudiced and unjust toward Tavira. Request him to pardon me. He did know this republic better than anybody else, and his advice and proceedings were safe and sound. It is the interest of our country to embrace the first moment to make peace with Chile."

THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

A magazine for children, not too wise, not too instructive, and not too pious, has long been a desideratum in this country. Children, as a general rule, get quite enough cramming in the way of lolly-pop science; and an occasional story that does not wind up with a text or a sermon, is a thing which big as well as little children delight in. Healthfulness of tone and sound morality are far removed from cant, and preaching is an excellent thing in its place. Adam Clarke, the great commentator and Oriental scholar, affirmed that his tastes were first directed to Eastern studies through a desire to read the Arabian Nights and its kindred stories in the original. There can be no doubt that the publication of Robinson Crusoe did more to stimulate English maritime adventure and enterprise than all the legislation of the British empire. Ergo; pleasant stories without a strained moral, in which illustrations of customs and scenery, and geography, and for that matter, of natural history, are interwoven, may be most useful things for children, without necessarily winding up with a long paragraph, often dragged in forcibly, about the impropriety of playing marbles on Sunday—which paragraph youthful intelligence will certainly omit.

We have been led into those remarks apropos of a new and brilliantly illustrated monthly, entitled: "Frank Leslie's Children's Friend," just issued from this office. It is a handsome small quarto of 32 pages, with a score or more of engravings, covering avariety of subjects—stories, fairy tales, scenery, adventures, natural history, simple games, etc., etc.—in fine, whatever may interest the little group which makes the family cheerful and sustains the parent through household trials. "From grave to gay, from lively to severe," seems to be the motto of the editors, and we will venture to say, that no publication for the young, in this country, or any other, has ever so completely realized the wants of youth of both sexes, between the ages of 6 and 16, as the charming little magazine before us.

No parent can neglect to let this 10 cents' worth of sunshine into his household. One glance at the happy faces of his children will more than repay him for a year's subscription.

TOWN GOSSIP.

New York has been taking a holiday, almost an impromptu one we may say, for heretofore the day—Washington's Birthday—has not been publicly noticed. This year the public, perhaps with a twinge of conscience for its neglect in the past, woke suddenly up and went in for a celebration. Not only did the military turn out in full strength and gold lace, but the business men, turning for one day from greed and gain, shut up their shops, and went out to enjoy one of the most beautiful days ever bestowed upon the earth. The sun shone, the winds blew soft as summer, the people flocked into the streets, the music played not only from Barnum's balcony, but from half a hundred bands; Gen. Grant walked upon Broadway, and was, as a matter of course, driven off by the vulgar crowd who thrust themselves upon him, and in the evening he had a grand reception at the Union League Rooms. There were fireworks in all the public parks in the evening, and the Eighth Regiment gave a magnificent ball at the Academy of Music, at which there was a blaze of beauty and bravery. The boxes, galleries and walls, were beautifully draped with American flags, and from the centre of the building hung festoons of red, white and blue. Portraits of all the great generals were on the walls, and small-arms and cannon were handsomely grouped at the upper end of the room. Mayor Hoffman and Gen. Sandford were present, and a little after midnight in marched Gen. Grant, accompanied by Mr. Secretary Seward. Then came the wildest enthusiasm, and even the ladies cheered and waved their cambrics. The General bowed his way through the excited crowd, and smilingly submitted to his lionization. Then came supper, a capital one, and what we can rarely say of a ball, general happiness and satisfaction.

While all this was going on, there were a hundred other jollifications all over town, and we really think that the day was productive of about as much patriotism and pleasure as ever was a 4th of July.

Who among all our wealthy citizens will emulate the glorious example set by George Peabody, the great American banker in London, who has just made a second donation of $500,000 for the benefit of the London poor, this sum making a gross donation of one and a quarter millions of dollars for the same object. This money is expended in building model dwellings for poor mechanics and laborers, and the result is, that some hundreds of that class have cheerful, healthful homes, instead of being obliged to burrow in the sinks of the city, and pay high rents for so doing. It is only necessary that the tenants of the Peabody houses shall be able to show a good character, to have rooms assigned to them. They then can hire a large airy room, with all the necessary fixtures for comfort, for about 60 cents a week, and in the same proportion for larger apartments. This price is not regulated by the charge for rents in other parts of the city, but is entirely governed by the cost of the building, and the necessity of keeping it in repair, or creating a sinking fund for its rebuilding when it becomes old.

Now who is there among our wealthy citizens that will win for themselves everlasting fame by an act of this same kind? We could name a dozen who could spare a half million and not feel it, if it were not that our doing so would be personal, perhaps libelous; but they can take the hint just as well without mentioning names. Let them think what a satisfaction it would be to walk through a row of model houses, where a hundred families were made happy by their munificence. If it did not secure them a front seat in the grand Temple of Happiness, then it is useless to have such an edifice. We could suggest a locality in this great city, where some thousands of hard-working, sober mechanics and laborers, with large families, can be found, within the space of a few hundred yards, inhabiting dar crowded, and unwholesome tenant-houses, paying rent averaging $2 50 per week for each stifled room they occupy. How glad would these over-worked and ill-housed people be to get away from their prison-homes—how glad to get a few miles away from the city, into healthful dwellings, if they only knew how it could be done!

Millionaires, now is your chance for immortality. Don't all speak at once; but put your heads together, and see what will come of it.

As a fitting end to what we have been saying, let us give a scrap we cut from a daily paper, headed "Underground Horrors." Barbara Mahon is dead, and this is what comes out on the inquest: "The testimony of Dr. Walter J. Haddon brings to light another of many cases of underground misery and degradation. The doctor was called to see Mrs. Mahon on Monday afternoon last, and found her sitting by the stove, sick at the stomach, very weak, and having raised blood, but did not consider her in imminent danger; the room was very dark, damp, badly ventilated and the air foul and nauseating. Her husband was lying on the bed, drunk, cursing and swearing at her and the doctor. Deceased said she had eaten nothing for a week. He prescribed a tonic, and told her to take some nourishment; the next morning he was very much surprised when told that she was dead. The doctor made a post-mortem examination: the intestines were entirely empty—not a particle of food to be found, and it did not appear that deceased had eaten anything for some time; the limbs showed marks of bruises and scratches, and there were scars on the head, but there were no marks of violence visible on the body; a person's knee might have been pressed on the stomach with sufficient force to cause the bursting of a blood-vessel without causing external marks; the bed on which deceased lay was saturated through-out with blood; there was no coagulated blood in the throat to cause strangulation, and there were no marks of violence that would cause death. The doctor was of opinion that death was caused from exhaustion from the want of food and loss of blood. There were no indications that deceased was of intemperate habits. When called, on Monday afternoon, Mahon followed the doctor into the room, and remained there, cursing and swearing, during his visit, and his wife appeared to tremble with fear. Three of the shoemakers employed in the rear of the basement testified to Mahon's intemperate habits, his frequent abuse and ill-treatment of his wife; that she was sometimes compelled to fly from the house; and on a number of occasions, after having been driven out, she and her little girl slept all night on the bench, in the shoe-shop." We wonder if Thomas Mahon will be hanged?

At the theatres, while there is nothing of especial novelty, there is still enough to keep up public attention.

Niblo's, and Wood's New Theatre, are each starring a lady, the first Maggie Mitchell, with her fascinating impersonation of "Fanchon," with which she seems to tickle the New York palate to that degree as to fill the house nightly. The other, has Lucille Western, and the sensational drama of the "The Child Stealer."

There is no disputing the great talent of Miss Western. She manages, in a character like this of Madge Wildfire, to hold her audience in a thrall that very few on the stage in this day can do.

Mr. John Owens announces the last nights of "Solon Shingle" and the "Live Indian." We do not believe it. We have always had a theory that Owens would go on playing "Solon Shingle" as long as the world lasted, and that the people would rush to see him the same way a hundred years hence as they do to-day. We will not believe our theory false until it is proved so.

Our Scottish citizens are talking profusely of Corrie's Illustrated Tour of Scotland, which is being exhibited at Hope Chapel, 720 Broadway. The views are truthful, the lecturer pleasant in his delivery, and the entertainment, being interspersed with music and song, makes it one of the best ways to while away an hour that we know of.

Barnum has been making a great hit with his new play of "Moses in Egypt." The scenery is beautiful, and the whole get up of the play would be creditable to any theatre. The effort to do something really good has been appreciated by the public, and the full houses every afternoon and evening attest the fact.

By-the-by, speaking of the Museum reminds us that "The Barnum's Museum Association" gave a very delightful ball at Irving Hall on the night of Friday, the 23d of February. There was a crowd without being a jam, and as pleasant a company as we have seen together for some time.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Gen. Fisk, of the Freedmen's Bureau in Kentucky, has received by a single mail, letters detailing 52 distinct outrages upon freedmen. These letters are received from men of respectability and standing, all citizens of Kentucky, and most of them persons who were appointed bureau agents in the different counties upon the recommendation of members of the Kentucky Legislature.

—— Donald McKay, the distinguised ship-builder, of East Boston, has lately returned from Europe, where he thoroughly inspected the iron-clad navies of France and England. He says that our Navy Department has constructed, built and equipped, since 1851, an iron-clad fleet more powerful than all the iron-clad navies of the world combined, and declares the Dunderberg, built by Mr. Webb, in New York city, to be equal to all the French iron-clads, of which we have heard so much in praise.

—— The American Bunting Company of Lowell, Mass., has just completed a flag for the use of the United States Senate. This is the first flag ever made in this country from domestic materials, and the Senators will no longer deliberate under the folds of a flag made from foreign fabrics.

—— Of the $25,000 to be raised for the erection of an equestrian monument to Col. Robert G. Shaw, of the 5th (colored) Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers, $12,000 have already been voluntarily subscribed, and it is thought the committee will soon secure the whole amount.

—— The sum of $18,000 has already been contributed, and a large portion of it paid into the hands of the Western Sanitary Commission, by the colored soldiers and freedmen of the United States, for the erection of a National monument at Washington to the memory of Mr. Lincoln—a spontaneous offering of their gratitude to the great liberator of their race.

—— The Department of State has received a flag from the people of Lyons, France, dedicated to the people of the United States, in memory of Abraham Lincoln. It is inscribed: "Popular subscription—To the Republic of the United States.—In memory of Abraham Lincoln. Lyons, 1865."

—— The number of persons who died in this city, for the week ending Feb. 18, was 417; 229 were children; 32 of whom were of American parentage, and 197 of foreign parentage.

—— Some weeks since, Colonel King, of the 13th Missouri regiment, arrived at Jefferson City, Mo., from the plains, bringing with him a white boy, about 12 years of age, who wandered into his camp, on the plains, among the Sioux. He could speak little or no English, and knew nothing of his birthplace. It has since been discovered that he was the son of a Mr. Sylvester, and was stolen on the plains, while his parents were on their way to Oregon, in the summer of 1860. An uncle, residing in Quincy, Ill., hearing of Colonel King's discovery, made inquiries, which resulted in his identifying the boy as his nephew. The latter, however, has become quite an Indian, has forgotten all about his parents, who are now living in Oregon, and is strongly attached to wild life.

—— In General Sickles's Department of South Carolina, John Ferguson,. of Charleston, former owner of the steamer Planter, has had the brass to apply for possession of the steamer, claiming that she was stolen by negroes, and captured from them by the Federal blockading squadron; that he has taken the amnesty oath; and that the steamer should be restored to him, with his other property. General Saxton reports that the Planter was employed by the rebels, and while in this service was brought past the batteries and surrendered to Admiral Du Pont by a slave, named Robert Small. The steamer has since been employed by the Quartermaster's Department, and Small placed in command.

—— The prevalence of colds has again induced the query, so often agitated, as to the immediate cause of the "cold in the head," the "cold in the back," and "the cold in the throat." A gentleman, who endeavored to trace the cause of his cold, came to the conclusion that he caught it going to bed in his bare feet. The real cause of many colds may be attributed to the long talks which people indulge in on the corners of streets. One of Boston's most celebrated physicians, now an octogenarian, when stopped in the streets, invariably remarks, "I will talk if you will walk." This should be a hint to button-holeing friends.

—— Through the carelessness of an intoxicated nurse, four wards of the Cumberland Hospital, at Nashville, Tenn., were burned on the 1st of February. About 100 patients were in the wards, many of whom were suffering from limbs lately amputated, but all were removed in safety. The nurse, a discharged soldier, perished in the flames. Men who were suffering severely were heard to exclaim, "Don't take any trouble about us, we can be removed at any time;" while others, who were only slightly unwell, were clamorous in their entreaties to be carried away.

—— The distribution of races in the late rebel States is shown in the following table, compiled from the census of 1860:

States.	White Population.	Colored Population, Slave and Free, including Indians.
Alabama	526,271	436,930
Arkansas	324,243	111,307
Florida	77,747	62,677
Georgia	591,550	465,736
Louisiana	357,456	350,546
Mississippi	353,901	437,404
North Carolina	629,942	362,680
South Carolina	291,300	412,408
Tennessee	826,722	283,079
Texas	420,891	183,324
Virginia	1,047,299	549,019
	5,447,222	3,666,110

—— In Georgia, the Governor has vetoed the bill making valid all contracts between whites and freed men. The Senate passed the bill allowing persons to testify in their own behalf in criminal cases only.

—— Mrs. Patterson, daughter of President Johnson, is represented to have lately said to a very prominent and fashionable woman: "We are plain people, from the mountains of Tennessee, and we shall not put on airs because we chance to occupy this place for a short time."

—— Joseph Crele died at Caledonia, Wisconsin, on the 27th of January, at the age of 140 years. He was born near Detroit, Mich., in 1725, seven years before George Washington, and was 50 years old at the outbreak of the American Revolution, so that he might, even then, have claimed exemption from military service. He was 44 years old at the birth of Napoleon I. He was 62 years old when the Federal Constitution was formed, and 84 when Abraham Lincoln was born. We know but one longer life than his in modern times, that of Parr, the Englishman, who is recorded to have been born in 1483, and to have died in 1635, at the ripe age of 152. Crele's baptism is said to be on record in the French Catholic Church in Detroit, so that his age would seem to be duly authenticated.

—— Resurrectionists, or body-snatchers, on the night of the 28th of Jan., dug up the body of a young lady who had been buried that afternoon, in Norwalk, Conn. She had been buried while in a cataleptic fit, and upon being exposed to the night air, animation was restored. The resurrectionists fled and she walked home. Her parents refused to admit her, believing her to be a ghost. She then went to the house of a young man to whom she was engaged. He took her in, and on Monday they were married.

—— Mr. David Williams, of Benton, Ill., was recently indicted for murder. A skeleton was found near his father's house, supposed to be the remains of a man named Henry Mahorn, who had been lost sight of for some time previous, and the circumstances pointed conclusively to Mr. Williams as guilty of his murder. But on Jan. 15, while the trial was going on, Mr. Mahorn turns up again, and came into court, to the surprise of all present, and the infinite relief of the accused, who was, of course, acquitted at once, and the judge and jury left to ruminate upon the uncertainty of circumstantial evidence.

Foreign.—In a speech at Manchester, England, Lord Stanley said: "There is a story of an admirably-conducted man in jail, who, by extra work, managed to lay by a respectable sum, which was duly paid him on his release, and which he immediately proceeded to invest in a first-rate set of housebreaker's tools."

—— The Emperor Napoleon having refused his sanction to the performance of "Malheur aux Vaincus," the last play of M. Th. Barrière, the celebrated vaudevilist, revenged himself by the following letter, which he addressed to the Presse: "I had written a play entitled 'Malheur aux Vaincus.' The subjects of which it treated were fidelity, virtue and honor. But the theatre is only permitted to represent realities; my piece has therefore been forbidden, and I have the honor to inform you of this. Th. B."

—— The Italian Government announces that the railway tunnel through Mount Cenis may be finished at the close of the year 1870. The cutting was begun on the French side of the mountain at Mondane, and on the Italian side at Bardonnèche. The length perforated is about 5,200 yards. As the tunnel is to be 12,220 yards long, there are still 7,020 yards to be accomplished. The average distance cut each day is four yards, so that it will require 1,755 days to complete the tunnel.

—— M. Guizot is said to have sketched the policy of France to a friend in the ministry, in these words: "Stop at Rome, get away from Mexico as quickly as you can, and don't go near Belgium."

—— There is a proposal to establish a club to be called "De la Sainte Mousseline," in Paris, with the object of putting a stop to the mania of the Paris ladies for wearing extravagant toilets. One of the principal regulations of the club is that compelling its members to dress with "elegant simplicity."

—— The Paris Omnibus Company has resolved to adopt for their conveyances the practice of laying down hot water tubes under the feet of the passengers, as already carried out for first class railway cars during winter.

—— The little principality of Monaco, in the Gulf of Genoa, contains only 7,000 inhabitants, and yet, few as they are, they comprise a free and independent nation, with a hereditary prince, and a government all their own.

—— Louis Napoleon has taken a fancy to a span of superb black horses driven by Mr. Way, of Boston, which are creating a sensation in Paris. Mr. Way is the envy of all fanciers of all degrees, when he emerges from the porte cochere of the Grand Hotel, to display his hot bloods in the Champ Elysees and in the Bois de Boulogne. The Emperor has sent to know if Mr. Way could be induced to part with his horses, and at what price; but as yet their owner is unmoved, and prefers his horses to the honor of pleasing his majesty.

—— A Mexican correspondent says Maximilian never shows himself, and when he walks out privately, heavy escorts and secret spies line his pathway to shield him from danger. He feels no security, and looks very care-worn, but strives to put the best side out.

—— During the festivities of Christmas, a large cake of very rich appearance was sent by some unknown person to Gen. de Manteuffel, Prussian Governor of Schleswig. The gift was received with great pleasure by the Governor's family, and one evening it was placed on the table with no little ceremony. But on cutting it, the tempting inside was found to be merely a shell, containing numerous copies of journals prohibited in Schleswig by order of the General.

DIGGING TURF IN THE COUNTY KERRY, IRELAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.

DIGGING TURF IN IRELAND,
County Kerry.

WHAT coal is in England—almost a universal fuel—turf is in Ireland. A good turf-ground, or peat bog, as it is called, is a fine property, and, like a coal mine, brings a royalty, or rent, to its proprietor from any one who digs.

The depth of the peat varies, and as soon as the surface is taken off, the ground is fit for cultivation.

The spade or instrument used for digging is called a slane, and the square of peat, when taken out, a slade. The pieces are generally about 18 inches in length by 12 broad, and the same deep; and after cutting, are piled in heaps, to dry, and when dry, are sold at the rate of about five for a penny. It burns like charcoal, and even in those places where coal can be had, is used as a kindling material.

In this country we have many peat bogs, but in the superabundance of better fuel, it has not been thought worth while to work them to any great extent. As our forests give out and our coal mines get into the hands of monopolists, so as to make keeping warm too expensive a matter for everybody to indulge in, the peat bogs, no doubt, will come into play, and we shall have the sloder offered in our cities as a substitute.

MR. JAMES ROBINSON AND THE NEW YORK CIRCUS.

NEW YORK has had, within the past few months, a sensation of no common kind, in the person of a rider, Mr. James Robinson, who has given some examples in that line that rather startle the professors of the ring themselves.

Mr. Robinson came almost unannounced to this city, but three nights had not passed when it was seen that a talent, such as had never been witnessed in this locality, was before us. The perfect mastery of the horse, the abandon of the rider, the grace and dash, marked the perfect chief of his art. We feel that all attempt at description is vain, and that the rider must be seen to be understood. All positions on the horse are alike to him. He stands either upon his head or feet; he repudiates bridle or band, taking his steed barebacked and flying.

Our illustration represents him in one of the favorite feats of his art, called "The Steeple Chase." In it he stands exactly as represented in the engraving, while the horse makes a flying leap over a four foot high fence. We give this as one of the wonderful things he does, without being altogether sure that it is the most wonderful. In fact, Mr. Robinson has so overturned our old ideas of riding, that we feel an inability to describe him.

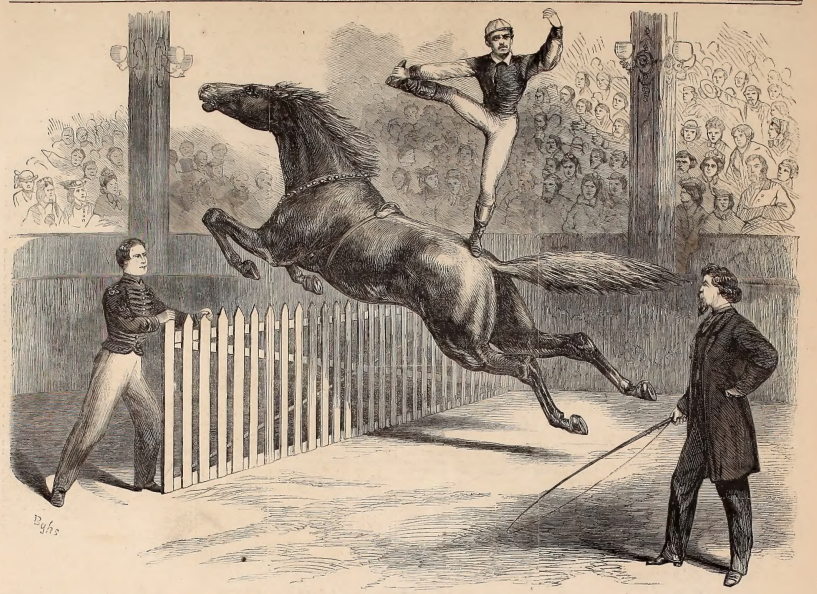
Mr. James Robinson commenced his career in 1845, with Messrs. Rockwell & Stone, traveling through all the Southern States, until the year 1857; and, on the 4th of March of that year, he sailed for England, under an engagement with Howes & Cushing. While in London, he had the honor of appearing at the Alhambra Palace, before the Queen and the royal family, and of receiving tokens of the royal approbation.

After a career of great success in England, Mr. Robinson went to the continent, and appeared in all the principal cities of FRANCE, GERMANY, RUSSIA, HOLLAND, and other States, in each place making a success that stamped him as an artist of the highest rank in his profession.

MAJOR-GENERAL O. O. HOWARD, CHIEF OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

On his return to this country, he traveled through the West, and was then engaged by Mr. Lent, for the New York Circus, in 14th street, where he made his first appearance in November last, and at once winning a notice that has grown weekly, and drawing to this pleasant place of amusement the fashion of the city.

There is nothing that we can say of this talented and daring rider that would be too much; but nothing that can be said will give any idea of his style. He must be seen to be understood.



WILLIAM AND MARY'S COLLEGE, VIRGINIA.

THIS ancient seat of learning, the Alma Mater of so many eminent men, is the second oldest college of the United States, Harvard University being the first. It was founded in 1692, at the same time as the town of Williamsburgh, in which it stands. Before the rebellion the college was in a flourishing condition, having about 150 students, and a library of 5,000 volumes. It had a reputation for quiet respectability and conservatism, but the war made no distinction of persons or localities, and the operations of both armies had its effect, until the apparel of the college was almost entirely destroyed. Since the close of the war, strong efforts are being made to restore the ancient place to its former glory, and without doubt they will be successful.

The town of Williamsburgh, in which it stands, is situated on a level plain, between the James and York rivers, and about six miles from each. It is the oldest incorporated town in the State, and is full of interesting historical associations. It was the seat of the royal government previous to the Revolution, and afterward capital of the State until 1779. The population is about 2,000.

MR. BENJAMIN P. MACKENNA.

THIS gentleman, who has attracted considerable attention of late in this country, from his connection with Chilean affairs, and his arrest by the Government, was born in Santiago, Chile, in the year 1831. In his earliest youth he took an active part in the politics of his country, and figured as one of the warmest and most ardent partisans of advanced liberal ideas. Not content with a simply verbal representation of his political principles, he identified himself with them, at a later date, as a soldier in the revolution inaugurated in Chile in 1851. In this movement he reached the rank of Colonel. Previous to this, however, he was twice compelled to commit to temporary banishment from his native land on political grounds. Of a naturally remarkably energetic and laborious character, he took care that the time he was obliged to spend in these periods of compulsory exile was not wasted. He improved the term of his banishments in study, not in visiting Europe, the United States, and the other countries on the continent. He devoted himself especially to a careful examination into the history and institutions of the various countries of the world, and the working of the several forms of Government at present existing. Mr. Mackenna has greatly distinguished himself as a writer, both by the number and the merit of his literary efforts. Up to the present time, he has composed and published 14 or 15 volumes, all of considerable value; and, in addition to this, has made constant contributions to the periodical literature of his country. He is by profession a lawyer, and has practiced with some success. Mr. Mackenna now occupies the position of Secretary to the Chilean Chamber of Deputies, of which the secretary is always and necessarily a member.

MR. JAMES ROBINSON, THE WONDERFUL BAREBACK RIDER, NOW PERFORMING AT THE NEW YORK CIRCUS, FOURTEENTH STREET

BENJAMIN F. MACKENNA, THE CHILEAN AGENT.

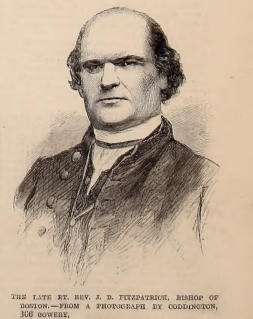
He is described by those who have been most familiar with him since his late arrival in the United States, as a man of extraordinary energy and activity: one who will spare no time to compass the success of any measure to which he may commit himself. He entertains a decided bias in favor of American ideas, whether in politics or in social and domestic matters, and is a sincere disciple of the go-ahead principle.

Mr. Mackenna came to this country last November. He brought with him influential letters of introduction, and at once obtained an entrance into the higher circles of New York society. He became a member of the Traveler's Club, to which he was introduced by the Hon. E. G. Squier, of this city. Soon after his arrival, he took part in the opening of the Mexican loan agency, at which Señor Romero, General Doblado, and several representatives of the United Service, were present. On this occasion he made a speech on the subject of the present troubles in his native land. In fact, Mr. Mackenna has lost no opportunity, since landing in New York, to serve the Chilean cause. He appeared again at the Monroe Doctrine meeting, held on January 8, and spoke with most impassioned eloquence, holding his audience spell-bound for an hour, and, despite his slightly imperfect English, stamping himself as an orator of the highest caliber.

That he has the sympathies of our entire people with him is hardly worth asserting. The principles he advocates are those of all true Americans, and sooner or later must have full sway and utterance.

THE RIGHT REV. JOHN B. FITZPATRICK, BISHOP OF BOSTON.

JOHN B. FITZPATRICK, D.D., Catholic Bishop of Boston, died in that city on Monday, February 12th, aged 53 years, the immediate cause of his death being violent bleeding at the nose, produced from apoplexy.



Bishop Fitzpatrick was born in Boston, in November 1812. In the public schools of that city he received the preliminary education which fitted him for college. His college life was spent in Montreal, Canada, where his rare amiable disposition and his genuine intellectual and Christian qualities won for him the admiration of all his associates. After graduating at Montreal, he proceeded to Paris to finish more completely his education before assuming the solemn obligations of the priesthood. He was ordained there some time in 1840, and almost immediately upon his return to America he was settled over the Catholic Church in East Cambridge, Mass. He remained there but a brief time, however, for he was soon appointed coadjutor to the then Bishop Fenwick, of Boston, and was consecrated in March, 1844. Two years later, upon the death of Bishop Fenwick, his mantle fell on his coadjutor.

Twice after having become Bishop he visited Europe—first in 1854, on matters connected with church duties, and again in 1862 to seek relief for declining health. He returned from his last visit something over a year since, but instead of having found relief, it was evident to himself and friends that disease had seized him for a victim. Six months ago it was thought for several days in succession that he would live but a few hours, and for several days preceding his decease his death was expected at any moment. The spark of life would seem at times to die completely out, when he would suddenly revive and he comparatively convalescent for several days. Thus he lingered for weeks, and almost months, until at length, after passing through the sufferings of a declining life, his spirit was gently borne to its long and peaceful home.

THE Ambassador of Morocco, who recently arrived in Paris, brought, as a present to Louis Napoleon, six splendid stallions and a magnificent tiger.

THE ANCI[illegible]OF WILLIAM AND MARY'S, WILLIAMSBURGH, VA.

THE LATE RT. REV. J. B. FITZPATRICK, BISHOP OF BOSTON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY CODDINGTON, 306 BOWERY.

THE BALLAD OF THE WIND.

BY C. D. GARDETTE.

THE wind is an honest old rover;
Whatever the bards may sing;
He does us brave buffets on ocean,
As I rair Tuck dealt on his king.
When no moans, it is out of sorrow
For the wrecks he may not spare,
And is wails arise to the pitiless skies,
To shorus his victims' despair.

And the wind is a busy spirit,
With a spice of mischief crossed,
And neither his mirth nor his mischief
To the sons of men is lost.
He whistles an elfish jingle
For the autumn leaves to dance,
And bids the hosts of the storm to their posts,
And the thunder-steeds advance.

He snatches the odorous secrets
From the myrtle and orange leaves,
And whispers them through the arches
That the northern forest weaves;
He murmurs a slumberous ditty
In the ears of the bending grain,
And fleches their seed, with dexterous speed,
To sow on the distant plain.

He sweeps from the Northern Ocean,
Where the icebergs form the bars,
And shouts to the birds like a Viking,
With the frost-bead on his lips:
"The birds are the children of summer,
And the orchard boughs are bare!"
Lo, their wings are spread, and the pilgrimage
Is made.

To a land that the forest-elves spare.

In the weed-encumbered churchyard,
O'er the unremembered dead,
How often he chants a requiem
From the cypress overhead!
And upon the sea, at midnight,
When the wearied mariners rest,
To their dreams he comes, from lands far-off-homes,
With echoes that make them blest.

So the wind is a brave old rover,
Whatever the bards may say;
And his laugh and his sigh are welcome,
Wherever his spirit stray:
Should he come as the storm-king's herald,
Or the zephyr's soft-voiced sprite,
In sorrow or mirth, in the children of earth,
He claims to be heard aright.

CAUGHT BY THE SUN:

A PHOTOGRAPHER'S STORY.

BY W. H. DUFFIELD.

ONE can see Nature in a photograph-gallery better, perhaps, than in almost any other place. For six years I have been in the line of business, and have enjoyed many a quiet laugh over comical scenes. I have had sitters for half-hours, who considered clean boots impermissible, and were shocked at my refusal of blacking and brush; the inevitable baby has visited my establishment, and the equally inevitable mother has, in every case, shrouded herself in a shawl and crouched behind the chair, to keep it in position. Men and women who have disliked their pictures because they have told the truth and spared not, have been numerous; and one (an old man by the way) lately, offered me double price to "make her look twenty-one!" The young man from the country, who always sees so much water on a bald head, seems so uncomfortable, no matter how you sit him, has at times dropped in upon me—much to my disgust. The ladies who come to have their "shocking bad" taken, and the gentlemen who invariably "happens in" shortly after, have been frequent visitors; and I have sometimes, from causes, taken decent-sized pictures, with the distinct understanding that but two impressions were to be printed, and that then the negative was to be destroyed. I have had detectives search through all my stock for a clue to a missing face; but the strangest thing I ever knew occurred a year or so ago, and deserves more than a passing word.

No man of any mind can be content unless he is advancing—unless he is in some way making progress. With this I have often been impressed, and on this principle I have always acted. My trade—either, at any rate, for I consider it such—has been so greatly improved of late years, that, in order to keep pace with the times, I have regularly subscribed to two of the best photographic journals I could procure. They have given me many valuable hints, and from their pages I have derived far more actual profit than the expense which I incurred.

One day I noticed quite an article on instantaneous views, written by a practical photographer in England, and illustrated by cases in which the method prepared had met with great and startling unexpected success. To such a degree of perfection had it been carried, that a French artist, with a taste for the horrible, had contrived to get a very accurate picture of an execution, near Paris, just at the instant when the knife had fallen. The idea struck me as a good one; and the perusal of Dr. Holmes's paper in the Atlantic, on a similar subject (this of stereoscopic views), determined me on the experiment.

I spent my leisure time for several days in preparing my chemicals according to formula, and in arranging details, doing all with the mere purpose of improvement in my art, and demonstrating to myself the possibility of the statement. At last I was ready; and, being disengaged one afternoon, I left my boy to attend to callers, and tried several moving objects, with very satisfactory results. A horse on full trot was caught, with his feet in the air, but did not take so sharp a picture as I wished. Further experiment proved that the coating of the plate might be made still more sensitive, and so I was fairly mounted on my new hobby; men walking looked extremely ridiculous, when fixed by the sun-rays, and the whole impression was as if some one had petrified them with a single dash of light; Medusa's head was nothing to it—and, by the way, I question whether this myth had not some connection with this science, and whether photography might not once have actually been among the number of the lost arts. But to speak of my experiments. As I have said, I was reasonably successful, and it encouraged me to fill up my gaps in this manner. I became famous for my accuracy in taking children's pictures, and so applied my knowledge to practical use.

Still I kept on with my investigations, and, at last, ventured to try a large crowd, assembled around a traveling juggler, on the corner below. The distance was great, and if the camera had not been very fine and the chemicals working well, I should have failed utterly. As it was, I achieved a brilliant victory over all my doubts; every line was clear, and on holding the negative to the light, I could see that I "developed" it just enough—just to that golden mean between faintness and shadow. If I ever made love to a picture, I did to that. I rinsed the hands but my own to print it, and by so doing lost several sitters. One lady remarked, audibly, as she went down-stairs, that I was "a horrid man." He had Mr. Farnum so cross and surly. For her part, she'd never come near him again!" All of which was consoling to me, as I was conscious of my own strength; but I couldn't leave that negative for fifteen minutes, at any cost, let her say what she would.

It came out beautifully clear and distinct. I kept the first impression for myself, and hung another in my show-case at the entrance below, where it added greatly to my reputation. As it showed the outline of the city, with a dozen fine residence or two beside, I was asked to make several copies, and sold them accordingly. I found that, after the first day's work, my fortune and my justifiable remarks, had not damaged me in the slightest. I became specially the leading artist of the place, and the city fathers patronized me from any connection with photography leaves me perfectly free to state. I had orders to obtain views of the dwellings of members of the common council, and I am proud to say, did the work well, among others, that of Hon. Henry Ware, the member from our district, and a short, dry, sour gentleman. Mr. Ware had once learned the trade, was very fond of it still, in an amateur way, and, of course, must have a good picture, but he was so crabbed as to say nothing of the fact that Miss Julia Ware, then eighteen, was taken, by her father's directions, sitting at the open window of the front room. She was his only child, and, of course, he had a perfect right to do what he pleased. I wished, however, that he had not asked, that she had been anywhere else but there.

When the proof was printed, I mounted it carefully, and carried it to the house, that I might have their united opinion upon its merits. That opinion was very flattering on every side, especially from the young man, who declared it perfect without stint or measure. His quick eye caught the fact that, while the whole view was sharp and well defined, that of the lady sitter at the window was possible in focus. Of this both parents, much to my delight, expressed thorough approbation. I hardly knew why, but I thought I had been so well pleased could they have learned the true reason. That came afterward.

I had been favored by the newly habits from principle. Although I had been in the place a year, I had made but few acquaintances among the young men, and, consequently, I was easy to say, far from desirable companions. From the three other photographers I obtained a very moderate share of kindness and sympathy; my rival calling at my rooms, in order to agree with me as to prices, &c., and the latter never more or less than once. Save his friends, however, I had learned to like already, and for one I possessed a sincere regard. A student not merely by name, his education as limited, and he had given his love to chemistry, and my own interest in its practical application attracted him to me. He was a modest something from me; I know that I did from him, and the latter beside me, signed, "Yours truly, Lewis F. Gray," and my sense of friendship is not yet among the things that were.

Gray came to my room one evening, with a fine view mirrored in his eyes.

"Farnum," said he, "here's a curious thing;" and he opened the instrument, and placed under the microscope a common pocket-knife. "Look for yourself," he added, "and answer me if ever you saw a truth-teller like the sun?"

He was a knife with the base of a ruined pillar, covered with vine-curls. Under the stereoscope it looked distant and slightly dim; but with a low power of the microscope it was wonderfully distinct. Even to the smallest type the placard could be read, the only knowledge needed being that of Italian writing. And, scattered here, bold marks in chalk and charcoal—incendiary inscriptions some of them—scrawled there by idle or designing hands.

I studied long over this and others, surprised even in spite of my previous information on the subject. It opened a new field of interest to me both, and our conversation turned directly on the strange properties of collodion, by which the number of objects rendered obtained to be so limitless. I mentioned the belief of a French astronomer that he could at last discover the composition of the moon by successive photographs of a magnified portion of the original. "If," ran the theory, "every object is imprinted upon the collodion; if strong magnifying power but serves to develop new images; if an enlarged portion of a photograph can be re-photographed without detriment—why may not this same operation be performed upon portions of the great three-foot likeness of the moon, and these photographed portions be magnified and photographed until we come close upon the very surface we are trying to behold?"

"I believe it possible," said Gray, "after this evidence that nothing, however small or invisible to the naked eye, fails to leave its image. The only drawback I see is the degree of sensitiveness which can be imparted to the collodion. And that difficulty, I think, can be overcome."

"I hope so," I replied, "for I see no other way of attaining the result." And then, as an idea suddenly crossed my mind, I added, "Let us look at that penknife once more-stencil-view of mine. It may prove interesting."

"Very well," said Gray, "if you think it is clear enough to stand a high power test."

I got the first impression which I had taken with such care. It was larger than the stereoscopic slides, and, consequently, more than the lowest power of the microscope to make it distinct. We amused ourselves for some time in recognizing our acquaintances in the crowd, and laughing at their strange positions; some with their heads thrust in between others, and one, a little man, straining upon up-toe to get his full share of wonderment. Several mouths were wide open, to Gray's great merriment, and the whole picture, under the magnifying quality of the instrument, took a most ludicrous turn. All eyes were on the juggler, and many appeared to be laughing at him almost as heartily as we were at them. We had only seen the figures before as a well-defined group—now the full details some out magnificently.

All at once Gray, who was moving the microscope over another part of the crowd, gave a perfect shout of laughter, and dropped back in his chair. I hurried to see what had amused him, and found my fellow-countryman, with both hands in his pocket, staring at the juggler, while a well-dressed man, whose face seemed a stranger from the rear, was extracting from his coat. The utter unconsciousness of the one, and the evident cunning of the other, were too much for my gravity, and I joined chorus with Gray on the instant.

When we recovered ourselves enough to look once more, the man was trying a high power on the object which was being stolen. He did so, and found it, though partially concealed, to be a perfect rendering of nature's mistake. The farmer's face was turned away. That of the thief was in profile, and on the little finger of the hand which held the prize was the faint appearance of a seal ring. Nothing but the strong power of a fine microscope could have reached these small details, but the instance so interested, that he did it satisfactorily in far less time than I could have accomplished it, unused as I was to the instrument. It was the knife photographed as belonging to a certain Wilson Granger, who was at that time a comparatively new-comer, and a perfect "man about town." His manner he always declared were simple, and though not complete success in pocket-picking, no one had ever shown cause why he should be charged with anything out of the way. Indeed his good behavior had set in, and, all unarmed projectiles, that he had met on friendly terms with many of our best citizens. His landlady had once replied to the remark of a fellow-boarder, that if he only came in as early as Mr. Granger, she would be fully content. Which let me say in parenthesis, was a high and lasting foundation, insomuch as the aforesaid boarder lodged on the second story, immediately over Granger's room, and that the latter was indicated to a second at what hour of the small hours any person or persons passed up-stairs.

It was true that Mr. Granger had a fine horse and often drove alone—but where was the harm in that? It was established, on the contrary, that if polite men had a failing it was most courteous; that he was at no time a corner lounger; that he went, at least openly, into no saloons; that, in short, he was well-conducted, and, withal, minded his own affairs. Of such low theft as picking pockets no one, not even the most inveterate gossip, ever had him accused. He was a new comer, then, so singularly before us, was astonishing—not to say astounding.

I looked at Gray. He had ceased to laugh, and was examining the position of matters in general with a very serious face. Our united information had led to the casual just given, but Gray had one item more.

"I say, Farnum!" he exclaimed after a moment's silence, "is this Granger's name has been visiting at Judge Ware's a good deal lately."

"Has he?" said I, trying to appear unconcerned—which I could not.

"And what's more, I think Julia Ware likes to have him come."

"You—you do—say—so!" I ejaculated, for really I had never thought of that before.

"Yes, I do, and the Judge don't hear of this paper of his would-be son-in-law, my name ain't what it is. That's all."

"That's all," said I, secretly rejoiced, I must confess, at the turn affairs had taken. "But how do you suppose the photograph caught him, and how people did it? It seems strange enough, I'm possibly do it. Practice makes perfect, you know, and my practice is first-rate."

"All right," said Gray, cheerfully; "I can explain it, then. His motion was quick, but yours was quicker; it must have been. That single ray of light caught him in the act before he could get his hand to his side. What was, therefore, from its quickness, invisible to others, was seized and fastened here. Anything in the way of motion under a quarter of a second is absolutely impracticable by human eye, but this great eye—almost of God himself—has fixed the crime, that we both may read it for ourselves."

"And to think of Julia Ware being his wife—the wife of a pickpocket!—we must let the Judge know this at every risk."

"We must, indeed," I said; and I meant it with all my heart.

"But do you know them well enough to call at the house with me?" asked Gray.

I owed it to the Judge's republican as well as scientific tastes that I could answer:

"Yes."

"Very good, now hear my plan. Can you print enlarged impressions?"

"I can if I have the means of getting up the apparatus properly."

"I'll help you," said Gray. "For this thing must be enlarged and re-photographed, and then we will go and call."

And with a word or two more of further arrangement, he left me and went home.

I retired to rest that night as usual, but did not sleep. Here was a chance to me a revelation that I, a poor photographer, loved a girl with whom I had spoken but twice—the daughter of one of our wealthiest men.

Next day it seemed as if the plot was thickening with a vengeance, for Granger himself came in to add to a picture. By dint of a little careful flattery I succeeded in having him choose also a profile view—not knowing but it might prove of use. He was very accommodating, and left me, I turned to my work with anything but dissatisfaction. Gray would not be in until evening, and I was therefore left free to arrange a part of my projected apparatus.

I had almost completed when he came—though his impatience was as great as mine, and brought him to me between school hours at noon. We discussed the projections, and by night, when he returned, the pickpocket and his victim were displayed in carte de visite size, the former facing to the right toward the edge, and the thief in full focus-profile view and all. It required much care, and occupied my whole time, to the exclusion of all else before, of several sitters, who left in the worst imaginable humor.

When I heard Gray bounding up the stairs that evening, I knew that he must be bringing good news.

"Farnum," he said, with as much breath as he had left, "I've talked it with the Judge. I saw him just now, told him of my new microscope, and informed him that it would afford me great pleasure to show Mrs. Ware and Julia a few photographic curiosities some evening, if they were so disposed. You know how enthusiastic he is. Well, he called with the offer immediately, and, much to my amusement, invited me to come myself, and 'bring my friend Farnum,' this evening. I'm afraid, though, that's a little too soon for the big dash. What do you think?"

I told him that I was all prepared, however, and added that I would call when Granger's business ended.

"Better and better!" exclaimed Gray, rubbing his hands, delightedly. "Why, if we had been planning for everything, we couldn't have done it more to our wish."

"Does any one know of this, except you and I?"

I asked the question anxiously, for to lose the thread here was to fail with a most ignominious failure.

"No one, not even Mary" (I knew who Mary was, but I should tell her, if I told it at all)."

I drew a long breath, for the game was ready to begin, and I thought we were ready to play it.

At a little after eight o'clock that evening we were walking in the last glory of the setting sun through Judge Ware's garden gate. Gray had the microscope with him, as least conspicuous, was to do the talking; Gray was to spring the trap—for Granger would be there.

The family had entered and saw no one but the family in the room. Could it be possible, I asked myself, that he might not come? Could he have left the city? Or we might fail in our aim? Might we not, like poor Don Quixote, have difficulty in making our ideas understood? Was it not, after all, too desperate experiment with other people's business? Doubts came thicker than the troubles out of Pandora's box; but, in spite of every fear, Hope, then as ever, stays, lingered behind. I do think, however, that if I had been compelled to engineer the plot, we should never have been successful, but Gray had no such thought. He sat there, quiet and polite, and while three photographs were handing about in my breast-pocket, he was perfectly unmoved.

We discussed the weather, the crops, the prospects of the coming book, poetry, politics, all equally agreeable topics of itself and heavy conversation—and yet Granger did not come.

Eight struck, and a ring at the bell.

"Oh, there is Mr. Granger," said Miss Julia, with great vivacity; and, sure enough, it was he indeed.

"Mr. Granger—Mr. Gray—Mr. Farnum," and we were all in our seats again.

Gray explained how to behave and how to talk. To the Judge and his good lady he was especially courteous, dropping a compliment to the one and a low bow and then an apology as if his education had been finished in the highest circles of Parisian fashion. To us he was pleasant-like, agreeable. But all I thought of was that hand with the seal ring, holding the watch.

It seemed hours before politeness lit up the room, and politeness began to exhibit the stereoscopic views, but the time came at last. To the Judge, and Granger especially, the entertainment afforded great delight—real on one side, apparent fancy, on the other. We looked once more at the Roman pillar, and, under pretense of the fineness of the image, Gray contrived to have the splendid argand burners shedding a flood of light upon the objects to be examined.

Finally he took the picture of the evening and placed it beneath the leaves. Portion by portion they went over the crowd, till Gray adjusted the instrument once more, put on a stronger power, and coolly said:

"Look here, Judge!"

The crisis had come, and fairly held my breath.

The Judge looked—looked again—gave a smothered exclamation, and started back. Now was my time.

"Mr. Granger," said I, "here is the proof of the profile you had taken this morning."

I believe I emphasized profile—at all events, it passed it to him across the Judge, and in full view. As Granger reached to get it, I took it back from my hand, gave it a sharp glance, and looked down the tube once more.

"Pardon me, Judge Ware," said Granger, "But this is very extraordinary!"

"It is indeed—very extraordinary, I should say; and something else besides," growled the person addressed. "Tell me what this means? I'd like to know!" and he motioned Granger to look through the microscope.

Granger did look—changed color slightly, and then met the Judge's gaze with perfect command of countenance.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"I mean that that is you," said the Judge shaking his cane in the fewest possible words.

"I really beg your pardon," began Granger but Gray interrupted him.

"Mr. Granger has an enlarged view of that figure," said he.

I took it from my pocket and laid it side by side with the profile in the Judge's hands. He turned and held them both before his wife, who had stood, with Julia, in utter amazement. She saw the whole case in an instant. The magnified view (the best of twenty trials) was as like to the profile in all respects as two pictures were able to be. I had taken good care of that.

"If you really believe," remarked Granger, a shade whiter than before, "that this is a proper portrait, I have the honor of wishing you a good evening and better judgment. I trust that I shall hear very shortly that you acknowledge yourself deceived."

Polite as ever, he bowed, and hurried away, but I saw him from one glance at Julia. She was pale as ivory, and as rigid. If she had been struck dead she could not have been more white and still.

Granger moved on toward the entrance to the hall.

"Walk, sir!" thundered the Judge, leaping forward and placing his back against the door. "You do not leave this room till you explain your position in this accursed."

I will not attempt to describe the scene that followed. The ladies, contrary to the usual custom of the sex, at such times, were speechless. Granger was calm at first; but grew excited, blustered, appealed to his reputation, called Gray and myself hard names, and ended by defying the Judge to do his worst.

In half an hour he was seated by a constable in the Judge's carriage, and with that elegant officer on the box, and Gray and myself inside, was going to visit the nearest jail.

On the back photographic pictures, interesting and conclusive as they were, did not serve as the entire evidence. Facts stronger even than they, started on suspicion and searched down to truth, charged him unmistakably with being concerned in several robberies. The landlady's boast of his early habits was, moreover, destroyed at once and for ever, and the wakefulness of her people called in serious question by the testimony of a lodger in the house. That man was the identical person at whom the poodle always barked, and before whose eyes the shadow and sample of Mr. Granger had incessantly been kept.

His hand seized one night after he returned home—from desperation, for his calling, as all liquor, discomfited, most heartily, the counsel for the defense—but from hard work and good thinking over a ledger. He rose softly from his bed to bed and sat by the window, in the warm summer air, pondering (as the cross-examination showed), the possibilities of success or failure in a certain business scheme.

The night was perfectly still, somewhat overcast by clouds, and yet bright enough for distinguish objects, provided they were not at too great a distance. He had sat in this manner more than twenty minutes, according to the best of his knowledge and belief. Having retired at twelve, and lain sleepless for a full hour, he felt convinced, during an arithmetical exercise, that time must have been, at the very least, half-past one, when he heard the window below him softly raised to its full height. And then—with the exactness of memory—he remembered noticing that Granger's sash had been but partially lifted on the night window which was now opening wider.

From this manner his attention was called on the probable meaning of the slight, stealthy sound. The weather, of itself, would rather incline the occupant of the room to close than to open his apartment, although it was by no means cool.

Presently out came a leg, then another, then a body, gently and softly, which lowered itself by its hands from the sill. The man above thought of robbery, while he listened as he could for the alarm, the figure below dropped lightly on the ground, took from his pocket a pistol, looked at it, and, lifting, with a step which seemed very like Granger's, was firm and heavy, but gave no sound, passed down the street.

The man in the window above was now thoroughly interested. The closest cross-examination failed afterward to detect in his evidence any trace of confusion of mind, head-ache, or even sleepiness. He put on sufficient clothing to prevent the chance of a cold in the head, and came back once more to his post. If it was a robber, he reflected, he had taken no apparent plunder, and the circumstance, which had at first caused him to give no alarm, pointed to a conclusion which must be verified by any hazard. That circumstance was the raising of the window sash. If the man, he reflected further, was a robber, who had been in and was coming out, he would have left the sash up beyond a question. The man, then, he concluded, was probably Granger himself.

So the watcher kept on his self-appointed station till the stars began to grow dim in the eastern sky. If it was indeed Granger, she would come soon.

And come he did, with nothing more than he carried away, except something to hide in. He stepping hastily onward toward his own first-story window. All this the sentinel above, hiding behind the curtains, but getting a full view of the figure below, with an active spring, caught the sill of the window, and then quietly, dexterously, and quickly, with both hands and feet at once, was pulled gently to its old position, and then the sounds, faint as they had been, were ended.

The watcher above went to his bed. He, too, moved softly across the floor. He, too, lay silently down. He, too, slept until the rising bell.

Lying there, half-dressed, when that had sounded, he thought over what he should do, and how he should best manage. He knew no person on whose thorough integrity and courage, as a companion, he could sufficiently rely. So he lay down for his ninth standing night against Granger's, and even were it allowed, he could prove no actual criminality. On the other hand, the landlady's favorite assertion encouraged always by Granger, and verified almost constantly—was, that no one ever left the house, or came in, on the night-time without the notice of Trip, her dog. She slept at the end of the lower hall, by the foot of the stairs. Between her door and those of the one, were two closets and a pantry, over which she and Trip kept, like the dragon of the Hesperides, watch and ward.

If he should then make oath, he considered, his testimony as to extraordinary exits and entrances would be insufficient to convict Granger, and would besides disqualify himself for future evidence, and make gratuitously one more enemy than he already possessed.

Then (and afterward) he cast about him for a man to whom he could safely confide this thing; but two months passed before a "confidential friend's" plan was as far from success as before. Granger came to breakfast every morning as prompt; and whether in the room or the kitchen, secure in his freedom from every kind of confederacy, and have eventually escaped in spite of this watcher, with a sigh of relief, a question at all, but a foregone conclusion, one in which the effect follows readily from a sound cause, the timidity, the hesitation—call it what you will—of the lodger above.

He was one of those men who never have confidence in themselves, never take it unless it is thrust upon them by injury to them or theirs. Other men may suffer, and suffer acutely, and even die of it sincerely, their own self-interest triumphs over their humanity. Curiosity led him to track every thing with Granger, and to keep the key of Trip, until the man was caught and placed in prison. And then, like the world in general, he made a few sneers, and then forgot the whole thing, unless so quiet were appreciated by many who knew him.

I, myself, remember well how fully I was convinced at the time of what I have just said, and I remember also, a remark of Gray, that, "if that school of reasoning were presented by the ablest Mr. Appelbonn and the stonishing Mr. Grossmith. Fenton, Esq., in full dress, with white kid gloves, short knee-breeches, woolen stockings, and big wig, will be the Vice-President, and will preside, representing the O'Mahony interest, with a full complement of Fenian officers on the platform. A good specimen of Fenians, representing the character truly and fairly, as also the Irish people generally, will be John Rossa might be mentioned.

The chair will be further surrounded and followed by an array of Irish ladies:

Miss Fenton (Mrs. Grossmith) (Mrs. Trisco), Rose Coghlan (Mrs. Boucicault—Procter's Actress), Kate (Mrs. Hermann) and Forget-me-Not (Miss Tray). The ladies wear Irish green and gold—yellow, green, and white tartans, dotted respectively with gold and silver stars, like those of the Irish flag, and are provided with the character to be represented. Crowns of flowers adorned the heads of the ladies.

Eight large dahlias.

Ninth dahlia—Fenian superior.—Flagbearer and Director, Marshal as student (an original bookmaker). Permanent Secretary, Mr. Boucicault, for festivals. Those also representing characters who took a prominent part in the Skedaddle.

Then the following glee-clubs, with large drinking-horns, and other paraphernalia: Crying Academy of Gotthorn; Bull-Frog's Vale Glee Club; Jersey Flats Lederkranz; Blatherskite Club; Hoboken Liar and Mosquito Chorus; Washington Territory Mixed Chorus.

Then the Committee of the Fifteenth Ward, accompanied by Brennan, preceded by a dilettanti band, playing tunes decidedly Irish, and followed by Gray's Family Lederkranz, Capt. Hesse, commander.

Then the Committee of Arrangements. This procession and its ludicrous belongings must fall the pencil in a better instructive and beautiful hand than mine. The serious part of the story.

This idle talk is given as the festivals of the carnival are given in Paris and Rome. The carnival originated during the sixth century, when by Pope Gregory the Lesson of Lent was introduced, and it originated from the pagan festivities among the Christian Romans, which were known as saturnalias. The zealous were much opposed to the introduction of these heathen festivities among the early Christians, who on these occasions would put masks on their faces, and dress as demons and ghosts. They good worship, like the original pagans, Bacchus and Venus, and engage in all kinds of carious and excessive pastimes. The carnival season lasted from Epiphany until the season of Lent. On a most extensive scale the carnival was celebrated at Rome and Venice, where the carnival is still celebrated with a great deal of prominence. At some places these peculiar festivities were continued only for eight days, and at other places only three days were devoted to the saturnalias. At Venice, the carnival consists of a series of masquerade entertainments, masquerades and public demonstrations on the Piazza of St. Mark, and when princes are in attendance, regattas and races are in order. Formerly, a second carnival was celebrated at Venice, on the occasion of the marriage of the Doge with the Adriatic. The carnival at Rome is generally accompanied by a horse race, and consists of a series of masquerades and races. In Germany, the carnival is more closely connected with the festivals of Lent, and is prominently celebrated at Cologne and Mayence. The carnival at Nice will be rescheduled. It derived from the Latin words carne levamen, as it includes the consumption of meats. From Italy the carnival and the Christian Romans were introduced in other countries of Europe, especially Southern Germany. From the mummeries of the Germans originated the dances of the Swiss cantons, and the town of Basle. Most Fastnachts plays were represented by the Swiss. Fastnachts plays were performed in Lower Germany, and the Netherlands. Some of the French and the natives of the English, which originated in the same way.

In this country the carnival has been introduced by the Germans, and is celebrated especially by the Arion. In New York, the carnival of the Arion ball will be complete. Every year the society improves; and this year, itself and the leading association of its kind in this country, it has a reputation to uphold which it will not lose, as it has this year, the most brilliant affair of the kind ever given on this continent. Extraordinary efforts will be expended to this end, though the tickets were $10 each, twice the quantity could have been sold. Had they been ten dollars each, they would be high as $30 were offered, and given, for a single ticket!

ICE IN THE RIVER.

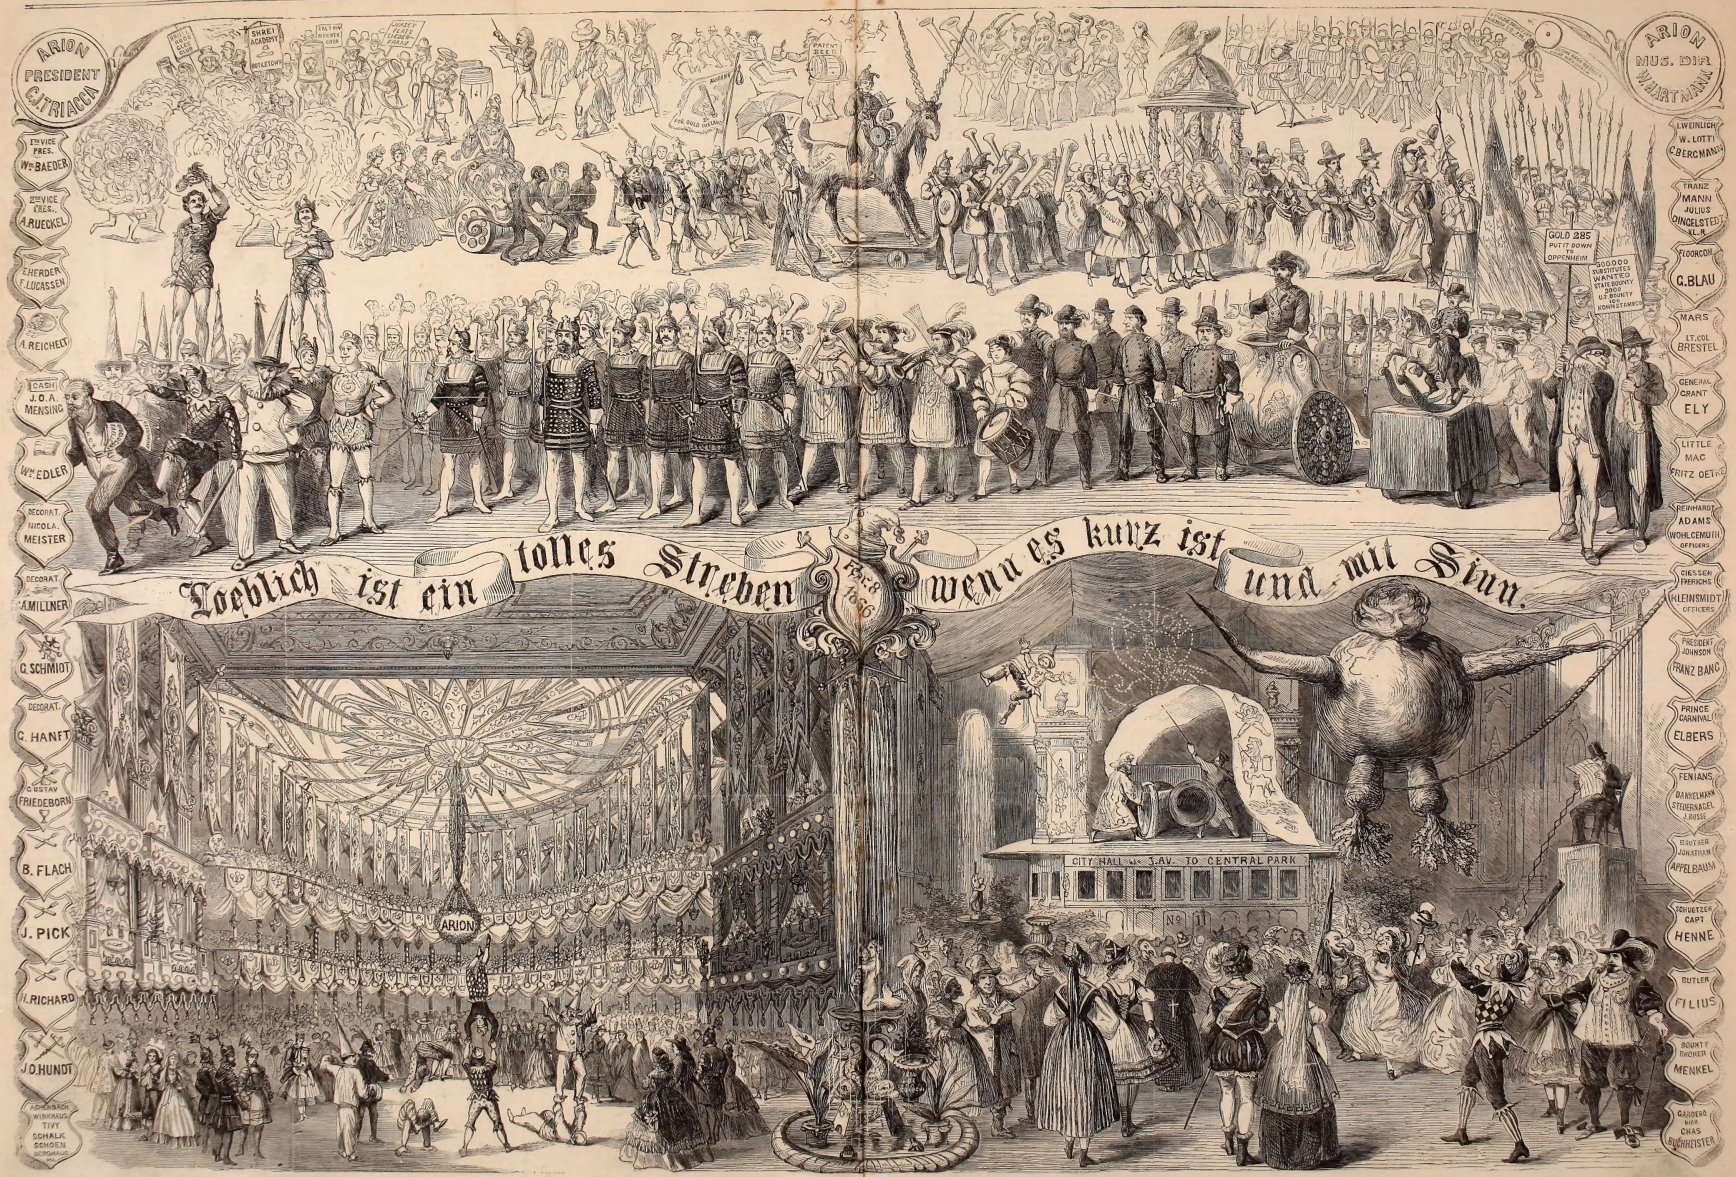
A Scene at Hoboken Ferry.

NEW YORK city is possessed of more physical disadvantages than any other city in the world. It is so shaped that its people can be driven but one way, which is to the north or upper end of the island. In consequence of the immense number of people seeking dwelling room, or traveling in almost any direction must cross some of the numerous ferries. But in the warm weather is rather a pleasure than a pain, but when winter puts on its icy garb, is sometimes productive of serious inconvenience.

During the late cold snap, ice formed so rapidly as almost to impede navigation, and the ferry-boats of the Brooklyn and Jersey City Ferries found extreme difficulty pushing through. If this was the case with the large boats, it can be imagined what trouble was been the fate of the third-rate ones of the Hoboken ferry, and yet with what a few days ago was but a treat to the ice, and carried out toward the sea, being seven hours floating or pushing about to the inlet, with all her passengers on board, the boats make the shore.

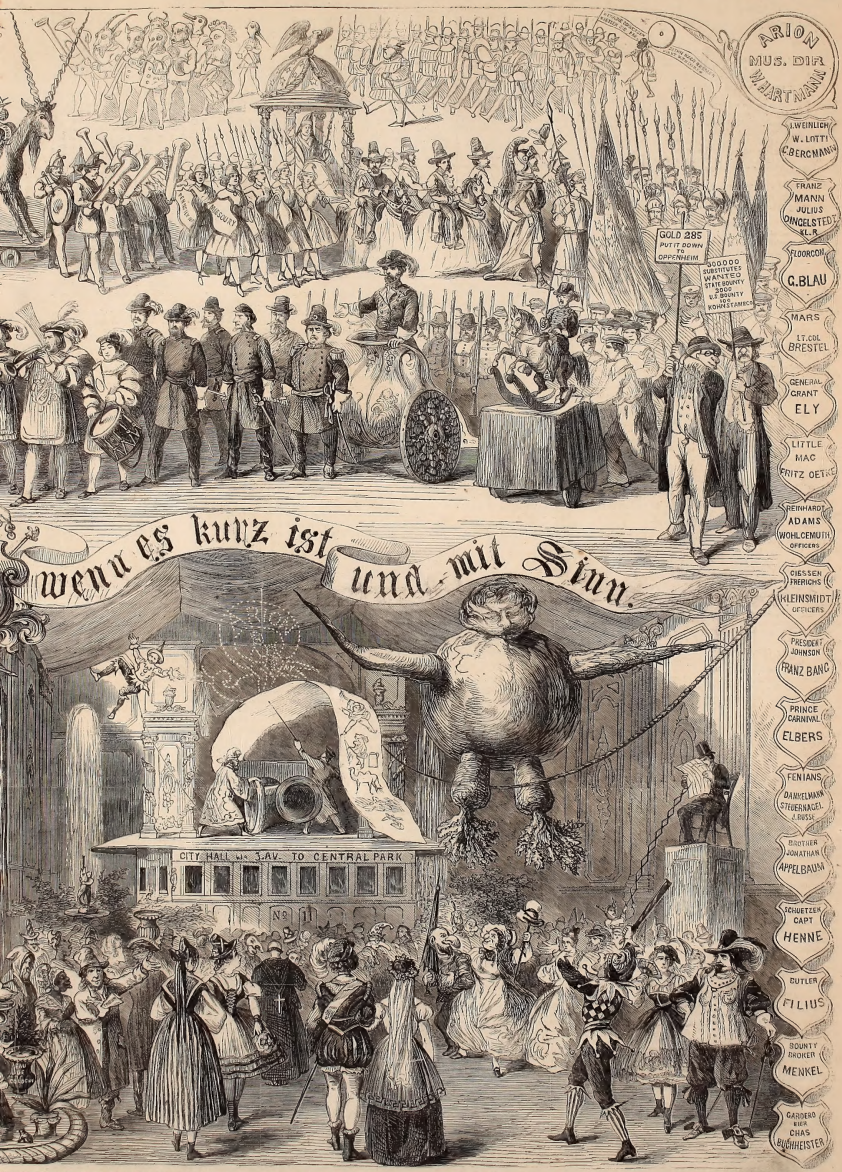
The Hoboken Ferry, from being the terminus on the New Jersey side of the great railroads, has become a ferry of first consequence, and at certain hours in the day has call for a force of boats capable of carrying large numbers of people with but a very short space of time.

The accompanying is taken at one of those times when the rush of passengers is greatest, just about dark. Then not only the workmen and women are returning to their homes, but the passengers going by the different trains are pressing forward. The ice has formed so rapidly that the slips are filled as soon as engines and barriers, and the crowd in mad haste rush aboard the already crowded boat, in confusion and hurry running over those who endeavor to get off. In less time than it takes to relate it, the boat was crowded with the same mass of people as the whole, sex, and size, but yet only a moiety of those who waited on the other side. And the last passenger on board of the outs, and a human wall was formed across the boat, which beat back the invading party time after time, and in so doing many were pushed overboard—and into the water, for the ice was so firmly packed in the dock that it required much force to push a sub-lodgement.



In a few minutes the people on the boat, feeling that they were secure from further invasion, positively refused to allow another person to come on board, and expelled those who had. The scene of pushing and struggle now on every inch of the immense boat, the voyage across the river was made—a voyage which was not to be soon fraught with peril than any that has ever been made across the river, and which the writer can testify to from that ocean every year when the ice is in the river.

GEN. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD



Was born in Leeds, Maine, November 8th, 1830. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1850, and immediately entered the West Point Academy, where he remained till 1854, and was appointed to the Ordnance Department as Brevet Second Lieutenant. In July, 1857, he was made First Lieutenant, and, subsequently, was ordered to the West Coast, where he served as Acting Assistant Professor of Mathematics, in which capacity he remained till 1861. When the war broke out under way, Gen. Howard resigned his First Lieutenant's Commission in the Ordnance Department, so that he might accept the position of Colonel of a regiment of Volunteers, September 3, 1861. His brigade formed part of Sumner's Division, and fought at Fair Oaks, and in the battle of Fair Oaks, June 1, 1862, had his right arm shot off. He was made Major-General of Volunteers, November 29th, 1862.

Gen. Howard's division, in Sumner's Corps, which formed part of Sumner's Right Grand Division, or, in other words, the right wing of the Army of the Potomac. Howard's Division, with Newton's, of Franklin's Grand Division, were the only troops which participated in the action of Burnside's battle of Fredericksburg. At the battle of Chancellorsville, Gen. Howard commanded the Eleventh Corps, which behaved very badly on that occasion, but no fault is attributed to the commander, since he was not present. He was Major-General of Volunteers on November 29th, 1863.

The natives of Bombay, India, are much excited by the operation of lighting the streets by gas, just completed. Long before the lamps are usually lighted on an evening, numbers of natives may be seen grouping around the lamp-posts, and when the Lamplighter approaches (followed by a ragamuffin crowd), the greatest excitement prevails, the strongest pushing the weakest, in their endeavors to secure the best possible place. After a little preliminary chaffing, the lighter ascends the ladder, and when the illumination is complete, the mob heave a sigh of relief, and quickly sit down at the foot of the post, and, with upturned faces, gaze into the lamp for hours, with every now and then their chin the post with their hands, to feel whether it gets hot. The mystery why the road does not get the same ordered solve, and they argue for hours together upon the and waste of the question; until, fairly tired out, they return to their homes, to dream of the wonders produced by "Bath."

THE GREAT BALL OF THE ARION SOCIETY, AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, FOURTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 8TH.—THE PROCESSION.—THE STAGE FROM THE FRONT, AND THE BOXES FROM THE STAGE.

EBRUARY 8TH—THE PROCESSION—THE STAGE FROM THE FRONT, AND THE BOXES FROM THE STAGE.

A DEAD LOVE.

BY LIZZIE B. COOKE.

ASHORE on the beach of the surging sea
Of moaning and bitter memory,
Came a drifting corpse, in the morning light,
So sea-weed draped, and so ghastly white;
Alone on the sands, by the black waves thrown,
Close clung its curls in a net of foam,
And purpled the tide o'er its darkling eyes,
Once holding such speechless mysteries.

Beside it I crouch on the reddening sands,
Fast fall hot tears on its sodden hands,
And I wring from the shrouded the salt sea spray,
But I could not warm that stiffened clay;
Nor could kisses bring back to life or bliss
One smile of the love once deemed so true,
Nor could break their silence, to murmur low
Dear, tender names of the long ago.

And there, on the sands, in the lurid light
Of the breaking morn, in the dews of night,
'Neath the gleam of stars and the moon's pale grace,
It haunts me always, that cold, dead face;
For in sea-weed shrouded, by cold winds blown,
With curls caught up in a net of foam,
It lies on the sands of that surging sea
Of moaning and bitter memory.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MARK," "REDDER'S WAY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXIX.—A DREAD ALTERNATIVE.

"HEM! and now what is to be done, my dear?" The doctor sat in his old bachelor with his daughter, in the pretty morning room at Peterham, put the question in a rather sad and dubious tone. He had been listening to Clarissa's account of her interview with Phillis Conyngham, and had sat wiping his spectacles, and not uttering a word till she had finished; then he put them on, and, cocking at her pale face, sorrowfully said:

"Hem! and now what is to be done, my dear?"

"Pray, my dearest Clarissa, "we must make Sleuth set her free."

"Can he?"

"He must; he must exert every power he has to do so."

"But, my dear, will he?"

"I doubt it, my child," replied Clarissa, in a low voice, which seemed to contain more meaning than her words. "I think he will. It shall not be my fault if he does not."

"How do you mean, not your fault, Clarissa? What are you going to do?"

"To ask Sleuth to come to send this," said Clarissa, giving him a little note addressed to Sleuth.

The doctor read it. It contained but a line or two, requesting an interview with Mr. Sleuth, at his own house, that morning, and indicating her intention to wait for him without waiting for an answer.

The doctor laid it down with an air of grave bewilderment.

"Clarissa, my dear, is this absolutely necessary?"

"Yes, papa; I must see him."

"But why in this manner?"

"Why? papa, you know as if repeating his words; and then, leaning her chin on her hand, and looking down in sad thoughtfulness, she remained silent for some time.

She raised her eyes with a clear, determined look in them, and shook her head mournfully.

"Yes, it must be, I must see him alone, because I may know—if he refuse me about Phillis —I may have to put some questions to him which, as yet, must only be put to him alone. Another person present might ruin all my chances of success."

"But, my dear child—hem!—my dear child, I cannot bear the thought of your being concerned in such a shocking affair."

"Papa," said Clarissa, quietly, "it is not a thought, it is a fact, that has to be borne. I am concerned in it, all, and so deeply, I sometimes wonder——"

"My poor child!" murmured the doctor, as she buried her face in her hands, and wept silently.

"I accompanied Phillis Conyngham on a minute, lifting up her face and clasping her thin hands, "if the real criminal, whoever he is, suffers more than I do for my having done so, my frightful nights, or if he waits in more sickening suspense than I do for the end."

The doctor looked the little note, and weighed it on two fingers very sadly. He turned it about, this side and that, and pondered over it, but could not like the look of it, that he would.

"I know, my dear," he said, laying it down, and pushing it out of his sight, "I know you feel this deeply—deeply, my child; but still the English court of justice is the finest in all the world. Trust to it, my dear, and never think that you can see deeper than it. If he is innocent, it will prove his innocence. Trust to it."

"Mistakes have been made—fearful mistakes."

"Well, well, at all events, you can do nothing, Clarissa. Wait patiently, and trust in God."

"I do," said Clarissa; "and if I felt it to be His will that I should be only patient and calm, I would try and bow to it—but this I do not feel. Day and night something tells me my part in this great calamity is not to sit still and endure, but to be up and doing. I have no comforting glimpses of the end, every thought of it is fearful. I have no sleep, but I wake in agony, lest, in sleeping, I have lost a thought that might have saved him. So, no, I must do something; and, papa, you must hinder—you will help me?"

"Clarissa, be calm and listen," said the doctor.

"How! Let me ask you, my child, if you remember what the consequences will be if you should be the means of saving Anthony?"

They looked at one another in terrible silence, and every bit of color died out of Clarissa's lips.

"You will also be the means of hanging—"

"Hush!" she cried, throwing herself on her knees, and catching his hands in an agony of entreaty. "Hush, hush! I know, I know! But what shall I do? Save Anthony I must, if I can; and I think I can at that—in it prize."

The doctor laid his face on his hands.

"The man has sat at my table," he muttered.

"The other has sat there as your son," sobbed she.

"I have taught him how to bear prosperity."

"And the other has taught the world how to bear poverty."

"I—I had really given him my friendship."

"To the other I gave my love for my daughter."

"He has been my neighbor and friend for nearly four years."

"He has been my affianced husband as long."

"My child, my child, can this band he has grasped so often and so gratefully, move to destroy him?"

"My father, my father, can these lips that have kissed his betray him by their silence?"

Clarissa, he came to me to ask me to be his friend."

"Father, he came to you to ask to be your son."

"It would be a fearful return for my kindness."

"Hush! I know; but think of what horror this has been to me, and is. My very soul is bruised with his shame; I cannot shut out the foul weight of them, and so it will be to the end, if such an end as I think of comes. The sentence of death would fall on me, not on Phillis. Only you, though I will move heaven and earth to avert it, I tell you, I believe it will fall on him—on Anthony——"

"Hush! my darling, hush!"

"I do, I do! I hear it in the night—I stop my ears to it in vain. I feel it in my veins. You will refuse me your help; I shall be faint-hearted, slow, too late, and he will die. Anthony!"

She sobbed out his name with such a passion of anguish and despair, that all her strength seemed to pass from her with the cry.

"Help me!" was what she could say, turning her eyes on the doctor's face imploringly, as he raised her in his arms.

"I will, Clarissa—trust me, I will. And now, my child, you must be calmer and better before we take another step. Come, come, lie down."

"Yes, yes: I will soon be quite calm, quite well. And will you think while I rest? I could not rest, last night; but perhaps I can rest now if I know some one is thinking for him."

"I will. Now go—go, and get some sleep."

The doctor remained looking at her pale face for some minutes after she had gone.

"I wonder if she will sleep?" he thought. "Poor child, I had better let her rest about the note, at all events. Yes, I'll tell her that shall go."

So he went and opened her door very gently, half in hopes she might be already asleep.

She was not asleep, but kneeling beside her bed, her hands clasped, and her beautiful face distorted by the holy passion of prayer.

"How good she is!" said the doctor, when he returned to his study, and sat down with moist eyes. "How wise, and how lovely, and how good—and, thank God! it is my daughter!"

CHAPTER LXX.—THE BOUDOIR OPENED.

INCESSANTLY looking at her watch, Clarissa meanwhile paced about her room, impatient for the flight of time. She wished to be at Eddington Hall not a minute before, nor a minute after, the appointed hour had struck. But how was she to get ready? Were the horses right? Would the mare again cast a shoe at a most inconvenient time? Were there any of the numerous sundry unsaid business on hand that might have drawn Sleuth out before her note reached? She almost wished she had written to him to request that he would not send a saint doing so was as strong as ever—namely, her dread of receiving either a denial, couched in the most polite and considerate terms possible, if he guessed her business; or of receiving, what would be almost as bad, one of his gushes of sympathetic feeling for "poor Miss Clarissa's affliction," and so on, of her visit—a kind of manifestation which she had, for a long time, habitually repressed in her presence.

However, she got away at last, and it was noticeable how carefully for her as she could beat the air of the hunter at all—she had arranged her dress into harmony with her state of mind. Her appearance looked as if she were in kind of half mourning. Every woman has an instinctive knowledge of those individual traits which will contribute to her the greatest possible amount of charm, and it is a common satire upon the sex to say that to slur over grief, or to conceal the traces of illness or sorrow, is more than must be expected from the truest heroine. Clarissa's appearance on this eventful morning certainly did not call up such a theory. Whether it was that she took a kind of sympathetic pleasure in defacing her beauty, while flatly refusing her the last poor chance of addition of her lover, or that she thought of and dreaded Sleuth's admiration, and the opportunities she was about to give him of forming more consideration from her than she had before vouchsafed, or whether, lastly, it was the mere force of a healthy instinct working unconsciously upon her to shape all her possible influence solely into one, and that the right direction—whichever of these motives were Clarissa's, and it is likely she felt them all, the result was that the personal brilliancy and the mental fascination which she ordinarily exercised was lost for to-day, and she simply looked a lady, whose unassuming dress and well-cut but pale features gave you only one idea—that she was in deep distress of mind. She wore a long black veil, and wore it hanging down over her face even in the carriage, and while she was obliged to open all the windows to give herself air, and the sense of something like being able to draw a free breath.

"If I fail! If I fail!" That was the spur with which she stimulated her often faltering purpose, and regained, in sheer despair, peace out of chaos by reflecting that Anthony's life was, as Mr. Stamp had said, now in her hands.

Suddenly she saw a carriage emerge from a side road some quarter of a mile in advance, and drive rapidly on in the direction she was herself going.

"It is Mr. Macguire!" she said to herself. "That is his carriage. What if he be going to Eddington also? In that case, I must wait till he leaves. I cannot be all that time in the house. No, no; that would be intolerable. Well, I must keep sufficiently near to see how he directs his course; but, I must, also, keep out of his way. I dread to speak to anybody just now but the one man on whom so much depends."

On went the two carriages, mile after mile, as if obeying one common mechanical impulse. Once Clarissa thought she saw signs of a desire to slacken, and rein for her. She instantly pulled the check-string, and said to the coachman:

"Don't go any nearer to the carriage in front."

Presently the carriage in front resumed its former pace, and when the lodge-gate of Eddington appeared, a stop was made, and Clarissa could see in the lower part of the beautiful clump of the silver birch and blossoming furze, winding along toward the hall.

She paused at the lodge to ask if Mr. Sleuth was at home. The answer was in the affirmative; so she caused the coachman to drive slowly up the avenue. Before he was, congratulate herself that this visit of Mr. Macguire would probably, by distracting attention, allow her to get quietly into the house; and she was planning in her own mind how she would get the butler—who would, no doubt, meet her—to take her past Sleuth's study into the drawing-room, when—

Lo, as the carriage drove up, meeting on its way Mr. Macguire's empty vehicle, which was slowly moved on by the boy who was the horses warm, Sleuth appeared bare-headed at the door, bowing, and alone, to receive her.

"I am truly delighted—" he began, as he came to the carriage-door and offered her his arm, which she took, and descended, on her way from the carriage to the vestibule.

"You are engaged?" she interrupted.

"Only my old friend, Mr. Macguire. He will wait."

"No—no, indeed. I will go, and return in an hour, or two hours."

"My dear Miss Pompess, you really shall do nothing of the kind—pardon my saying so. If you would prefer that I get rid of him first, I will."

As she was silent, he conducted her into the house, and said:

"Mr. Macguire is in the drawing-room. My study is always liable to interruption; so allow me to show you a library that has only of late been finished, and with which I intended some day to have amused my friends."

Wondering—in her own mind, Clarissa moved on in deep silence, till she turned a corner into a part of the house she and her father, on their occasional visits, had never seen. It was a corridor, with a vaulted ceiling of the most extraordinary beauty. It was low, winding and narrow; but the artist seemed to have improved these conditions on himself merely to bring the closer to the eye the exquisite carvings that literally covered every part of the stone work. Flowers were for the most devoted to displays of form, as though branches of the most elegant and suitable trees had been sought for, for this purpose, and then bent and molded by hands of consummate power and knowledge, and artistic sense of loveliness, to form the roof. At the ends flowers and fruits emerged at salient points, from the beautiful spray; and these were so exquisite, that it was almost impossible for the eye, wasted, as it were, upon walls that were intended to be habitually passed by without people stopping, to enable them to give the colorist to the artist and enjoy it.

Clarissa forgot for a moment, as she gazed, her troubles, forgot Anthony, forgot even her present companion, Sleuth, himself, in the concealed delight, her cry of admiration when she came to a spot where the winding of the corridor, and the entrance of a beam of light, enabled her to see the whole in its perfection.

Sleuth said nothing; but still led her on till she saw a door open before them she understood that this corridor led exclusively to the room which they were about to enter, and which, she could hardly feeling, was worthy of such an approach.

Sleuth watched her while she took one rapid and admiring glance, then he said, with a tone of the deepest humility:

"Your forgiveness will, I fear, find little here to admire. However, I did the best I could; I got the best advice, and best help I could."

This was said in a tone of melancholy that strangely puzzled Clarissa. He added:

"I will leave you, then, if you will permit me, and for a few minutes, I am sure Mr. Macguire won't be long; I know what business he has come on."

So saying, he went out, and closed the door after him. Very well might Mr. Sleuth know Mr. Macguire's business, for the instant he had received Clarissa's note, he had determined she should now come to this room, and this room only; and his suggestive mind had reminded him of some matters in which Mr. Macguire took great personal interest, which he saw he could promote, so he had dispatched a note, showing that he, Sleuth, could only have that exact time to spare for some days. Well, he was here; he would know of Miss Pompess's visit to him—a fact that could do Sleuth no harm, he fancied. But besides that indirect advantage, it had enabled him to introduce Clarissa to the room he had so long desired her to see, without seeming to have had any special desire of the kind.

Clarissa was alone in the room that Phillis had just looked into, when the shutters were closed, and the corridor dark, and had vainly desired to see. The glimpse she had then caught of it, and Sleuth's obvious unwillingness to let her see further, had never been forgotten. The indistinct vision still haunted Phillis's imagination, now that she knew, only too fatally clear, that it was not for her.

Clarissa is there, where Phillis might not come, and did not sit long on the chair where Sleuth had left her. There were two alcoves opening out of the room at the further end, one opposite the other. She went to see what they were like. One was an aviary, charmingly designed, so as to look always picturesque, and she could well understand how it would be when full of vivid life, glancing color, and delicious song, the home of the most brilliant or beautiful of tropical birds. What was the other? She had only to turn where she stood in the aviary, to answer her own question, without waiting to re-enter the boudoir, or to cross it to go into the opposite recess. It was a little conservatory, arranged so as to receive only plants in full flower, and these were now there in the greatest abundance, mingled with a few larger ones that bore not flowers, but graceful and picturesque foliage to the scene, to harmonize all, and to maintain a kind of fixed continuity of effect.

Clarissa was charmed—she could not but own she was, even while she was troubled and disconcerted.

She went to a hanging book-case of novel design to look at the books. There were some in green morocco, some in white vellum, some in crimson silk. Every book she looked at she got through instantly, as if it only confirmed some rapidly-growing fancy.

She sat down on a little arm-chair, and smiled ironically a moment after, as she looked curiously at the piece of furniture she had accidently chosen —it was of rosewood.

"Oh, yes!" she said to herself; "it is most unpleasantly clear. It is me and my tastes he has been studying here."

The blood mounted to Clarissa's face as she asked herself if her own folly, or worse, had led to this. She remembered, on looking back to sundry interviews of the last three or four years, accidental opinions she had happened to express, and others that she had fancied at the time he had drawn out of her, and now this was the conclusion. It was a fact, and a startling one—it was vows to Clarissa, she felt it was also a humiliating fact—that this place had essentially sprung from her own occasional hap-hazard fancies, or her own really matured tastes and opinions; for it seemed to put her and Sleuth together as two companions working and scheming, as it were, hand-in-hand, heart to heart.

Then she remembered that this house had been built from Anthony's plans, and she felt abjured—that Sleuth had had his ideas from them. What new interest that thought gave to the place!

And Sleuth had brought her to this room! Yes, he had brought her.

But, after all, was it so great a crime in a man to like and love her—if he really did love her—and secretly work in this fashion to gratify himself, even though he might have vaguely hoped also to gratify her? Clarissa decided to be just, and, it must be owned, did not find the task difficult—in this direction.

For a moment only. Her father's words now recurred to her all their awful significance: if she saved Anthony, she would, in all probability, hang Sleuth.

Then she forgot everything once more but the dread business she had come to do, and tried again to make sour what she should say—how guard her words—how horror from a sudden external to herself the strength to enable her to control her features, should Sleuth find the earnest heart-eloquence that was so much needed; while she trembled at every sound she heard in the house, every rustle or moving of a door, lest it might be Sleuth returning to put her to the test.

"If I fail! If I fail!" again she exclaimed, almost wringing her hands in anguish, as if she saw no other hope.

The sound of footsteps, echoing through the stone-paved corridor, told her Mr. Macguire had gone, and Sleuth was about to rejoin her.

The door opened. Sleuth entered with a smile, and an apology for keeping her so long, and was followed by a servant—the discreet butler—who brought refreshments. Sleuth waited with a smile, and an apology for keeping her so long, and was followed by a servant—the discreet butler—who brought refreshments. Sleuth waited on them on a little table, the surface of which was composed of minutes pieces of the very rarest woods, inlaid with such admirable skill as to make the whole faintly resemble a glimpse of a tropical forest when the veil of mist, drawn forth by the fervent rays, has, in a moment, dissolved the outlines of every tree, and given new depth and meaning to the mysteries of that green and luxuriant world.

When the servant had gone, Sleuth drew near, placed a chair for himself opposite Clarissa, but so respectfully that she was glad of the movement, and then poured out a glass of wine—plain sherry in name, but of a quality that itself told how he must have searched London through to obtain it, as he had done, in anticipation of this very visit.

Clarissa was also glad of the wine. She drank little other than water at ordinary times, and, therefore, like all other temperate livers, found immense resources in a single glass, when the powers were tasked beyond their proper strength. Hope entered her soul as the wine penetrated her frame, her eyes sparkled, and she no longer felt afraid for herself, while she also felt less fear of him.

Sleuth could not see and appreciate. He was about to direct the conversation into channels that suited his own notion of things, when she said, abruptly:

"You must wonder, Mr. Sleuth, at this sudden visit—at my coming so unasked."

"If I wonder, it is only at my own good fortune," he replied.

"Yesterday, I was at Statehill Prison."

"Indeed!" said Sleuth; and his hand went to his face, his elbow to the edge of the little table, and then, half shading his countenance, he looked at her for a moment, then let his eyes drop to the floor, while he waited to hear further.

"Yes. You will pardon my interference, I hope!"

Sleuth smiled, as if in irony at her doubting that.

"You know what I—I must feel about the charge against Mr. Maude."

Sleuth kept his head, and cursed, the while, in his heart the ill-luck, as he esteemed it, that had given Anthony what he was himself so desirous to obtain. The very modesty of the words in which she thus told him all she desired to say, gave fresh pangs to his envy, by making Clarissa, even at that moment, more attractive, more unattainable. She went on:

"It was thought among Mr. Maude's friends that it was possible the housekeeper's niece, Phillis Conyngham, might be able to throw some light on——"

"She's mad! My dear Miss Pompess, she's stark, raving mad!" interrupted Sleuth.

"Pardon me, Mr. Sleuth, but she was, but is not now. And, in proof, she has assured me she repents of her violence to you——"

Again she was interrupted.

"Did she tell you the cause of her attack upon me?"

"No."

"Shall I tell it to you?" asked Sleuth, his face and attitude losing much of the placid unconsciousness and good temper they had previously exhibited.

"If you please," said Clarissa, coldly.

"Do not blame me, then, if I own at once I did do her a wrong, but that I did it in a cause for which I would again repeat the act. I did it through love!"

"Me, sir!" exclaimed Clarissa, starting indignantly to her feet.

"You said you'd be the truth—I give it to you. Oh, Miss Pompess, have you indeed been so blind to the state of things all these years? Is it possible that you did not suspect that the reason why I could not marry a woman who was so devoted to me—who never did a single thing with which I or one had a right to reproach her—is it possible that you do not know that it was you who changed me, and made it a crime thenceforward to fulfill what otherwise must have been a sacred duty? But pardon me. Pray be seated. A thousand pardons for the rude words of anger I did not mean to say this; but I could not bear you to think so meanly of me as to misunderstand what brought me to you on the morning of my residence with my uncle, when I needed a kind word to comfort me under—But I need not refer to the past. It is enough to say I pity Phillis from the very bottom of my soul. She is a good and virtuous girl, and if it were possible for me to marry her, I would have done it. But I could not. She is quick-witted, and the very day you gave me so much pain by your attitude, when I happened to fall a few words in her ear, she came here, and before she left, knew I was no longer in heart the same. Poor girl! I do not wonder at her violence or repentance!"

"Which is insanity no longer," said Clarissa, resenting herself.

"True. Pardon! I forgot. You said so," said Sleuth, as if absently.

"And you forgive her? Of course, after what you say, you will be bound, at least, to do that," questioned Clarissa.

"Oh, certainly. But—and you will pardon the remark, I am sure—it is not desirable that either she or I should be again subjected to the chances of such meetings."

"Will you trust me to prevent any—any such occurrences?" asked Clarissa.

"Sooner than I would trust any other living person. But I hope I speak at least to a friend in speaking to Miss Pompess," said Sleuth, pausing in the excitement of his subject, and looking from under the shadow of his hand upon her earnest, animated, and now again wondrously beautiful face.

"You do—you do, indeed, Mr. Sleuth! I wish I could make you understand, once for all, how sincerely, why my thanks are due to those words."

Sleuth's eyes expanded in wonder to see the kindling light in hers. He could not understand her. Acute as the knowledge of the kind of woman-love he had learned in his early days—a love that may be said essentially to consist of the absence of all mental faith in the foundations of female truthfulness and constancy. Her visit—even her very frankness in acknowledging her love for Anthony, as though that were a seeming fact that could not be openly denied, and now these words, opened to his eyes dim, yet delicious vistas, along which he must at least try a few exploring steps.

"I dare not," he said, and his voice really did tremble with emotion or some kind. "I dare not dwell on what you have said, dear to me now and for ever as are your words. So let me say instead what it was that—that——" Strange, it is all forgotten!"

Sleuth stopped, and seemed to try to recover the lost thread by putting out of sight the new idea which Clarissa had given him.

"Why? asked Clarissa, impetuously.

"Because," said Sleuth, with a melancholy smile, not altogether devoid of maliciousness, "I had forgiven her directly she struck the blow. I understood her feelings toward me by my own toward——. Enough: she is forgiven!"

"And may be relieved!"

There was a little and felt pause. Sleuth then said:

"Yes, in due course. I will see to it."

"Give me that pleasure? Do! It is the first favor I ever asked of you; if you deny, it is the last."

Sleuth's face changed color, and his entire demeanor assisted his mental embarrassment.

"I am a magistrate, and must see that things are done legally."

"You are a magistrate—a humane man—and are bound to spare this poor creature every unnecessary hour of pain and disgrace."

"True. Go on. If I hesitate, do not be too sure that it is not that I may enjoy the exquisite gratification of so pleaded to."

"Ay, but the listening involves the consent," said Clarissa, throwing herself into his mood.

Clarissa then, with a side-table, where she saw writing materials, all of which were not merely of the same costly character as the general furniture of the room, but displayed originality, in the p-n, to concentrate and direct the intention of the whole. It was of gold, both nib and stem, the latter studded with rubies and diamonds, in some spiral pattern of so quaint a character, that even then Clarissa, while snatching at any chance for a moment's relief, could not help attention to it, and thus read, as she held it aside to the light, manufactured, formed by the tiny gems:

"Beware! Love is life and death, joy and despair, you make me distribute."

"A fancy of my own—absurd enough, I dare say," said Sleuth, affectationally taking the note of her sudden enlightenment.

Her only answer was to place the materials before him, and, with a hand trembling, received letter-paper case—people do not then write on note-paper—to dip the virgin pen for the first time into the ink of which it was destined to speak. It was a beautiful boy held up, while gazing, as if in awe of the uses to which the beautiful owner might put his subtle power, to say:

"Finish the good work. Write me a full release!"

"That is beyond my power."

"Stop. Pardon my rudeness. It no doubt is as you say. Write me, then, a few lines, expressive of your determination not to prosecute, and of your willingness for her release from prison, if the authorities consider her ill to leave, under—well, pre-sent circumstances."

"If I passed to think of what is prudent or formally right——"

"You would still do what you are now going to do."

"Miss Pompess, I can refuse you nothing; you, who refuse me everything!"

He tried to meet her eye, but she took up the pen, and seemed to busy herself in studying its nice and delicate workmanship, as though it had escaped her on a first rapid glance.

Sleuth wrote:

"Satisfied that Phillis Conyngham struck me under circumstances of grief and trouble that deprive her act of its more criminal aspect, I hereby declare to the proper authority that I have no just cause that I shall certainly not think it right to proceed with the charge against her, and that I trust she will recover her health of mind and live to be grateful to the friend who asks this from me."

"Will that do?" said Sleuth, putting the paper into her hand.

Eagerly her eyes ran along the lines, and eagerly Sleuth watched them in their brilliant progression across the page from left to right, when, rising, and again, until she had finished, and then she smiled, and said:

"Thank you; I do, indeed. I will never forget your kindness."

So saying, she rapidly folded up the paper, and put it in her pocket.

Then she rose as if to go; though it was obvious, even to Sleuth, she did not do so as freely as desirous to leave. Perhaps his pride was only her native sweetness and nobility of disposition. She might only be thinking: "How strange it must look! and yet I want, and then so orientation, to show him I care no longer for his society, even to the extent of good breeding and ordinary friendship."

Still Sleuth wondered over her words, her look, and her irresolution, and he added the incident to those mysterious ones which had been strongly pressing upon his thoughts, in spite of what he felt to be their unreasonableness; nay, their positive absurdity.

"You will not leave me so soon, will not let this, your first independent visit to me—as—as a friend, be hereinforward. It is not usual solely a connection with this painful incident?"

"I—I fear I must return now. My father will be anxious if I do not return just when he expects me, and the time is passing that will enable me to get home in time. One of my servants shall go to him faster than you possibly can. I do wish to stay. You do not say nay. No! Thank you. I will send the man."

"Stay, Mr. Sleuth. If I must trespass here so long, I will, if you please, let one of my own men go, if you will lend him a saddle."

"Oh, certainly!" Sleuth was gone before she had time to say another word.

The instant the door was closed, Clarissa drew the paper from her pocket, folded it up, put it into another sheet, on which she wrote hastily a few words, then sealed the whole up into a packet, which she addressed to her father. The writing ran thus:

"DEAR PAPA—You will know best how to use this. I shall be home within an hour or two. Will you be so good to your ever-troublesome daughter as to have an order for Phillis's release ready, if possible, by the time I return, but at all events some time to-night. C. P."

"P. S.—I have thought it well to stay a little with Sleuth on account of Mr. S., but I have also thought it well to send this off to you at once."

The doctor's footman now knocked, and entered at her command.

"Master," said Clarissa, in a low voice, coming toward him, "this is important—give it only into my father's hands. I trust to you to do that within the hour, and then to return to me as quickly as you can. You quite understand?"

"Yes, miss."

"Quick, then. Stop for no gossip. I shall measure every instant till you return."

Clarissa then opened the door a side-pocket and withdrew. When Sleuth re-entered the room, he found Clarissa at the window, looking out toward the retreating figure of the horseman, who was pulling one of Sleuth's choicest "bits of blood" to her full speed, as he swept along with the packet.

Not quite understanding Sleuth—generally so wary, so difficult to be surprised—even think of what it was he had enabled Clarissa to do, or venture to weigh in his thoughts the humiliation of his position, if, indeed, it was she who was playing with him, and for the most terrible issues, while he had been dreaming of a play that might end in his favor, and for his special benefit.

She had not heard him enter, but turned as if from the wind an instant after her had passed beyond her gaze, and was, therefore, also beyond recall or question. She turned, and met him face to face, and as she saw in his manner the confusion there, so she also became aware that her own countenance was becoming more full of revelations than she desired; and, as such, full of secret agitating and antagonistic emotions, each conscious of possible issues of the most dreadful kind to their respective lives, each sincerely desirous of preserving a peculiar and friendly attitude for reasons understood on the one side—not at all understood on the other—they met, and smiled, and walked about, while luncheon was getting ready, and gazed down in spirit into the depths of the mental abyss yawned at their feet! gazed, but in silence—gazed in no communion of soul, and yet drawn together by an irresistible power—each by the strength of itself begot a kind of sympathy.

Sleuth was once Clarissa's lips moving, as if she were saying something to herself. What if he had heard the words that thus alone were expressed? What if he have understood or guessed their meaning?

What was it she was saying? Only this:

"If I should fail! If I should fail!"

What would she have thought if she had known why Sleuth had given his assistant, Bundell, a private interview with her, and left open on the paper concerning Phillis? The real explanation of this overnight was that Sleuth himself had, at the moment, something else in his thoughts, which shut out all others. Let us here narrate a conversation that took place during his absence from the room.

It is Sleuth and the discreet butler who are talking in the study, whither the master has drawn the servant to question him. Let us hear what the latter had been passing the door.

"Put to the door."

"Yes, sir."

"I once overheard you, I think, saying you had a sister in Wisconsin, in Cornwall, and that you wished you were there, too, eh?"

"No offense, sir, I hope?"

"None at all. Was that your real feeling? Don't be afraid to speak frankly. I have been much pleased with you, and should be glad to promote your interests, even if at some inconvenience to myself."

"Much obliged, sir, I'm sure—and very grateful."

"Well, answer me."

"I should, and I should not, like to go to Cornwall."

"How is that?"

"When my sister and I parted, nine years ago, our joint fortune was about to be rich, and she whom I threatened with poverty. She is rich, and I am —a servant. Time's all, sir."

"Well, I think I could be pleasant to go to her under your present conditions."

Then Sleuth walked a little away, musing, and the butler watched him with some coming terror.

"Would you mind hurrying off to do a somewhat delicate job for me, just now, and without any loss of time?"

"Should be glad to do it, if you say you wish it done."

"Thank you. I do. I must explain. You were no doubt, surprised at that attack on me, and I am quite sure, must have had your own thoughts as to the lady's conduct."

The butler coughed, and looked down, then mildly raised his inquiring eyes to his master's face in deprecation of answering, but more discreetly than before.

"There was a time when that—that lady had no reason to expect to be the mistress of this house."

"Very nice lady, too, I dare say, sir?"

"But circumstances altered——"

"Of course, sir, of course."

"I wish to be perfectly free—and, indeed, I have just given Miss Pompess written authority for insuring her release. But I foresee that the painful trial of my own will cause every person who was about my uncle at the time of his death, to be hunted up. It would be very painful to me to see my private affairs then exposed to public comment. It would be also injurious to my position as a magistrate. Do you comprehend?"

"Most perfectly, sir."

"As far as the trial is concerned, I wish most heartily this lady could be examined; for I want to know much about my uncle's death that I do not know. But she can render no important service—that is quite clear; because, when we had a sort of private examination before Dr. Pompess, in the house, the day after the—the murder, she offered no evidence whatever; and was, indeed, the only person who could throw any light on the event."

"I see, sir."

"You will understand, then, why I really am anxious to avoid the personal annoyance which would result if she be worried into the witness-box—perhaps, in order to damage me, and so create a dilemma."

"Exactly, sir."

"Could you, now, throw your whole heart into a bit of business for me—merely to accomplish this—if you understood that success in it would entitle you to my lasting friendship, shown, for instance, in getting you a then and grounds to join your sister in Cornwall, at your own time, and in your own manner?"

The discreet butler's eyes and mouth seemed literally to water with a foretaste of the good things suggested, and he said, with some disturbance of his usual equanimity and oft-toned speech:

"I think I would do more than you ask me, sir, for so munificent a reward!"

"Then off at once. Can you ride?"

"Yes, sir."

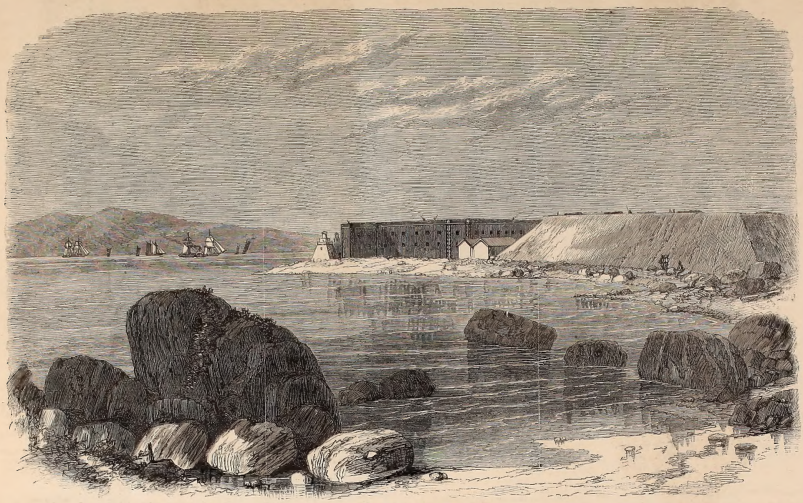
"Take the gig, then. That will be better. Yes. Go to the neighborhood of Statehill Prison, but don't let your business appear——"

Sleuth stopped, seeing a faint smile on the man's face.

"You are right. It is unnecessary for me to give you minute directions. So now for the upshot. The lady in question will be, no doubt, prosecuted by me. I can't say how soon. Be on the spot. Learn, at any cost, whither she goes. Keep yourself unsuspected even by the acutest eyes. Do what you think best calculated. Let me know. That is the first step. Beyond that you, of course, can foresee all. You must bring me to the lady, early or late, as I decide to it, at any conceivable cost. If you insure me—even at the last moment, should it prove impracticable before —the interview with her, I will reward you at all further responsibility. I may need your aid, but your reward will have been earned. Are you satisfied?"

"I shall ask you, sir, that question, I hope, very soon."

A RICH LADY.



One of the richest ladies in the world, perhaps, is Miss Burdett Coutts, of London, England, who became the heiress of Miss Coutts, who had been Miss Mellon, the actress, and her fortune has been computed at 13 tons of gold. This money has been handed down from heir to heir many times, and is constantly increasing in amount. The lady who inherited this vast amount previous to Miss Mellon, the actress, became so by the marriage of the Duchess of St. Albans. The Duke of St. Albans being "a poor Duke," and the lady a rich heiress, he married the heiress and lived happily ever after. Miss Burdett Coutts, the present possessor of the immense fortune, is a lady well-known for her acts of generosity. It employs several noble charities to send her petitions to him, and the labor of properly attending to their requests is sufficient to occupy a secretary of considerable ability. She gives all the money she has time to give, money for smoking hospitals, for the relief of the destitute, to found hospitals at the Queen's Land and Jerusalem, and to almost every benevolent purpose. Many of the cases of misery mentioned from the benefactions of the Queen, must frequently receive the income of three guineas to the fortunate mothers of as many babies produced.

HOW THEY SERVE "WITCHES" IN NEW ZEALAND.—The Wellington (New Zealand) Herald, describes a summary mode of dealing with "witches" in that country. The Kaitaka we learn from a native and rumors of wars, instigated probably by the desire of the native chiefs to get rid of the white man, have of late received a check. Hone Wenitere (John Wesley), late native assessor at Waitara, has been deposed from his office four years ago, for the abduction of a native woman, the wife of a native named Wright, but has now, owing to the interest of native proceedings at the present time, by the commission of a most brutal murder. It appears that this late learned interpreter of the law had, with a zeal worthy of a better cause, determined to rid the Maori woman for 'makutu,' or witchcraft, and punished her by the murder of her husband on the spot. Hone and his myrmidons proceeded to Auckland Pahi-Maories as somewhat of a novelty, and were much admired. Hone, we hear, it is no extraordinary event. It is only a few years since a native was put to death for witchcraft in a manner unmentionable.

A MAMMOTH TUSK FOUND.—New Siberia and the Isle of Lakon are, for the most part, only an aggregation of sand, ice, and shipwrecked logs. A very tempting spot for the mature fresh heaps of mammoth tusks, which are found in the frozen earth, while digging in the bank every thrown up by the waves. Sometimes these remarkable discoveries are found in their course to this isle of ivory, and in winter immense caravans are organized, all the country drawn by dogs, returning charged with the tusks of the mammoth, weighing each from 100 to 200 pounds. The fossil ivory thus obtained from the frozen north is imported into China and Europe, where it is employed for the same purposes as ordinary ivory—which is becoming very scarce, by the elephants and progenitors of Africa and Asia. The isle of bones has never of late years been a more valuable mercantile spot for China for 500 years; and it has been expected to Europe for more than 100. But the supply can be to strange mines remain undiscovered. What a number of ancient defunct mammoths does not this profession of bones and tusks imply.

AN ebony-colored female of the African persuasion entered a store, not a hundred miles from here, and asked the clerk to show her "some flesh-colored hose." Taking a second glance at the maids, the young man went in search of the articles, returning with a lot of black stockings, which he handed to the customer frowned indignantly, turned suddenly upon the "nubbin of her foot," and "jerked" herself out of the store, remarking, as she went, that "he couldn't fool her with dem ole black stockings, she wanted flesh-color, or nuffin at all."

SCENES AND WONDERS IN CALIFORNIA.

FORT POINT AND THE GOLDEN GATE, CALIFORNIA.

SCENES AND WONDERS IN CALIFORNIA.

WHETHER it is a special provision of the Almighty that new countries should have attractions not found in older lands—attractions that certainly fade away as they become populated—is more than we can say; but the fact is wonderfully before us in the case of California and Australia, those lands newly snatched from savage grasp.

California has its hundreds of natural wonders, that have in years past struck the traveler with awe and astonishment, and each new wanderer finds new wonders and new beauties. It has the largest trees, the highest falls, the deepest valleys, and the steepest mountains. It has the grandest caves, the grimmest grizzlies, and, in fact, a little of almost everything that any other land has, as well as many things that none other has.

San Francisco, the Queen City of the Pacific—a great city that has, by American brains, been made in a few years—has the finest harbor in the world, and the entrance to it, through the Golden Gate, is a scene, once viewed, never to be forgotten.

There are probably but few persons, comparatively, who have ever passed through this entrance to the fine bay of San Francisco that are familiar with the origin and meaning of the name, the popular idea being that its name was suggested by the staple mineral of the country—gold. This is incorrect, as it was called "The Golden Gate" before the precious metal was discovered; and the first time that it was used, most probably, was in a work entitled, "A Geographical Review of California," with a relative map, published in New York, in the month of February, 1848, by Colonel J. C. Fremont; and as gold was discovered on the 19th of January preceding, in those days it would have been next to impossible for the news to have reached the office of publication of that work, in time for the name to be given from such a cause.

The real origin of the name was from the excessively fertile lands of the interior, especially those adjacent to the bay of San Francisco. There may have been some "spiritual telegrams" sent from California (!) to the parent of the name, telling him of the glorious dawn of a golden day that had broke upon the world at Sutter's Mill, Coloma, and that such a name would be the magic charm to millions of men and women in every quarter of the world, in the golden age about to be inaugurated. We do not say that it was so.

That it is the gateway or entrance to the magnificent harbor of San Francisco every one is well aware. The centre of this entrance is longitude 122 degrees 30 minutes west from Greenwich. On the south of the entrance is Point Lobos (Wolves' Point), on the top of which is a telegraph station, from whence the tidings of the arrival of steamers and sailing vessels are sent to the city. On the north side is Point Bonita (Beautiful Point), readily recognized by a strip of land running out toward the bar, on the top of which is a light-house, that is seen far out to sea, on a clear day, but seldom before that on the Farallone Islands, some 27 miles west of Point Bonita.

In front of the entrance is a low, circular sand-bar, almost seven miles in length, but on which is sufficient water, even at low tide, to admit of the largest class of ships crossing it in safety—except, possibly, when the wind is blowing from the north-west, west, or south-east; at such a time it is scarcely safe for a large vessel to cross at low tide.

From Point Bonita to Point Lobos, the distance is about three and a half miles; and between Fort Point and Lime Point (just opposite to each other), the narrowest part of the channel, and "The Golden Gate" proper, it is 1,777 yards. Here the tide ebbs and flows at the rate of about six knots an hour.

One of the most fashionable drives for San Franciscans is from the city, by the Mission Dolores to the Ocean House, returning by Fort Point and the Presidio.

When Fort Point was first occupied by American

THE PULPIT IN THE EL DORADO CAVE, CALIFORNIA.

CALIFORNIA SALMON FISHING—PAYING OUT THE SEINE.

CALIFORNIA SALMON FISHING—HAULING IN THE SEINE.

N'GOWA, DAUGHTER OF THE KING OF THE SACRED ISLES, WEST AFRICA.

troops, belonging to Colonel Stephenson's battalion, under Major Hardie, in March, 1847, they found a circular battery of 10 iron guns, 16-pounders, mounted upon the hill, just above the present works, and which was allowed to remain until a better one was ready to occupy its place.

The present beautiful and substantial structure was commenced in 1854, and is now nearly completed. It is four tiers in height, the topmost of which is 64 feet above low tide, and is capable of mounting 150 guns, including the battery at the back, of 42, 64, and 128-pounders, and, during an engagement, can accommodate 2,400 men. There have been appropriations made, including the last, of $1,800,000. The greatest number of men employed at any one time was 200; now there are about 80.

AGUILLE, WOMAN OF THE KING OF THE SACRED ISLES, WEST AFRICA.

The lighthouse, adjoining the Fort, can be seen for from 10 to 12 miles, and is an important addition to the mercantile interests of California, although we regret to say the lantern, known as the "Fresnel Light," is only of the fifth order, and is the smallest on the coast; it is 52 feet above level. Two men are employed to attend it. Connected with this is a fog-bell, weighing 1,100 pounds, and worked by machinery, that strikes every 10 seconds for five taps, then has intermission of 34 seconds, and recommences the 10 second strike. This is kept constantly running during foggy weather.

WOMEN OF THE SACRED ISLES.

It will be remembered that the French have for many years had a colony at Gabon, on the west coast of Africa, about the equator, planted there, we think, in 1845.

This colony is pretty much the same as the elephant the man drew in a raffle, France not knowing exactly what to do with it, or how to get rid of it. From the journals of recent travelers from there, it would seem as if the best use that can be made of Gabon and the Sacred Isles—for so they are called—would be for the belles of Paris to make a summer trip there for the purpose of studying up new modes of hair-dressing. Zondogowira is King of the Sacred Isles, but not grand chief of religion. He is connected by marriage with the supreme chief by the fact of the said chief marrying his, Zondogowira's daughter, N'Gowa, a belle of the first water.

Aguelle, one of the wives of the king, is also a beauty and a belle, and as types of the fashions of women in the Sacred Isles, we will undertake some description of them.

The hair, which is the point of costume, is thoroughly saturated with a pomade, composed of beef suet and palm oil. Having been brought to a proper state of ductility by this, it is twisted out in the same manner that our own belles do it by rats, waterfalls, etc., until it assumes the appearance in the engraving, a most singular complication of artistic talent and ornament. There are bands of ribbon, black, and somewhat like silk, bits of ivory mounted like brooches, copper spangles of all sizes, and pins gilded and mounted with beads to represent jewels, but all of native workmanship.

This hair ornamenting is the especial point of the women of the Sacred Isles. Anything they may possess of value or interest goes into the hair. Sometimes jewels and pearls of value form part of the stock, but oftener leaves or ornaments stamped from sheets of copper, and sometimes gilded. Gold beads, sometimes heavy and finely wrought, form part of the parure, or are worn upon the neck, arms and legs. The beauty who has not a square yard of cotton on her whole person, may have 10 pounds of gold in the shape of beads and bangles. In short, the women of Gabon are simply types of the sex all over the world, and our belles cannot tell, while they are giving way to extravagancies in dress, but what they may be copying to a hair the styles of the court ladies of Zondogowira, King of the Sacred Isles.

THE EAGLE AND THE CHAMOIS.

It is a favorite theory with many that the animal world possesses only instinct, not reason. We call it a theory, because all observers tell us different, and cite so many instances of the reasoning faculty, so many wonderful cases where almost human intellect is brought to bear, that it is impossible to believe that the animal creation does not follow out a line of action suited to its necessities, involving memory, invention, and long looking into the future.

Our illustration gives an instance of this, as shown by the eagle of Switzerland, and its mode

THE CEMETERY OF ARENSBURG, IN THE ISLAND OF OESEL, BALTIC SEA.

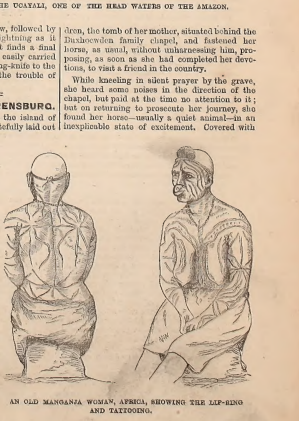
THE EAGLE AND CHAMOIS.

of securing the chamois. The animal is too bulky to be easily handled, and, like the goat, somewhat belligerent in resisting attacks. To get over these two difficulties the bird makes a series of sudden dashes at him, each time taking good care not to come too nigh, until by great exertion it drives the chamois to the edge of the precipice, and then with one great effort the animal is, perhaps, with a blow of its powerful wing, forced over the edge, falling, it may be, a thousand feet down to the pointed rocks below, followed by its hunter with the rapidity of lightning as it dashes from crag to crag until it finds a final lodgment, or is torn into pieces easily carried away. The rocks serve as a carving-knife to the voracious bird, as well as save it the trouble of the killing.

THE CEMETERY OF AHRENSBURG.

In the vicinity of Ahrensburg, in the island of Oesel, is the public cemetery. Tastefully laid out and carefully kept, planted with trees and partly surrounded by a grove dotted with evergreens, it is a favorite promenade of the inhabitants. It contains several private chapels, each the burying-place of some family of distinction. Underneath each of these is a vault, paved with wood, to which the descent is by a stairway from inside the chapel and closed by a door. The heavy oak coffins usually remain for a time in the chapel, and are afterward transferred to the vaults, and there placed side by side, on iron bars.

Conspicuous, and to be seen by the traveler as he rides by, are three chapels, facing the highway. Of these the most spacious, adorned with pillars in front, is that belonging to the noble family of Buxhoewden, and their place of interment for several generations.



It was the habit of the country-people, coming in on horse-back or with carts on a visit to the cemetery, to fasten their horses, usually with stout halters, immediately in front of this chapel, and close to the pillars.

The chief season of resort to the cemetery was on Pentecost Sunday and the succeeding days—these being there observed much in the same manner as in Catholic countries All-Souls' Day usually is.

On the 22d of June, 1844, the wife of a tailor named Dalmann, living in Ahrensburg, had come with a horse and small cart to visit, with her children, the tomb of her mother, situated behind the Buxhoewden family chapel, and fastened her horse, as usual, without unharnessing him, preparing, as soon as she had completed her devotions, to visit a friend in the country.

FLOATING MENAGERIE ON THE UCAYALI, ONE OF THE HEAD WATERS OF THE AMAZON.

AN OLD MANGANJA WOMAN, AFRICA, SHOWING THE LIP-RING AND TATTOOING.

While kneeling in silent prayer by the grave, she heard some noises in the direction of the chapel, but paid at the time no attention to it; but on returning to prosecute her journey, she found her horse—usually a quiet animal—in an inexplicable state of excitement. Covered with sweat and foam, its limbs trembling, it appeared to be in mortal terror. When she led it off, it seemed scarcely able to walk; and, instead of proceeding on her intended excursion, she found herself obliged to return to town and to call a veterinary surgeon. He declared that the horse must have been excessively terrified from some cause or other, bled it, administered a remedy, and the animal recovered.

The circumstance would have been soon forgotten had it not been followed by others of a similar character. The following Sunday several persons, who had attached their horses in front of the same chapel, reported that they found them covered with sweat, trembling, and in the utmost terror; and some among them added that they had themselves heard rumbling sounds, which assumed the character of groans.

One day in the course of the next month eleven horses were fastened close to the chapel. Some persons hearing loud noises, as if issuing from beneath the building, raised the alarm; and when the owners reached the spot, they found the poor animals in a pitiable condition. Several of them, in their frantic efforts io escape, had thrown themselves on the ground, and lay struggling there; others were scarcely able to walk or stand; and all were violently affected, so that it became necessary immediately to resort to bleeding and other means of relief. In the case of three or four of them, these means proved unavailing. They died within a day or two.

About the same time, a member of the Buxhoewden family died. At his funeral, during the reading in the chapel of the service for the dead, groans and other strange noises were heard from beneath, to the great terror of some of the assistants, the servants especially. The horses attached to the hearse and to the mourning-coaches were sensibly affected, but not so violently as some of the others had been,

After the interment, three or four of those who had been present, bolder than their neighbors, descended to the vault. While there they heard nothing; but they found that, of the numerous coffins which had been deposited there in due order side by side, almost all had been displaced and lay in a confused pile. They sought in vain for any cause that might account for this. The doors were always kept carefully fastened, and the locks showed no signs of having been tampered with. The coffins were replaced in due order.

The excitement increasing, an inquiry into the matter was proposed. The owners of the chapel at first objected. But though they carefully examined the floor of the vault, to make sure that no one had entered from beneath, they could find nothing to confirm their suspicions. And, the Baron de Guldenstubbé, who was president of the Consistory, having visited the vaults privately in company with two members of the family, and having found the coffins again in the same disorder, they finally, after restoring the coffins to their places, assented to an official investigation of the affair.

The persons charged with this investigation were the Baron de Guldenstubbé, as president, and the bishop of the province, as vice-president, of the Consistory; two other members of the same body; a physician, named Luce; and, on the part of the magistracy of the town, the burgomeister, named Schmidt, one of the syndics, and a secretary.

They proceeded, in a body, to institute a careful examination of the vault. All the coffins there deposited, with the exception of three, were found this time, as before, displaced. Of the three coffins forming the exception, one contained the remains of a grandmother of the then representative of the family, who had died about five years previous; and the two others were of young children. The grandmother had been, in life, revered almost as a saint.

No robbery had been committed, nor was any excavation found near where the noise could have been made.

Nothing remained but to replace every thing in due order, taking exact note of the position of the coffins, and to adopt especial precautions for the detection of any future intrusion. This, accordingly, was done. Both doors, the inner and the outer, after being carefully locked, were doubly sealed; first with the official seal of the Consistory, then with that bearing the arms of the city. Fine wood-ashes were strewed all over the wooden pavement of the vault, the stairs leading down to it from the chapel, and the floor of the chapel itself. Finally, guards, from the garrison of the town and relieved at short intervals, were set for three days and nights to watch the building and prevent any one from approaching.

At the end of that time the commission of inquiry returned. Both doors were found securely locked and the seals inviolate. The coating of ashes still presented a smooth, unbroken surface. Neither in the chapel nor on the stairway was there the trace of a footstep, of man or animal. The vault was sufficiently lighted from the chapel to make every object distinctly visible. Not only was every coffin, with the same three exceptions as before, displaced, and the whole scattered in confusion over the place, but many of them, weighty as they were, had been set on end, so that the head of the corpse was downward. Nor was even this all. The lid of one coffin had been partially forced open, and there projected the shrivelled right arm of the corpse it contained, showing beyond the elbow; the lower arm being turned up toward the ceiling of the vault!

The first shock over which this astounding sight produced, the commission proceeded carefully to take note, in detail, of the condition of things as they found them.

An authentic account was drawn up and still exists among the archives of the Consistory.

It remains to be stated that, as the disturbances continued for several months after this investigation, the family, in order to get rid of the annoyance, resolved to try the effect of burying the coffins. This they did, covering them up, to a considerable depth, with earth. The expedient succeeded. From that time forth no noises were heard to proceed from the chapel; horses could be fastened with impunity before it; and the inhabitants, recovering from their alarm, frequented with their children, as usual, their favorite resort. Nothing remained but the memory of the past occurrences—to fade away as the present generation dies out, and perhaps to be regarded by the next as an idle legend of the incredible.

THE MANGANJA WOMEN, AFRICA.

Livingstone, in his late travels in the Zambesi country, came across a people called the Manganjas, of whom he thus speaks:

The Manganja are an industrious race; and in addition to working in iron, cotton, and basket-making, they cultivate the soil extensively. All the people of a village turn out to labor in the fields. It is no uncommon thing to see men, women and children, hard at work, with the baby lying close by, beneath a shady bush. When a new piece of woodland is to be cleared, they proceed exactly as farmers do in America. The trees are cut down with their little axes of soft native iron; trunks and branches are piled up and burnt, and the ashes spread on the soil.

Many of the men are intelligent-looking, with well-shaped heads, agreeable faces, and high foreheads. We soon learned to forget color, and we frequently saw countenances resembling those of white people we had known in England, which brought back the looks of forgotten ones vividly before the mind.

The middle of the upper lip of the girls is pierced close to the septum of the nose, and a small pin inserted to prevent the puncture closing up. After it has healed, the pin is taken out and a larger one is pressed into its place, and so on successively for weeks, and months, and years. The process of increasing the size of the lip goes on till its capacity becomes so great that a ring of two inches diameter can be introduced with ease. All the highland women wear the pelele, and it is common on the Upper and Lower Shire.

The poorer classes make them of hollow, or of solid bamboo, but the wealthier, of ivory or tin. The tin pelele is often made in the form of a small dish. The ivory one is not unlike a napkin-ring. No woman ever appears in public without the pelele, except in times of mourning for the dead. It is frightfully ugly to see the upper lip projecting two inches beyond the tip of the nose. When an old wearer of a hollow bamboo-ring smiles, by the action of the muscles of the cheeks the ring and lip outside it are dragged back and thrown above the eyebrows. The nose is seen through the middle of the ring, and the exposed teeth show how carefully they have been chipped to look like those of a cat or crocodile. The pelele of an old lady, Chikanda Kadze, a Chieftainess, about twenty miles north of Morambala, hung down below her chin, with, of course, a piece of the upper lip around its border.

In many cases the upper front teeth, instead of the natural curve outward, which the row presents, had been pressed so as to appear as if the line of alveoli in which they were planted had an inward curve. As this was produced by the slight pressure of the pelele backward, persons with two prominent teeth might by slight, but long-continued pressure, by some appliance only as elastic as the lip, have the upper gum and teeth depressed, especially in youth, more easily than is usually imagined. Coupled with this interesting ornament is the tattooing, which is as much part of the aristocracy of the Manganja woman as the white and delicate hand is with us. This tattoo is not only upon the face, but upon the back, arms, breast, and hands, as represented in the engraving.

Which of our admirers of the fair sex will be the first to emigrate to the Manganja country?

THE FLOATING MENAGERIE.

Our sketch is taken from the book of a traveler on the Ucayali, one of the head waters of the Amazon. On these estuaries hundreds of these rafts can be seen floating leisurely down, bearing to some place of sale the produce of the country, and guided, if there is any guidance of the craft, by a solitary Indian.

On the raft will be piled a few bags or boxes of coffee, some corn, a little pottery, and various knick-knacks, or what with us would be termed Yankee notions; while, snugly ensconced among them, the Indian mariner will be seated, utterly careless as to all the world, save the company and comfort of his monkeys and of the few birds who perch about his venture.

His place of sale reached, the cargo is quickly disposed off, and, with the few silver pieces it brings, and, perhaps, a pack of tobacco, or some like article of necessity on his back, away he starts for the upper country once more, to renew his trip.

Muscular Christianity.—A camp meeting was held recently in the southern part of this Territory. On one occasion the services were disturbed by a son of Belial, who, under the potent influence of sundry drinks of "forty-rod," became uproarious. A minister well-known to our citizens, who was in attendance, requested the brawler to be quiet, and received a very insulting answer in reply. This aroused the wrath and indignation of the reverend gentleman, and he went in on his muscle, and polished off the offender in the best possible style. While putting in the finishing licks, a brother clergyman approached and asked him to have mercy upon the man he was castigating, adding that mercy was an attribute of God. "True," replied the pugilistic brother, continuing to strike out from the shoulder, "mercy is an attribute of the Divinity, but I am now an instrument of justice, which, in a strict sense, is supposed to know no mercy, and I have none in this case, so please don't interfere." The thrashing completed, the brawler slinked away, and services were resumed. Verdict of the audience—Brother Dyer was right.—The Weekly Rocky Mountain News and Democrat.

Why is a man lifting a side of bacon off a hook to be pitied? Because he is a poor creature (pork reacher.)

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

The Rev. Dr. B., while introducing to the audience Rev. Dr. S., the famous missionary from India (his home by birth), concluded his remarks with the following left-handed compliment:

"He comes to you from that land where every prospect pleases, and only man is vile."

The modest missionary rose, and blushingly rendered his thanks, amidst the irrepressible mirth of the audience.

A Nice young man, a little worldly-minded, walked to church once with a very pious young lady. Arrived at the church-door, worldly-minded young man declined entering. Whereupon, pious young lady seized his hat, and, placing it under her cloak, sailed into church, leaving the worldly-minded young man standing at the door, minus his hat. The last heard of worldly-minded young man, he was seen wending his way down the church aisle as demurely as if nothing had happened.

An officer in the navy seeing a sailor praying before an engagement, reproached him with cowardice in it. Said he: "I was only praying that the shots might be distributed among the officers in the same proportion as prize-money.

A women being enjoined to try the effect of kindness on her husband, and being told that it would heap coals of fire on his head, replied that she had tried "boiling water, and it didn't do a bit of good."

A delicate young lady, whose pa has "struck oil," has discarded the operatic phrase "putting on airs," and substituted the refined improvement, "attiring your persons in atmospheric apparel."

Uncle John Morris was a chronic toper. One day while returning from the tavern, he found locomotion impossible, and he brought up in the corner of a worm fence, where he remained standing. He had been there only a few minutes, when the minister came along.

"Uncle John," said he, "where do you suppose you will go when you come to die?"

"If I can't go any better than I can go now, I shan't go anywhere," replied Uncle John.

A certain minister lately paid a visit to a lady of his acquaintance, who was newly married, and who was attired in the modern indecent fashion. After the usual compliments, he familiarly said:

"I hope you have got a good husband, madam?"

"Yes, sir," replied she, "and a good man, too."

"I don't know what to say about his goodness," added the minister, rather bluntly, "for my Bible teaches me that a good man should clothe his wife, but he lets you go half-naked!"

An Irish dragoon officer on hearing that his widowed mother had married since he quitted Ireland, exclaimed: "Murther! I hope she won't have a son older than me; if she does, I shall lose my estates!"

If a lover wants to kiss a girl, he would advise her never to say anything, but let the thing take its own course.

"Mamma," said Harry, a bright little fellow of three, who had bitten into a large cavity in a doughnut, instead of getting a good mouthful as he had anticipated, "please give me another doughnut, this ain't a good one, it's all weared out."

A person was boasting that he was sprung from a high family in Ireland.

"Yes," said a bystander, "I have seen some of the same family so high that their feet could not touch the ground."

As two children were playing together, little Jane got angry and pouted. Johnny said to her:

"Look out, Jane, or I'll take a seat up there on your lips."

"Then," replied Jane, quite cured of her pouts, "I'll laugh and you'll fall off."

A spendthrift said, "Five years ago I was not worth a farthing in the world; now see where I am through my own exertions.

"Well, where are you?" inquired a neighbor.

"Why, I now owe more than a thousand pounds!"

A prominent merchant informs us that notwithstanding he has paid the charges of his plumber and gas-fitter in full, he shall be able promptly to meet his other debts at maturity. Such instances of financial strength in our metropolis are gratifying evidences of a concentration of capital.

Two-thirds of the fun of sliding down the hill, is the drawing of the sled back afterward.

To be an artist, cultivate your hair, and criticise severely your friends' paintings, else folks will not know you are better than they are.

A joker says that he would be perfectly willing to share the fortunes of war with the noble army of contractors.

Kissing never goes out of fashion, but still it is rather dangerous to kiss one's neighbor's wife, even if she likes it.

The manner in which our military heroes are let down to their original level, on their return home, is something more amusing to the lookers on than flattering to the subject. A case in point: General Sam. H—— went out in a regiment from the Badger State as captain. Before he left the rendezvous he was promoted to colonel; and for gallant conduct in the field was breveted brigadier-general. On his retirement to civil life, he told a friend "they let him down easy." At Washington, it was General H——; at Madison, Colonel H——; at the town where he organized his company, it was, "How are you, captain?" and when he got to S——, where he resides, every boy with a freckled nose was shouting, "Hallo, Sam!"

The wife of a small farmer in Aberdeenshire, having been long confined to bed before the time when her last moment approached, the husband, who was of a very niggardly disposition, at length grudged to let her have so much as a light by the side of her bed. One night, while in this condition, she exclaimed, "Oh, isna this an unco thing, that a puir body can get nar licht to see to die in! The affectionate husband instantly rose up, lighted a candle, and, bringing it forward, hastily, to the bottom of the bed, said, "There, die now!"

A charming anecdote of the celebrated Mme. Ancelot is reproduced in some extracts of her private memoirs. Her daughter married the eminent barrister, M. Lachaud, whose brilliant speeches at the bar almost rival, in eloquence and forensic learning, those of Berryer or Chrix d'Estrange. Madame Ancelot once exclaimed to a friend, "I am the happiest mother in France; I have a son-in-law of whom every one talks, and a daughter of whom no person has ever made a remark."

A writer in Once a Week gives a description of a Russian ball at Moscow, during which the scene in the ball-room was enlivened by the strange phenomenon of a snowstorm, produced by the sudden lowering of the temperature of the room. The writer thus describes it: "The evening passed pleasantly enough; but toward the close the heat began to get intolerable, and although the gentlemen did their duty well, it is only fair to say, in fanning the fair ones and bringing them ice, it became more and more oppressive. At last a gentleman, braver than the rest—probably his arm ached—threw open the top part of a window, and now happened the phenomenon. A cold gust of wind blew suddenly in through the open window, and the heated air, which was congregated in the upper part of the room, became suddenly condensed, and descended upon the assembled party in the form of snow-flakes. Probably there never was seen so curious a sight in a ball-room—ladies and gentlemen in, ball toilet, dancing; and were it not for the incongruity of the attire, more like a skating party.

HOW TO AVOID CHOLERA.

At a meeting of the New York Health Commissioners, Dr. Sayres, of Brooklyn, gave the following general rules for the treatment of cholera patients: "Great fear and anxiety had a great deal to do in the prostration and spread of disease, and influenced the physical condition to such a degree as to make persons more subject to it than they would otherwise be. He thought if the people understood the single fact that the cholera is not necessarily a fatal disease, and that it always is preceded by certain promonitory symptoms, such as lassitude, great languor, debility, and a diarrhea, and that in this stage of the disease it is nearly always curable, if the proper precautionary measures are taken, it would tend to allay the popular terror. At this stage of the disease, it is of the first importance to pay attention to the first symptom, which is diarrhea. At the very first approach, the patient should assume a horizontal posture and retain it, with the hips higher than the shoulders, and under no circumstances assume the perpendicular, even for a moment. Absolute, positive rest is needed, the body being kept in a a warm condition. Any artificial means can be used for that which may be necessary. The main thing is the horizontal position, and perfect rest at the very commencement of the disease. If the patient is downstairs when taken, let him stay there or be carried up; but do not let him walk up. If he is out visiting, let him stay at his friend's house. Keeping this position for 48 hours, in the majority of instances, the disease will pass over, and the patient, on recovery, need make no very great changes in his mode of life. Of course, if he has bad habits, he should reform them; eat and drink rationally, and attend to business as usual, but not overdo himself. In the present state of the atmosphere, when pestilence is abroad, the system is rendered more liable to exhaustion, and he should husband his strength by avoiding violent exercise. With these few precautionary measures, and a proper sanitary condition of the city, and a rigid enforcement of quarantine, we may hope to escape any pestilential epidemic."

A Smart Trick.—The Omnibus, of Naples, relates the following story of a man who, within the last few days, found means to turn to account the popular apprehension of poisoners, which has prevailed there since the appearance of the cholera. The individual in question, being exceedingly hungry, and having only a single coin of the value of a sou, laid it out in the purchase of powdered sugar, and, as he passed by the stand of one of those open-air cooks, who made a kind of pancake called frittate, he dropped, apparently by accident, some of the sugar into the frying pan. He was instantly seized by the bystanders as a poisoner caught in the act. He denied vigorously the truth of the allegation; and, at last, to prove his innocence, offered to eat the contents of the pan. This proposition was accepted, and he accordingly dispatched the pancake with great relish, and then walked off, well satisfied with the success of his trick.

No Remedy in the World ever came into such universal use, or has so fully won the confidence of mankind, as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for the cure of Coughs, Colds and Consumption.

Barnum's New American Museum, Broadway, between Spring and Prince streets. This establishment does not advertise in the New York Herald. Change of Time. The Afternoon Performance hereafter will invariably Commence at 2 o'clock. Every Afternoon at 2; Evening at 7½. The Great Success. The Brilliant Triumph. The Sublime Attraction. The Biblical Historical Drama of MOSES; or, ISRAEL IN EGYPT. Magnificent Scenery, Costumes and Appointments. MOVING PANORAMA OF THE NILE. Scriptural Tableaux: Crossing the Red Sea, Destruction of Pharaoh and his Hosts, Triumph of Israel. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer. Great Living Curiosities: Three immense Giants, Three Dwarfs, Two Circassian Girls, Living Skeletons, Mammoth Fat Woman, Glass Blowers, Albino Boy, Cosmoramas, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria. 100,000 curiosities. Admission, 30 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

Best Black Ink. Five cents a gallon. Recipe sent free for five cents. Address Box 12, Hinsdale, N. H.

NEW MUSIC.

Arrah-na-Pogue, Grand March....................30c.
Silver Trumpets " " ....35c.
I Have Heard Sweet Music Stealing....................30c.
The Haunting Thought, by Reichardt....................40c.
I Can Not Sing the Old Songs, by Claribel....................30c.
Wearing of the Green: Violin, 15c. Song....................30c.
Have You Seen Her Lately? (comic)....................35c.
Matilda Toots, with Colored Lithograph, illustrating Catastrophe on Skating Pond....................50c.
Mailed, post-paid. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery.

The Children All Are Singing

The Charming Songs contained in the Merry Chimes, L. O. Emerson's New and Popular Book of Juvenile Music, containing nearly two hundred pieces, every one a favorite. Most decidedly the best collection published, and following in the path of its predecesor, The Golden Wreath, of which no less than a Quarter of a Million Copies have been printed. Price, 50 cents. Sent, post-paid.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

THOSE CURIOUS FASTENERS

25 CENTS.

Good Books 15 cents each. Courtship Made Easy—Bridal Etiquette—How to Win and Woo—How to Behave—Mind your Stops—Hard Words Made Easy—How to Write Letters Correctly—How to Become an Actor.

The Library of Love,

Three Amusing Volumes for 75 cents.

Poet's Companion, 25 cents. Parlor Theatricals, 30 cents. Fireside Games, 30 cents. Shakspeare's Proverbs, 40 cents. Love Oracle, 30 cents, 500 Curious Puzzles, 30 cents. Parlor Pantomimes, 25 cents. Comic Reciter, 25 cents. How to Converse Correctly, 25 cents. Mammoth Catalogues, containing thousands of Books, Pictures, Plays, Home Amusements, &c., &c., sent with any of the above W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y.
544-557

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS!

American Pocket Timekeeper,

FIFTY CENTS EACH.

The most novel and useful invention of the age. Constructed on the most approved scientific principles, and warranted to denote solar time with greater accuracy than the most expensive gold or silver repeater, while the low price at which it is sold places it within the reach of every one. It is emphatically the timepiece for the million. Neat, cheap and warranted perfectly accurate; can never get out of order. No one should be without it. Price, with white enamaled dial in gold or silver gilt, 50 cents. Sent, by mail, post-paid, to any part of the world. Caution.—This invention is the sole property of the American Manufacturing Company, and all parties are cautioned against buying or offering for sale any Imitation, under no matter what Alteration of Name. Address AMERICAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Post-Office Drawer 32, Albany, New York.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELERY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, ETC., ETC.

Worth $100,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you have to pay for it, and at the same time get your Circular containing full list and particulars of our terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED!

NOW READY, complete in two volumes, with

PICTORIAL HISTORY
OF THE
WAR FOR THE UNION.

By MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

To be had only of Authorized Agents, and not in Book Stores, being SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY. The two volumes contain 1,150 pages, embellished with over

200 Splendid Engravings,

By finished artists, embracing Portraits of Battle Scenes and Thrilling Incidents, Maps, and Illustrations of Notable Events, Portraits of all

THE PROMINENT UNION GENERALS,

And Portraits of all the PROMINENT CONFEDERATE OFFICERS, the whole forming a COMPLETE AND RELIABLE HISTORY OF THE WAR FROM ITS COMMENCEMENT TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Giving a graphic picture of the great Drama of War. Its bloody encounters; its fearful struggles; its personal escapes; its hair-breadth daring; its pathos and sorrow; its anecdotes, &c., &c., giving the substance of and including all that is valuable in the books now described—a truthful, living relics of all matters of interest connected with this, the most important struggle.

Also a complete CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD, giving every event in the order of its occurrence. The immense success which has already crowned the efforts of the Publishers and Author in this work to be

"THE PEOPLE'S HISTORY,"

"THE BOOK FOR THE MILLION,"

"The Cheapest and Best History Published."

Among all the writers of America perhaps no one could be found more capable of writing a history for the people than Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. Her person ever has read the best literature, and from which free she has lately her reputation did not shine with the splendor it now does, as a graceful and brilliant writer. Without deviating from that to which she was pledged, she has, in the most impartial manner, given the actual events, throwing them upon the pages of her work in the most attractive manner that gives them the charm of romance, while every incident, every anecdote, every thrilling episode of the direst writer could give them, and each event can be depended upon as authentic in fact and detail.

REASONS WHY THIS HISTORY EXCELS ALL OTHERS.

1st. It is a well-written and truthful narrative of events as they occurred, and not a political text-book, nor designed to be used for party purposes or for party interests.

2d. It is not a mere expression of private opinions, or limitations or condemnation of individuals, but a clear and connected account of the deeds of war, leaving to the readers' judgment the privilege of deciding upon the merits or demerits of the actors engaged.

3d. It is the only history published containing the portraits of the Confederate officers engaged in the War.

4th. It is the only history containing a complete Chronological Record.

5th. It is printed on tinted, most handsomely illustrated work, of 1,150 pages, now being published, at the exceedingly low price for which it is offered.

Cost to Subscribers.

BOTH VOLUMES.

Bound in Cloth, Marbled Edges	$6 00
Bound in Embossed Leather	7 00
Bound in HALF-CALF	7 00
Bound either in Embossed Leather or Sheep, Gilt Edges	8 00

Specimens Copy sent on receipt of price.

Subscriptions

Received by the Publisher and his authorized Agents, by whom the work will be delivered, free of expense, on receipt of the price. An agent wanted in every town in the United States. Liberal inducements given to Canvassers. Address

BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
14 Chambers street, New York.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen—Beach, in Frame. French Transparent Cards (62 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail, postage at Price. Address

FORWARDING AGENCY, 96 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

TRY IT!—MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the great Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary and Family Newspaper. Ably conducted, finely printed and illustrated—four Fourr Engravings in the four No's for Jan.) Adapted to every member of the family and Country. Largest circulating Journal of its class in the World, and thoroughly reliable and trustworthy. Much reading for 31 days ending Jan. 4, 1866, being $33,870.51! Send $1 for a year—or $2 for two years—or $3 for three years. Numbers of this Quarter (Jan. to April) will be sent, On Trial, for only 50 cents. TRY THE FORMER AND IT IS NOT THE BEST.

Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

300 Per Cent. Profit for Agents.—Three genteel articles, everywhere needed, and sell at sight. All sent by mail, prepaid, for 30 cents. Address E. P. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

Fun! Fun! Fun!—THE MAGIC WEB; a most curious Puzzle. No one can guess it. Two kinds—15 cents each, or both for 25 cents; 13 for $1; 100 for $5. Mailed, post-paid. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H. 544-7

COLORED CARTES DE VISITE

SIXTY CENTS PER DOZEN.

I will send upon receipt of 60 cents 12 Cartes de Visite of French Grisettes in different positions, to the white set of 50 different pictures, $2.

544-9 T. ALLUE, 61 Nassau street, New York.

Recently Enameled Gem-shaped Stud Shirt Bosom, Cuffs, Collars, $3 Sets; Unlinked, $1.50 to Linked Collars and Cuffs, $1.50 each. Mailed. Send price & size. Bosom & Neckband, 16 Nassau St., N. Y.
o

Vieve Brewer; or, Life in the Concert Room. A rich book. Just published. Handsomely illustrated. Only 25 cents. Mailed free. Address Post Office Box 78, HOLLAND, N. Y. 542-51

Kate Vaugh, a Racy Novel, 72 pp.; only 15 cents; sent free. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Sensology, Psychologic Fascination, Marriage Happily Attained, How to Become Rich, Win the Opposite Sex, Marriage, Who to marry, useful, and spicy book, sent by mail for 25 cents. Address EVANS & CO., Box 1,315, Philadelphia.

Employment at your own Homes—either sex—suitable for a husband, or leisure hours in every city and town. Large profits realized. Address, with red stamp for particulars, DR. WARNER, 84 East 14th street, New York City. 544-7

10,000 ALREADY SOLD. Eighth Edition now ready. MAGIC MADE EASY! A complete expose of legerdemain, sleight-of-hand, &c. It tells how to cut a fan, to cut off your nose, cope-tying tests, and nearly 200 other astounding magical performances. Price 25 cents. Sold everywhere, or mailed, free of postage, by HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H. 542-45

EVERYBODY'S FRIEND

Contains the Lady's Guide to Beauty; Useful Recipes for the Household; Hints to Mechanics; Secrets of Freethinkers; the Parlor Magician; How to Make all kinds of Fancy Articles. We will send a copy, postage free, How to Detect Counterfeit Bills and Spurious Coin; the Tricks of Gamblers; and the Secrets of Fortune Tellers, fully exposed; How to make all kinds of Powders, Rouges, Pastes, Washing Fluids, Dyes; How to make the Whiskers and Moustache grow; all kinds of Salutation; Phrenology; Physiognomy; Dreams; over 400 Historical Facts, Proverbs of all Nations, Poetical Quotations, Amusements, etc., etc. Price 25 cents. Send orders to Box 3410, Post Office, N. Y. 535-8

Over Fifty Secrets, numerous Jokes, Witty Sayings, &c., will be found in THE LOOKING-GLASS. Sent Free for FIVE CENTS.
tf ADDRESS, P. O. Box, 5,057, New York.

JOB MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Joker, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c. Price 10 cents. Send order to P. O. Box 3,410, New York.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. H. EARLE, M.D., 90 pages. Mailed in sealed envelope on receipt of 25 cts. Address 13 White Street, New York.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it and be convinced. Sent by mail. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts. Agents wanted everywhere. Address
F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.
0000

$1,000 $1,000
REWARD!
O'DOR! O'DOR!

I warrant my Golden O'Dor to force a beautiful set of Whiskers or Mustache to grow on the smoothest face in from five to eight weeks, or forfeit $1,000. Gold Bands, in eight shades—proven by the testimonials of thousands—to color Hair, Whiskers or Mustache, 75 cents, paid, on receipt of price. Address DR. C. BIRGOS, 548-8 Box 2,222, P. O. Drawer, 6,009, Chicago, Ill.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine, or send for circular by return mail. Sample Or a sample sent free by mail for 50 cents, that retails easily for $6. Ay R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, New York. 529-tf

HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y.
off

Book of Receipts, 40 pages, with catalogue, &c. Address BLAKE & CO., 75 Broadway, N. Y.

Employment for both Sexes.—Energetic persons of either sex or age can obtain a good and profitable employment; can procure such by sending stamp for particulars. Address J. C. MOORE, Boston.

A Sure Method of Tinning at All the various games of Cards, Dice, &c., sent free. Marked Cards $1 per pack, or 10 per dozen. Address W. L. CRAWFORD, Manufacturer of Playing Cards, Nos. 63 and 65 Nassau street, New York.

50 cent SAMPLE, sent free, with terms, for the Cheapest Pen. Address A. MONTE, RAYMOND & CO., No. 29 Broadway, New York. 544-7

Guide to Beauty. 100 pages. Mailed for 20c. Address C. JENNISON, Box 5,474P. O., New York. tf

FRANK LESLIE'S

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

BETTER TO BE BORN LUCKY, THAN RICH.

Great Premiums to be Given Away.

To make sale, and introduce our Golden Pens (60,000 boxes of golden pens, pocket style, in beautiful metal boxes, to resemble gold, for sale at $1 per box), we will give to each person buying a box of Golden Pens, a premium ticket, which will entitle a chance to draw some of the valuable premiums named below. The premiums are printed all on separate tickets. The tickets are placed in envelopes, and sealed up. They are then thrown in a wheel and thoroughly mixed. The envelopes will be distributed, without regard to choice, and sent with each box of pens. This will give all a fair chance. All persons buying an order will be dealt with on the square. A beautiful list of Premiums to be given away:

1	Premium in Greenbacks	$1,000
1,250	" 7-30 Bonds	500
250	" Cash, $2 each	500
100	" Cash, $5 each	500
50	" 50 S. & C. Sewing-Machines, $60 this quarter	3,000
10	" 10 American Gold Lever Watches, $200 each	2,000
10	" 10 American Silver Lever Watches, $100 each	1,000
100	" 100 Gold Double Clasp Alabastine Bracelets, $6 each	600
200	" 200 Clasp Albums, $2 50 each	500
20,000	" 20,000 Stereoscopical Albums, full of portraits of Generals, $1 each—not colored	20,000
20,000	" 20,000 Pocket Picture Galleries, Photographic Albums	10,000
2,500	" Cash, 25 cents each	500
2,500	" Cash, $1 each	2,500
6,873	" 6,873 Boxes of Golden Pens $1 each	6,873
10,000	" Single Gold Pens	800

In all, 60,000 Premiums.

This is a new advertising scheme, and will be carried out to the letter. We will positively give away the above premiums. Our Golden Pen will outwear a dozen common steel pens. We will send a sample dozen, by mail, neatly put up in a beautiful metal box, pocket style, with a premium ticket, for $1. (Postage, extra—nine cents; or, 11 boxes, with 11 tickets, free, for $10. Postage extra.) Send for a dozen in your orders early. All orders answered by return of mail. Address

GOLDEN PEN COMPANY,
206 State street, Chicago, Ill.

P. S.—Good Agents wanted.
545-8

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5
THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND ELEGANT SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with recent improvements, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty! Is NOWSEEN in operation, and for sale at the Manufactory, 343 Fulton street, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD OF ALL SIZES. The Stitch when perfect will require no other than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to one revolution of the wheel. We Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Skirr, Tuck, Bind and Braid-Stitch, &c.; the strongest and most durable. The only LOCK STITCH MACHINE Patented, and that has received a PREMIUM. All other Machines are infringements thereon.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of seventy-five stitches per minute."—Press Letter's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so simple I understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly sews, and can be used by a novice. Its running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

Single Machines, complete, sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Abbott Information sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 193 Nassau Street, N. Y.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple power is possessed by all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail for 25 cents, together with a guide to the art of the married of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Illustrated. Over 100,000 copies already sold. Address

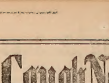
T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.
tf

EVANS' TOILET GEMS,

Consisting of Diamond, Emerald, Ruby, Royal Azure, Gold and Silver Powders. These gems are sprinkled in the hair, and produce a glittering and brilliant appearance. For balls, parties, and social gatherings, they are indispensable. Sent by mail, POSTPAID, on receipt of 50 cents. Address EVANS & CO., Perfumers, 138 South Seventh street, Philadelphia. Sample box of assorted sent by mail for $1 25; sufficient to dress the hair twenty times. tf

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents: 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Spies, Actresses for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actresses for 25 cents. Address 536-48 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?



MY ONGUENT will make them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Will forfeit $1,000 if it fail. Sent by any address on receipt of or cash.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make Cologne, Hungary Water, Bay Rum. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game, and a great many kinds of Liquors of all kinds of Counsels and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Fortune Telling; Dreams; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one. &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5,057 P. O., New York. tf

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs. Sold by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle. 524-575

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking Court Sessions, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours. Fifty-four editions, were Stereotyped. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. tf

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 BROADWAY, ST. NICHOLAS BLOCK,
Photographic Materials,
STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,
War Views, Scenery, Groups, etc., etc.

Photo Albums, great assortment. Cartes de Visite of noted persons, etc., etc., etc. French, English and American novelties.

An Album for Thirty Cents! NEW! BEAUTIFUL! EXQUISITE! CHEAP! A beautiful Gold Metallic Album, containing four (4) Photographs in metal frames, and HIGHLY PERFUMED, opening with Spring Clasp, sent, post-paid, for 30 cents. Address CALVIN, WILLIS & CO., No. 107 Broadway, N. Y. tf 543-6

"FANDANGLE!"

Gentlemen, send for a "Fandangle," which will make warm fun with your friends than anything ever saw. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 3,410, New York. 543-6

"FANDANGLE!"

Ladies, send for a "Fandangle," and gratify your propensity for fun. Price 25 cents. Address, with stamp, ALLEN & CO., Box 3,410, New York. 543-6

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has studied with the scientific clairvoyants of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful mystical instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to perform a lady or gentleman, the name of their husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, single fortune of life, etc. Should you fail to do so in anything, as thousands of persons can assert. She will read, when required, all unexplainable facts the Diapo-ma is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, by inclosing $1 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the pictures by return mail. Address

Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
543-6in P. O. Drawer 203, Albany, N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula was once considered incurable, but the discovery of Holloway's Pills and Ointment flashed upon the world, dissipating the dark shade of the blackest of diseases, and readily yield to these powerful remedies. Scurvy, Erysipelas, Fever Sores, Boils, and cutaneous eruptions are curable by them.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send a two cent stamp, and receive a SAMPLE COPY of the best Family Literature and rare Illustrations. Send Gratis.

CHARLES G. MACKEY,
tf 207 Broadway, New York.

Watches at Wholesale,

Suitable for speculative purposes. Composition, Gold-Plated, Silver, and Enamelled. Gold and Gold Filled Watches at prices below anything in the trade. Our Price List is now ready for 1866, will be sent on receiving cotton.

LIONEL JACOBS,
497 Broadway, (Established 1845).

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of February 14th, 1866.

No. 22023	drew	$100,00
No. 11,695	"	50,000
No. 12933	"	25,000
No. 21,695	"	10,000
No. 9216	"	5,000
No. 15,020	"	1,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Information and subscription furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

Something New.—A for Agents and Dealers to sell, 39 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send for circular.
tf S. W. RICH & CO.,
83 Nassau street, N. Y.

Beauty—Hunt's Bloom of Roses.

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips which will not wash off with the tears; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1 13 cents per bottle; newly patented by invention. HUNT & CO., Perfumers, tf 113 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

$1,500 PER YEAR! We want agents everywhere to sell our universal $20 Sewing Machines. Under cut all competitors. Warranted five years. Above salary, or large commissions paid. The only machine sold in United States for less than $40, which are fully licensed by Howe, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Singer & Co., and Bachelder. All other cheap machines are infringements. Circulars free. Address, or call upon SHAW & CRANDALL, Rockford, Maine.

Matrimony Made Easy;

Or Mysteries of Making Love fully explained, with Directions how to Court. Price 10 cents. Send orders to Box 3,410 P. O., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERCE BIDDLE, 27 and 28 st., N. Y.

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.

Simple and Changing sent for 25 cents. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address tf JAS. F. HANCHES, 63 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWS AGENTS.

Chickering & Sons,

[Established 1823.]

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES

WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY.

Messrs. C. & Sons have been awarded FIFTY-FIVE MEDALS for the Superiority of their Instruments over all competitors. Fourteen of which were awarded in the months of September and October, 1865. o

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newbern, Fort Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Letters charged low rates. 0000

TO CURE

Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, GOUT, GRAVEL and Disorders arising from excesses, use

SMOLANDER'S

Extract Buchu.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York; and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 535-470

WHISKERS and MUSTACHES forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using DR. SEYGNE'S RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE, the most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success. Names of all purchasers will be registered, and if certain satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 543-540

The Little Joker and A PRETTY COLORED PHOTOGRAPH sent in a sealed envelope for 25 cents. Address, Box 5,057, P. O., New York. tf

ITCH! SALT RHEUM!

Cured by REDD'S CRIMEAN OINTMENT. Price 33 cents. Send 45 cents to BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., and get a box by mail. 535-470

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S AGRAFFE PIANOS.

101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years. tfn

ROGERS'S FRAGRANT ODONTOLINE FOR THE TEETH

For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers.

o 0539-45

Old Eyes Made New, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Comfort and Cure for the Ruptured.—Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Croup.—How it may be easily Prevented; also Cause and Cure. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Confidential Information for the Married.—Sent free in sealed envelope. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

Medical Common Sense.—400 pages—100 Illustrations, $1 50. Sent by mail everywhere, postpaid. Contents Table sent free. Address the Author, E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1,130 Broadway, N. Y.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

A new, practical, and original work, illustrated with 122 Designs and Plans of Houses of moderate cost, including stables and out-buildings, with a chapter on the construction of BALLOON FRAMES.

Price, $1 50, mailed free, to any address.

GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, Publishers, 545-50 No. 37 Park Row, New York.

FLORENCE

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal.

FAIR AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO., 537-490 505 Broadway, New York.

WHAT LOUIS NAPOLEON REALLY MEANS.

LOUIS NAP.—"Sare, the vere goot frend—if you will let me stay here as long as I wants, I will go ven you wishes, by sar."

UNCLE SAM—"I am a young man from the country, but you can't come that game over me."

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER.

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for Ladies or Gentlemen. A decidedly unique and useful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to perform CORRECTLY WITH ABSOLUTE certainty and the utmost precision. More trustworthy than the most costly and elaborate Timepiece, it requires no key, or winding. It never can be wrong. It runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Appropriately called the "Royal Letters Patent." Price also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy Watch Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Sale delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors, 0 359 and 361 Broadway, New York.

FOLLAR & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 610 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail, have reduced prices. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Price $6 to $80 each.

0539-45

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING

B. T. BABBITT'S

LAUNDRY SOAP.

LABOR-SAVING SOAP.

This Soap is made from clean and pure materials, contains no adulterations, and will not injure the most delicate fabric, and is especially adapted for woolens, which it renders soft after being washed with the Soap. It may be used in hard or salt water. It will remove paint, grease, tar and stains of all kinds. One pound warranted equal to two pounds of ordinary family soap. Directions sent with each bar for making three gallons handsome soft soap from one pound of this Soap. Each bar is wrapped in a circular containing full directions for use, printed in English and German. Ask your grocer for "B. T. BABBITT'S Soap," and take no other.

B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington St., New York.

50 PER CENT. SAVED BY USING B. T. BABBITT'S best SALERATUS. "Free from common salt." Bread made with this Saleratus contains, when baked, nothing but nutrition, water and flour. Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington Street, New York.

50 PER CENT. SAVED BY USING B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington Street, New York.

PINEAPPLE CIDER, 70 Washington street, New York. A certain Cure for Cholera, Dysentery, Heart Disease, Fainting Turns, and unequalled for Old People, as it quickens the circulation of the blood. o

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

If you want the best fitting, strongest, and most serviceable paper collar ever offered to the public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

The most Economical Collar ever Invented.

Showing the embossed or printed stitch equally well on both sides.

The following styles are now made:

Patent REVERSIBLE Enameled PAPER COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Bank Note Paper COLLARS.	Patent REVERSIBLE Printed Stitch PAPER COLLARS

To be obtained at Furnishing Goods Dealers throughout the country.

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & Co., Agents, 541-330 Winthrop Square, Boston.

Revolvers and Pistols.

MILLER & CO.,

No. 9 Maiden Lane, New York,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in all the latest improved REVOLVERS and PISTOLS now made, which they are selling at greatly reduced prices.

REVOLVERS—Reid's Seven Shot, or "My Friend," for close quarters; Smith & Wesson's, National Right Arm Co.'s, Remington's, Colt's, Whitney's, Elliott's, and Confederate Arms Co.'s.

PISTOLS—National Derringer, Remington's complete Case and Field combined, and Dickerson's Single Shot.

MILLER & CO., Sole Agents.

Send for a circular and price-list. o

To Nervous Sufferers!

NERVOUS SUFFERERS, of both sexes, will receive a valuable PRESCRIPTION for the cure of Nervous Debility, PREMATURE DECAY, and all kindred diseases free of charge, by sending their address to the undersigned. Respectfully,

JOHN B. OGDEN,
13 Chambers street, New York.

545-60

Wanted.—Energetic persons, of good address, to travel; the business is very desirable, and highly remunerative. Full particulars given, if a directed envelope, with stamp, for return postage, is sent to S. R. J. & Co., Box No. 692, P. O., New York.

BEAUTE.—Ladies born, Golden, Flaxen, and Silken CURLS produced by the use of Professor De Merry's PERSER LE CHEVEUX. One application warranted to twist the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy, massive curls. Has been used by the nobilities of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address BERGER, SHULTZ, & CO., Chemists, P. O. Drawer 21, Troy N. Y., sole Agents for the United States. 543-540

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and beautiful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $30 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the best improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. S. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Rodge Bourner, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

$7 FINE WATCHES $7
AT OLD PRICES.

English Silver Watches - -	$ 6, $8, $10
Pure Silver Hunting Lepines -	$15 Each.
Fine 18 Karat Gold-Plated Watches -	$12, $15, $20.
Fancy Compass and Thermometer Watches - - -	$15, $20.
Silver Hunting Levers - -	$20, $35.
Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches -	$20, $ 25 to $75.
Coin Silver American Levers -	$30.
All kinds of Good Watches, low.

CATELY BROTHERS, Importers,
tfo 65 Nassau street, N. Y.

ITCH. ITCH.
Salt Rheum. OINTMENT. Salt Rheum.

Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cure Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 Cents; by sending 60 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists. 541-560

MICROSCOPES 60cts.

THE FRENCH TUBULAR MICROSCOPE, a very powerful instrument, mailed for 60 cents; two for $1. Address
GEO. D. WASHBURN & CO., Box 5,093, Boston, Mass. 541-530

Great American PRIZE CONCERT!

AT

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE,

Chicago, Ill., March 28, 1866.

20,000 Valuable Gifts worth $96,300 will be presented to the Ticket Holders.

100,000 TICKETS WILL BE SOLD;

One Gift, in Greenbacks,	$10,000
One Gift, in 7.30 Bonds,	5,000
1 Gift, Residence three miles from Chicago	5,000
2 Superb Grand Pianos, 7 Gifts, $500 each	3,500
50 Eng. Pat. Lever Gold Watches, $250 each	12,500
50 Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines, $100 each	5,000
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches	5,000
50 Gifts, 50 Silver Lever Watches, $50 each	2,500
5,000 Gifts 5,000 Toy, Morocco Gold Clasp Albums	25,000
5,000 Gifts, 5,000 Photo Albums, $3 each	14,400
10,000 Gifts, $10,000 Cash, $1 each	10,000
20,000 Gifts, Total value of which	$96,800

The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which gotten up, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public.

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.

2d. All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Pianos and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers' names are sufficient guarantees that they are surpassed by none.

3d. The drawing will be in full view. Each ticket has its duplicate No., these are placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed. Any disinterested person names the ticket holders present at the Concert,) draws these duplicate No.'s from the wheel, the first one drawn will get the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in this manner until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first set sufficient number of tickets to insure us against loss, the Prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unlike all other Gift Sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietors would keep four of the value you draw, and send you a package if ever get anything worth what they offer you.

Dont throw your money away on vanished concerts, but send us your orders for tickets soon, if you would secure them; over 80,000 already sold. Every ticket is registered before being sent out, the number, name of party purchasing, and address, and all will be notified by mail of the result of drawing.

Tickets, $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp. Address—

BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.,
144 South Clarborn St., Chicago, Ills.

P. S.—The above concert will positively take place on the 28th of March. Parties at a distance sending us $10 for eleven tickets, (small lots will be sold) will have the money returned to them.

BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.
544-5-60

If you want a good Head of Hair, use WEBSTER'S VEGETABLE HAIR INVIGORATOR. DENIS BARNES & CO., New York, General Agents. 533-450 cured by Bate's Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet &c., address SIMPSON & CO., 377 West 23d St., N Y. 0000

STAMMERING

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York. o

LADIES
PAPER COLLARS
& CUFFS.
WHOLESALE & RETAIL
WARD, 387 B'WAY, N.Y.

One Lady's Collar sent free to the Trade. Write, with list of prices and drawings of different styles. o

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 546 — Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, MARCH 17, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00.

Checkmate to Pestilence.

New York has the unhappy pre-eminence among all great municipalities, of being utterly unable to properly control its own local affairs. Its police at one time, instead of being the preservers of the peace, became its most frequent violators, and instead of being the protectors and guardians of the property of the people, became often thieves themselves, or more frequently their confederates and the participants of their spoils. The position of policeman was awarded to the lowest class of ward and corner-grocery politicians, with little or no regard to personal qualifications, and the language of the corps was a strange medley of tongues, in which English by no means predominated. The consequence was, that the property-holders and respectable people of the city were compelled to invoke the interposition of the State Government, in order to rescue the city from anarchy and preserve it inhabitable. The result was the appointment of a responsible, non-partisan Metropolitan Police Commission, and the organization of one of the finest and most efficient police corps in the world. In the well-uniformed, stalwart, civil policeman of to-day, we have the very contrast of the shabby, lounging, ignorant and impertinent fellow who passed by that name fifteen years ago.

Then our Fire Department, with its obsolete, inefficient apparatus, its noise and rowdyism, but worst of all, its nests of idleness and vice, called "Engine Houses," came in for the wholesome direction and control of a Commission, established on the same principle with that having control of the police. Although only a few months in operation, the city already sees and appreciates the benefits of the change.

Up to this time, however, there has been a department worse administered than any other, or rather not administered at all, and that is what may be called the Sanitary, or Health Department. The health of a great city depends upon so many conditions, and on the proper discharge of the duties of so many departments of the Municipal Government, that there has been a great practical difficulty in procuring concert or efficiency of action between them. The cleansing of streets, the revision and supervision of sewers, the enforcement of the regulations about sinks, the enforcement of the laws about buildings, and the case of emigrants afflicted with contagious diseases, all these several duties have hitherto devolved upon different sets of men, who have more or less shifted their responsibilities on each other's shoulders. "What is everybody's business is nobody's." And so it has happened, that New York, which, from the advantages of its position, should be the best drained, best ventilated, cleanest and healthiest city in the world, has been the dirtiest and among the least healthful. Every one who has reflected on the matter, has long seen the necessity of placing special and ample power somewhere beyond local and partisan reach, for the control and reformation of all matters affecting the public health. Our experience with the Police and Fire Commissions, indicated the way in which the general wish could be realized, and we are now happy to announce that the State Legislature has given us a Sanitary Commission, which will have absolute control of all matters relating to the health of the city. All Municipal boards and committees on streets, sewers, tenements, etc., etc., may still exist and go on as usual, doing nothing; but the new Commission is above and beyond them, in no way subject to their control or responsible to them or the Municipality. If it finds the streets dirty, it has the power to have them cleaned. If it learns of a sewer choked up, it has only to direct that it be opened. If landlords jam tenants in inadequate, unventilated and filthy quarters, it can order them enlarged and cleansed. For the purposes of its appointment, the Commission has unlimited power over all property, public and private, in the city, and can cause the arrest and punishment of any and all persons who may annoy or obstruct it in the performance of its duties.

These extraordinary powers have been conferred, and are rendered necessary in view of the approach of the cholera, which last year shrouded Europe in mourning, and from which a visit may be apprehended with the opening of the warm season. With ample warning, with the pestilence in our very harbor as long ago as last fall, our city authorities have done nothing to prepare the city against it. Already an unusually large part of our people have made arrangements to leave the city at an unusually early day, and merchants and hitherto visitors have made their plans to avoid the city during the ensuing season. The damage to accrue to our business and prosperity from these causes, is not easily calculable, but must be great. How far the appointment of the Health Commission may avert it, remains to be seen. This much is certain, the Governor has made a very judicious choice of Commissioners, and it is to be hoped that the public preoccupations in their favor will be justified by their works.

THE LITTLE BOTHER.—BY THOMAS FADD.

THE LITTLE BOTHER.

On this page we give an elaborate engraving of one of Fadd's pictures, "The Little Bother."

The picture tells its own story; we can only tell that of the artist. He is, just now, pre-eminently the domestic artist of the English people, and of the world. A picture of his, the presentation plate of the Chimney Corner, entitled "He Only Pair," by means of the cheap and good art emanating from the improved facilities of the present day, now hangs on the walls of a

